The Rev. Dr. Powers, of Washington, pastor of the Vermont Avenue church, of which General Garfield was a member, in his address over the body of the dead President in the rotunda of the Capitol, said, "A million million prayers and hopes and tears, as far as human wisdom sees, were vain." If Rev. Dr. Powers is right, why ask God for anything for Christ's sake, our sake, or anybody's sake, or pray at all except "thy will be done" or, "we will trust in God, Amen?" If he will not change his plans, why continually besiege him with petitions that are sure to go into his waste basket? Surely Almighty God must feel indignant at this lack of confidence in his wisdom as displayed in these dictatorial petitions.

If "prayers, as far as human wisdom sees, and hopes and tears are all in vain," then Jesus Christ ought to hav said so, and he did very wrong to promis so much in his name in answer to prayer. I cannot get rid of the suspicion that he knew better all the time. If he did know better, as he must if he was not an impostor, it was a trick equaling in 'cuteness that of the devil in the garden of Eden. It is evident he meant to outwit the devil by using the devil's own trick, and the priests, and they only, are getting the benefit of it. If true, it is "diamond cut diamond," and "ever the devil comes uppermost" from first to last. It seems to me if Almighty God knows all things, and orders all things for the best, that settles the question. If Almighty God created all things, he is the author of all bad as well as all good; and if he "orders all things," all bad deeds, as well as all good deeds, must be attributed to him, therefore we must be content to take the bitter with the sweet. Millions of millions of prayers, then, whether offered by millions of priests or the common people, whether in Christ's name or any other, whether with faith or without, are, as far as "human wisdom sees," absolutely in vain, and the next time our governors, or President, set apart a day of public prayer, etc., let us not forget it.

Again, the Rev. Dr. Powers, to our utter amazement, declares that the hand (Guiteau's) that struck down the President was the enemy of the country and the enemy of God. Now, if Guiteau was the enemy of the country and of God it is not possible to reconcile this with the above, except it is just as necessary for Almighty God to hav Judases, Booths, and Guiteau's as Christs, Lincolns, and Garfields.

This being true, I feel very thankful Almighty God did not create and order me to be the enemy of my country and of God, although, as I now see it, I should feel far worse to be my country's enemy than the enemy of such a God. If it is true that Guiteau was a Judas, and was acting in obedience to God's orders, is it not insulting his divine majesty to think even of trying him for murder and punishing him? If Guiteau was God's instrument he could not help himself; he was compelled to kill Garfield, and this at once settles forever the question of who is to blame or who is responsible for the suffering and death of President Garfield. No more is he to blame for being the enemy of the country, and it can't be possible Almighty God is so ridiculously unjust as to order Guiteau to be punished here or hereafter for obeying orders. A practical union of church and state would then most certainly require a national recognition of Almighty God's plans and orders, and his instruments, the Judases, Booths, and Guiteaus, would and should be dealt with tender mercy accordingly. E. A. CHAPMAN.

P. S.—Since writing the above I hear that the Rev. Dr. Turnbull, of Detroit, regrets that Dr. Powers let fall the assertion, "A million million prayers and hopes and tears, etc., were vain." Who shall decide when doctor's disagree?

Joseph.

BY ALHAZA.

The sun is dying, and his fires that rose
Seem almost quenched and dark, as he lies down,
Nor steals a glance at the deep, mild repose
Of Joseph, stretched upon a couch all sown
With golden work, and flowers to us unknown,
A gorgeous leopard sleeping at his feet,
Which, waking, loves his master's guidance sweet.

A faint sepulchral light steals o'er his face,
And falls on vase and pillar, stained brown,
Dark wreaths are carven thick, with antique grace,
By fingers now embalmed, of high renown.
Round porphyry and alabaster roses peep,
Lotus, and trailing myrtles breathe and weep,
To shelter death, or a sweet, death-like sleep.

His limbs were massive, half undraped and white
A bed of lilies at the fountain's brim;
His dark-blue mantle striped with golden light,
With jeweled clasp, that made the place less dim,
Revealed an arm that well could wield a spear,
A woman charm, and drive away her fear.

She came, an angel, hovering o'er his sleep,
And drank the breath that made her senses reel;
Like the rich wine that the rose fairies steep,
When dewy memories o'er the dark earth steal,
And if you sip it at the even-time
You can not think of woe, or pain, or crime.

He muttered in his sleep, it was her name,
She dared not kiss the fragrant breath away,
But fell, all groveling, in her beauteous shame.
No guilt was lurking in that mournful eye.
But books will cheat, and men inspired will lie.

Her fond eyes drooped beneath their heavy fringe,
Like berries brown, where sweep the wild bird's wings;
The lattice, turning quickly on its hinge,
So that the breeze could there its odors fling,
And wanton with her tissues fluttering,
Her dainty limbs were prisoners set free,
A snowy arm and alabaster knee.

Then Joseph woke, and threw a glance on her
Of charmed amazement, yet 'twas deathly cold;
The lovely tigress from his feet did stir;
Meek as a lamb, within that gloomy fold,
His jeweled hand, her galling chain did hold.
One boon alone would please her from the skies,
Sadly to gaze into those calm blue eyes.

"Is coldness virtue? Would my heart were froze!
My husband would embalm me, as you see,
Your deities would cast fierce looks on me.
My bosom only one wild passion knows.
Do the calm stars read all my secret woes?
Thou and those silent gems can hear my moan,
And hear and never pity, and shine on.

"You say I must be patient, times will change;
The richest balm yields but a drop a day,
And he may fall in battle, and derange
The cruel plans of gods and coward men,
You would not take me to your cold heart then?
My madness is not womanly, replying,
And you can scorn me! Joseph, I am dying!

"Behold yon architrave, the ibis near,
Which great Osiris loves, and serpent sleep,
And quaint sweet faces turned toward the sky,
Although the heavens are brazen when we cry,
The sweet mimoso scarce can grow for fear.
And thou dost love me, but in slumber deep,
A palace is a jungle of despair,
The poison of the liffa's fangs is there,
Or some wild passion springs to freeze my blood,
As the death-locust blooms in crimson flood,
These golden beetles warn me soon to flee;
They dimly shine. Joseph, I love but thee!

"Thou darest not speak, and yet thou gavest to me
A wan pink mantle, 'tis the Zerda's fur;
A scarf beset with gems of every hue,
Damascus sheen of Tyrian red and blue.
Alas, these eunuchs from their tower can see,
To say how tenderly I clung to thee,
And thou didst coldly turn with sad demur,
And that I seized these groups of crimson dew,
And roses made of the meek opal's gleam,
For saints and eunuchs lie, and falsely dream.

"The murmuring tamarisk, the myrtle's sigh,
The perfumed wilderness would bid us fly,
To a dark land where birds with wings of gold
Sing in the air and murmur from each bough,
The rapturous breeze hath never a breath of cold,
No whisper save of love should there be heard,
Or streamlets 'neath the mango's branches low,
A sweet aroma breathes from nooks hard by,
Like cerements that wrap us when we die;
A dirge-like voice I hear, a passing knell,
My heart will break; sweet Joseph, fare thee well."

Sixteen Saviors or None.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

Being a reply to John T. Perry's "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examins all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other, and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and themselvs, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

THE STENOGRAPH

Is a machine for writing shorthand. It is simplicity itself. Is very easily learned. Easily operated with all the fingers. Its writing is more legible and accurate than any other system of shorthand. The writing of one operator can be readily read by another. Ordinary shorthand requires the verbatim reporter to commit to memory hundreds of contractions and word-signs. Operators of the Stenograph use less than one hundred contractions. The letters are represented by dots and spaces—nothing else. To fit persons for shorthand clerks only half the time required to learn the best phonography. Six hundred letters per minute can easily be made, which is more than sufficient to equal the speed of the most rapid reporters.

IMPORTANT TO INVALIDS WHO HAV BEEN TREATED BY MEDICAL MEN AND STILL CONTINUE TO BE DISEASED.

I am happy to say there is a lasting hope for you. The system of which I am the inventor will do more for you than all the drugs in America. It cannot be gainsayed that more die of drugs than from disease. The present system of medicin is a mistake and must soon giv way to more rational means. Thousands of persons in Brooklyn and New York are ready to testify that my "WILSONIA GARMENTS" cured them after the most skilful drug treatment had failed. Medicin in acute forms of disease of recent origin, may be of benefit, and in case of accident it is quite right to use every possible palliativ; even poison, that in large doses would kill, may in such cases of sudden disease, if used with proper caution, be found of great value; but in all chronic diseases such as paralysis, rheumatism, anchylosis, asthma, bronchitis, heart disease, gout, varicose veins, catarrh, spinal disease, locomotor ataxia, and many other forms of a chronic character must forever defy the power of drugs.

The history of medicin is one that, if read with care would strike terror into the minds of every thoughtful reader. The most scientific writers of the past and present hav all denounced the practice of medicin as mere experiment, and the thousands who die under medical treatment only too truly tell the melancholy fact. The infant is wrested from its mother's breast; the bride of yesterday the corpse of to-morrow; the laughing boy, the romping girl, the loved and noble husband, the aged parents, all and each in turn are daily hurried to their end by the errors of drug treatment; and yet the people go on from decade to decade without ever making inquiry as to the cause of such a state of things.

I hav now, after sixteen months' residence in Brooklyn, proved that medicin is not only not needed, but that every form of chronic disease hav one common source or cause, and that the same means that will cure gout will cure cancer; the same that will cure paralysis will cure catarrh; the same that will stay bleeding of the lung will cure anchylosis. This very astounding statement must must strike terror into the minds of our regulars, who pride themselvs so much on their acumen and pretenses of diagnosis. These men only too frequently declare a lung to be diseased when that lung is in perfect condition. Then how often is it declared that the heart is enlarged or fat, or its valves indurated, or some other such wild statement, only to frighten the poor victim into an ever-changing course of medicin—mercury to-day, chloral hydrate to-morrow, belladonna next day, and so on, week by week, year by year, until the poor patient becomes a walking drug store, and then dropping into an early grave.

Now, to obviate all this diagnostic nonsense, I hav come to the rescue of these poor invalids, and tell them plainly that there is but one cause for disease, and consequently one means of cure.

ONE DISEASE! ONE CURE!

The fact being that there is but one disease, no matter what form it may take, and it is only by and through the quackery of the schools of medicin that diseases and their cure hav been so multiplied, we now know the want of nervous force precedes a languid circulation or the want or equilibrium in the circulatory system; in a word, the blood is the life, and electricity the equalizer of all our forces, so that if we can by any means infuse magnetism into the human organism soothingly and gently we shall thereby attain to a natural state of existence and death shall only be the result of nature's inevitable law, instead of the early deaths amid racking pains, superinduced by the introduction of poisonous drugs and quack nostrums dispensed indiscriminately by empirics and the schoolmen of our colleges, but amid all this there is a hope for every invalid, and that hope is centered on nature's universal remedy—magnetism.

Before window glass was invented the only lighting media for our houses in the daytime were holes in the structure for the poor, or frame work of horn for the rich. The man who invented glass did not invent light, but only a medium by which it might be transferred. Just so with the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC BELT. WM. WILSON did not invent magnetism, but only a means whereby it may be accumulated and transfused through the animal economy of man.

WM. WILSON pretends to no secret as in quack nostrums, but freely and proudly discloses to every one the principles of his invention, so that all ingenius persons may for themselvs construct their own Magnetic Belts, the only question being whether they would waste their time and money instead of purchasing the appliances made by the aid of valuable machinery and constructed on scientific principles. I know only too well that the doctors will try to crush me for having dared to teach them their business. This some of them hav already done, first by inducing the internal revenue officers to place a tax on my garments; failing in this, I have fought the government and won my case (although at the cost of three thousand dollars), yet I won in opposition to these doctors. But another move must be made thought they. A happy thought. Let us go to Anthony Comstock, get him to write a letter to a large number of persons given as reference, pretend the certificates of WILSON are false, malign him in a circular letter, break the people's confidence in his goods, and thus we can close him up. Well done, says doctor number two, and the thing was done. Comstock was imposed upon, as I hav now every reason to believe, in fact from the first I thought such was the case, and so wrote to Comstock the following letter asking for the names of the persons who had thus given him the information, but those persons being doctors Anthony Comstock dare not disclose their names; it was left to me to ferret that out, which I hav done, and confronted several of them, two of them who went to the fore, and others who acted as stool pigeons in the matter.

Here is the letter I wrote to Anthony Comstock:

WILLIAM WILSON'S LETTER TO COMSTOCK.

465 FULTON ST., BROOKLYN, Sept. 13, 1881.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:

DEAR SIR—I was surprised this morning to find in my consulting rooms many of my former patients, each bringing me a circular letter received from you, a copy of which is inclosed herewith. With this each handed me a copy of their replies to you. You hav evidently been imposed upon. I would take it as a favor if you would giv me the names of the informants to whom you refer. They are amenable to prosecution, and it may become my duty to institute proceedings against them. It will giv me pleasure to afford you convincing proof of my position, and of the nature and benefit of my appliances as a curativ agent. I believe my services in this respect will be found to be such as to commend me to universal approval as a public benefactor. Mention is made in your letter in reference to my name. Allow me to refer you to the Brooklyn directory, where you will find an advertisment of mine and my name and address in full.

I hav inclosed one of my blank checks (not for use). You will see my name printed on the end. As to my having been a cabinetmaker, upon that fact I build my glory, in not only having earned an honest livelihood, but to hav won the respect of all honest men with whom I hav come in contact, until to-day I stand in the proud position as the inventor of a system destined to overthrow the pernicious practice of drugging humanity. I understand fully the penalties I hav to bear for having dared to teach medical men their business. Do you not know that all great inventions and improvements ever emanate from persons whose walks in life hav been totally distinct from that in which such inventions were likely to spring? My discovery of the real nature of nerve fluid and blood composition must revolutionize the practice of medicin. That being the case, hav I not cause to be proud of once having been a cabinetmaker? If a rail splitter may become a President, and our new President not being ashamed of having once conducted a barge, why should William Wilson be ashamed of having been a cabinetmaker?

Hoping that you may pay a visit to my establishment, and there see for yourself the result of my labor, I remain,

Respectfully yours, WILLIAM WILSON.

P. S.—I intend to publish all letters sent to me, being copies of those sent to you, and will take it a favor if you will forward all letters sent you FOR or AGAINST me. The following paragraph, cut from one of my advertisments, may be of interest to you:

My difficulty is that many persons will become rotten with disease, will swallow medicin enough to float a steamship, and rub in liniments and ointments enough to tan the skin till it becomes like the sail of a ship; and then, hearing of my marvelous cures, will expect, on putting on my goods, to jump into new life in two or three months. This, in most cases, is an impossibility, and persons governed by such expectations had better not waste their time or my own in calling upon me.

With respect to the names given below, a few words of explanation should be given. I hav not studied cases to suit my purpose, but hav taken each one seriatim, not knowing or caring what report may be supplied on application to the persons therein named, knowing full well that to wear the WILSONIA is to obtain perfect health, although in some cases it may take as many weeks to effect a change as it does hours in other cases. But it never has failed, and never can, when the instructions given are followed out.

Now, citizens, read the letters sent to Anthony Comstock in answer to the libelous letter; say, then, am I not cruelly injured by Anthony Comstock? Why did he not make inquiry before he wrote such a letter? I will giv to any one $5,000 for one case where I hav ever deceived a single person. I always, in my pamphlets, tell persons what are my proportions of cures, and giv the names of persons who wear my goods, not caring what the persons say whom others may apply to.

READ THE FOLLOWING DESCRIPTION OF THE "WILSONIA" GARMENTS.

Electricity as a curativ agent has long been recognized by the faculty. In fact, from the time of Galen, through every decade, this marvelous agent has attracted the attention of all thinking men; but thinking and acting are distinct characteristics; therefore, while thousands of medical men hav decided that electricity was the one thing needed as a direct means of cure, yet the bigotry of the schools of medicin has ever prevented the introduction of anything that did not correspond with the preconceived notions of those who gloried in the names of professors, but in such pride of position dared not relinquish their glory. And thus it is that thousands hav been compelled to swallow the abominations of our drug stores through hundreds of years, and hav as a result, gone to an early grave. The methods by which electricity has been applied are numbered by the thousand—batteries of various kinds, electric machines, electric belts, electric disks, electric garters, electric rings, electric medals. Then we hav had magnetic belts in dozens of designs, all intended to produce and maintain a current of magnetism in the blood, by which process alone can the blood be continued in a perfect state of circulation. All these appliances do possess valuable properties, but the great trouble ever present was the want of continuity on the one hand, and an absence of perfect ventilation on the other. Not only so, but yet another want in all these was a means to keep back the electricity of the body so that by a conservation of forces we could use over and over again the waste nerve force which would be otherwise thrown out into the atmosphere. This I hav succeeded in doing by encasing my garments with an impervious tissue such as oil silk, gutta percha, or any other non-conductor of electricity, but by preference I use gutta percha as the best non-conductor known; also that any two pieces of metal of different molecular construction must of necessity, when brought in contact where heat and moisture can ramify between them, such impact of metals must produce an electro-galvanic action. This I hav done in a variety of ways. By my first patent I used disks of copper and zinc attached to the magnets, and next I placed ribbons of copper and zinc with chemical calico between them to absorb the moisture of the body, but after many trials I hav proved my present method the most effectual means ever adopted by mankind in any part of the world for the production of continuous magnetic action.

Therefore, I am in a position to say that never in the history of the world has such a perfect magnetic garment been produced, embracing the following requisits:

First—Non-contact with the skin.
Second—Constancy of current unimpeded.
Third—Capability of being washed and cleansed,
Fourth—Perfect ventilation, whereby the moist vapors of the body are ever eliminated.

This is a most important point, and upon which I feel the greatest possible pride, it being the desideratum in all magnetic body wear, and the methods by which these effects are produced are simplicity itself, at the same time evolving a galvanic current, by the impact of dissimilar metals forming the ventilating openings.

NOTE.—The above points should be studied by every physician, and then, compared with all that has gone before, it will be found to be the most perfect arrangement in the world, as the following testimonials will prove, and be it remembered that these testimonials were sent to the government spy, ANTHONY COMSTOCK, who was stupid enough to doubt the value of my invention.

2 ST. FELIX ST., BROOKLYN, Sept. 13, 1881.

A. COMSTOCK,
DEAR SIR: Yours just received, contents noted. In reply will say I know nothing of Mr. Wilson's antecedents, hav never inquired about them. His garments were spoken of to me last winter, when my adopted daughter was suffering from a complication of diseases, who had been sick two years and more. Had been under the care of Dr. Smith, of Brooklyn, who said, after attending her for months, that it was a very bad case, and she constantly grew worse. I called on Mr. Wilson, saw his goods, heard his testimony, took the garments home with me, and my daughter put them on. She has experienced great relief. Has just returned from the country, where she has spent several weeks. She still wears the garments, and would not be willing to leave them off for a day. She is not cured yet. Don't know as she ever will be, but that she is greatly benefited I am sure. No one would hesitate to say, who saw her then and now, it must be the garments that did her good, for she took no medicin after putting them on. I hav a set of the garments myself. I would not part with them if I could not replace them. My little granddaughter, who was always troubled with a cough in winter, and had catarrh very bad more than ever last winter, has had no cough or catarrh since. I do not believe Mr. Wilson an impostor, but believe his invention has been a blessing to hundreds of suffering people. Yours respectfully, MARTHA MOXSON.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:
SIR—Yours of late date received. I furnished Mr. William Wilson with a certificate of my case. After wearing his Magnetic Clothing for five months, and being nearly cured of a loathsome catarrh of lifetime standing, with its wretched train of consequences, dyspepsia, heartburn, etc. Numbers of my friends, people of intelligence, hav been equally benefited, and, if called upon, will bear testimony to the "WILSONIA." As to the antecedents of William C. Wilson, I know from Mr. Wilson that he has been in New York heretofore. I hav repeatedly heard him refuse to be called professor or doctor, but insists upon "William Wilson, House Carpenter." Your most direct means of information would be to call at Mr. Wilson's place of business. His rooms and factory are always open to the public for inspection, and the most critical scrutiny is invited. E. S. CHIPMAN.

BROOKLYN, September 13, 1881.

MR. COMSTOCK:
DEAR SIR—Your note came at hand in reference to the "WILSONIA." In answer to you I may state I hav been suffering for years with bleeding to the nose and other troubles, such as weakness and general debility, etc. I called on Mr. Wilson last summer, and stated my case to him. He put some of his belts on, and, contrary to my expectation, I began to feel relief, and am now a well man, which was a great surprise to me, after having tried every remedy that I could get hold of. As far as being swindled by him, I consider he has been my benefactor, as far as restoring me to health.

I cheerfully gave him my name, hoping that it would do some poor mortal placed in the same condition I was some good. Respectfully, E. NILSON,
418 Bridge street.

September 13, 1881.

MR. A. COMSTOCK:
DEAR SIR—Your letter addressed to my wife has been handed to me by her for answer. I would inform you that Mr. Wilson has had the full and free consent of myself and wife to use her name as reference.

Mrs. Robb has suffered for a great many years from neuralgia (eighteen years). On April last, when very low, I obtained the "WILSONIA," and from the first moment of putting them on she experienced great benefit, and every day gains strength; so much so is this the case, she is now able to go out and enjoy life, something she has been unable to do for years previous. Hoping this will satisfy your scruples regarding the "WILSONIA,"
I remain yours respectfully, R. ROBB.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:
SIR—Your letter, dated the 10th inst., received. In reply I would say that I hav received all the benefit claimed by the "WILSONIA." Mr. Wilson has used my name with my knowledge and consent, and he has not exaggerated any statement made by me. I know nothing in regard to Mr. Wilson's pedigree, but I know this much, that the "WILSONIA" Magnetic Clothing has done for me what medicin could not do. I am now enjoying better health than I hav been since the war, and I owe it all to the wearing of the "WILSONIA" Magnetic Clothing.
Respectfully yours, etc., JOEL E. CANNON.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:
DEAR SIR: In answer to your communication respecting the "WILSONIA," I hav to state that I know that my name appeared in the different papers, that I hav been a sufferer from nervous prostration for years, and I hav worn the garments prescribed by Mr. Wilson with great benefit without the use of a particle of medicin. I was confined to my room with my eyes for three months, suffering from Ophthalmic Catarrh. I am now able to be out in the open air. They are getting stronger every day.

MR. A. COMSTOCK:
SIR—In answer to your communication of yesterday I take pleasure in informing you that the certificate which I gave to Mr William Wilson was true in every particular, and from my present knowledge I can fully recommend his WILSONIA to any person suffering from the complaint with which I was afflicted, namely, hemorrhage of the lungs. Yours, etc., MICHAEL MARRION,

MR. COMSTOCK:
Yours received to-day at hand about Wilson Garments. There was a time when I had no faith in them, but when I came to put them on the Goods did me so much good I can't but speak well of them. They hav been a great blessing to many others I know. A great many of my friends hav been greatly blessed by having these Garments, and to-day they thank God there are such Garments. I suppose I hav had two hundred persons call to see me about these things.

I can't say too much about them. I am doing business on Fulton street, and hav been for twenty-eight years.

I was troubled with dyspepsia for a long time, but I hav never had it since.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:
DEAR SIR—In answer to your favor of September 10th relativ to Mr. Wilson, I beg leave to state that Mr. Wilson was introduced to me by a Mr. Berwin a year ago last April, Mr. Berwin informing me that Mr. Wilson was the inventor of certain Magnetic Clothing which he (Berwin) knew to be all that Mr. Wilson represented them to be. Having suffered very much from a rheumatic and nervous affection in my left foot, I was induced, through the persuasion of Mr. Berwin, to wear the WILSONIA SOLES. After putting them on I experienced immediate relief, and consider myself entirely well from wearing them, and gave Mr. Wilson permission to use my name as reference. Regarding Mr. Wilson's antecedents I know nothing, and care less, so long as poor humanity is benefited through him. Many of my acquaintances hav worn the WILSONIA, and speak in the most flattering terms about them. I hav always found Mr. Wilson a gentleman of sterling integrity, and hav known him to assist the poor and afflicted in goods and money.
Yours very respectfully, BENJAMIN LEWIS.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:
DEAR SIR—Yours of 10th received. In reply will merely state that, as regards W. C. Wilson and his Garments, I will say that I used them and found them to be a great benefit—in fact a cure. I was afflicted with rheumatism so badly that I could not move. After applying his goods I found relief immediately. My name was used by my consent, and I will gladly indorse his Garments as a great benefit to all that are afflicted.
Yours respectfully, EDWARD W. FEW.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK:
DEAR SIR—I received a letter from you to-day about the WILSONIA, which you condemn wrongly. I hav been sick for more than two years, and I had fifty-six doctors trying to cure me, without success, and they did not give me any relief until I put on the WILSONIA, which helped me to work at my trade, and now I am as well as ever. PETER LEHLBACH.

BROOKLYN, September 13, 1881.

DEAR SIR—Yours of September 10th making inquiries concerning the WILSONIA Garments at hand. In reply I hav to say that Mr. Wilson has my consent to refer to me. I still wear a portion of a suit of the WILSONIA Garments, and I believe with good results, having been troubled with dyspepsia and indigestion for many years. In my business relations with Mr. Wilson I hav found him satisfactory. Very respectfully,
J. H. LITTLEFIELD, Artist.
ANTHONY COMSTOCK, New York.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., September 15, 1881.

MR. A. COMSTOCK:
I received a letter of inquiry and abuse combined concerning a gentleman of this city (Mr. William Wilson), purporting to hav emanated from you, or at least bearing your signature.

My testimony (to which you allude to and as published in the papers) was given unsolicited by Mr. Wilson, and I hereby reiterate the facts as published over my wife's and own signature. Further, I consider the WILSONIA appliances the marvel of the world as a curativ agency.

As regards the genealogy of Mr. Wilson I am not informed, neither do I care. Suffice to say, I know him to be a gentleman even though four years ago he stood knee deep in shavings behind a carpenter's bench, which, in my opinion, was and is far more preferable and honorable than striving to gain notoriety by defaming the character and ability of a superior, even though he be a poor cabinetmaker. Respectfully, T. DET. TRUAX.

NEW YORK, September 15, 1881.

MR. A. COMSTOCK:
I received your letter of inquiry on the WILSONIA Garments yesterday. As to the merit of the goods, I hav found them to be entirely as represented, and I take great pleasure in recommending them to all my friends and acquaintances who are sick and afflicted, knowing, as I do, their real worth. When I bought the goods of Mr. Wilson I did not question who his father or mother were, or what his business was some years ago, but I did ask about the goods, and that proving satisfactory, I bought them. However, I hav heard Mr. Wilson refer with pride to his being a mechanic working at the bench a few years ago. His name you will find to your satisfaction, William Cotter Wilson, in the directory. I am very truly yours,
GEORGE RIGBY,

61 WEST FORTY-SECOND STREET, N. Y., September 13, 1881.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK:
DEAR SIR—Your note of iuqury of the 10th duly received. Contents noted. In reply, most respectfully say, I hav no knowedge of Mr. Wilson's antecedents whatever, nor do I think it matters so far as I am concerned. But of the appliance known as the WILSONIA I do know something about it from personal and happy experience. For more than nineteen years I had been a sufferer from partial paralysis of my entire left side, and hearing of the WILSONIA I wrote Mr. Wilson to send some one to measure me for a suit. He did so, and in less than ten minutes from the time I had them on my body they produced a feeling that alarmed me. I called Mrs. Mansfield, told her I was feeling strangely, telling her at the same timr I had on one of the WILSONIA garments. Mrs. Mansfield insisted I should take it off. But in that we differed in opinion. She assisted me to the putting on of my top coat, and I made an attempt to get out into the park opposit my office. I walked two and a half times round the reservoir park without stopping, which for years before I had not walked more than one-fourth that distance without resting several times. In the evening I walked seven times around the park without resting, and from that time to this I hav been able to walk from two and a half to four miles each day. I am an old man of nearly 70 years, and so supple on my limbs I can jump over my office table or any chair in my house. I know nothing of Mr. Wilson's antecedents, as before stated. I only know he has been the instrument of making me a well man, and for that he has my thanks and blessing. Sincerely,
JAS. V. MANSFIELD.

MR. COMSTOCK:
DEAR SIR—In reading one of the morning papers I read your letter addressed to Mr. Wm. Wilson, also a large number from people I am personally acquainted with, in reference to the benefit derived by them from wearing the WILSONIA appliances, and would say I know them to be true statements of their cases. I myself am clothed in the goods, as also my wife. We hav both been greatly benefited by wearing them, and do not by any means consider either Mr. Wilson or his garments the fraud that you say in your letter as people having represented to you. You hav evidently been imposed upon.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:
SIR—I hold in my hand a note, epistolary, of which the following is a copy:

"607 WARREN ST., BROOKLYN, 9, 15, 1881.

"Professor C. HATCH SMITH:
"MY DEAR FRIEND—I inclose letter from Anthony Comstock, Esq. Please answer the same as you are acquainted with all the facts. Yours truly, CLARIBEL STEVENS."

The facts are as follows:

Mrs. Stevens, to whom your letter is addressed, wears a suit of WILSONIA. Her two living daughters (one is in heaven), one son, Mr. Theodore Stevens, and a grandson, Mr. E. G. Vail, Jr., each possesses and constantly wears a suit of WILSONIA.

All of these goods hav been purchased upon intimate knowledge of their curativ properties. Perhaps my wonderful cure of paralysis (hemiplegia) by wearing a suit of WILSONIA may hav influenced these purchases. These parties have received great benefit from wearing the WILSONIA, and they regard Mr. Wm. Wilson, "the carpenter," as a gentleman, a genius, and a man whose simple word is as good as a bond duly executed.

For evidence of my sickness I refer to my esteemed friends, Hon. James Watt, M.D., Doctors Bedell and Hamilton of Brooklyn, and Professor James L. Little, M.D., of New York.

For evident proof of my cure please call and see me. I will show you the dumb doctor WILSONIA that gave me freedom from disease of the heart, softening of the brain, rheumatism in the right hand and forearm, paralysis, and a pulse that intermitted one beat in five or seven or ten or three, etc.

Further, I will explain to your perception just how Doctor WILSONIA effects this magical cure. To wear WILSONIA is to get well of every form that disease may take. If I fail to prove this, notwithstanding your uncharitable epistle to Mrs. Stevens, I will obtain from William Wilson a handsome gratuity for your society. If you will become a WILSONIA missionary to the poor of New York you may stay the evils of vice and test WILSONIA in a Christlike frame of mind. They who evoke the law perish by the law. You will be no exception—or should be—to this fiat of Holy Writ.

SEPTEMBER 17, 1881.

MRS. SHAW, 325 EAST EIGHTY-FOURTH ST., N. Y.,
DEAR MADAME: I received your note yesterday, wishing to know as to my experience of the "WILSONIA" garments.

I hav had weakness in my back and loins upward of thirty years, often confined to bed for six and eight weeks at a time. I then used Davis & Kidder's Electric Machine, which partly relieved me, so that I could follow my occupation, but always felt the pain and weakness.

In 1876 I got paralyzed in my left side, when I was compelled to leave off work altogether.

In about a year my limbs commenced gaining strength. I could then open and close my left eye, but my back and loins never gathered strength. My feet and legs swelled almost to bursting. I was altogether confined to the house.

Having noticed the cures of the "WILSONIA" garments, I got a set at $103. I hav been now using them thirteen weeks and hav found great benefit. My limbs and back are greatly strengthened. I sleep and rest better than I ever did. My sight and hearing are greatly improved, and I think ultimately I will be cured as much as I can expect at my age.

I am 69 years of age, and weighed, when I commenced wearing the garments, 245 pounds. My weight is considerable less at present; my feet and legs do not pain me now, the swelling is reduced nearly to their former size.

My wife has rheumatism in her loin and leg, which prevent her from sleeping. I let her hav one of my pieces to lay on the place effected, which gives her great relief.

Such, dear madam, is my experience of "WILSONIA" garments.
Yours respectfully,
HENRY SCULLY,
223 East 120th street, Harlem, N. Y.

CLEARFIELD, PA., Sept. 22, 1881.

MR. ANTHONY COMSTOCK,
DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 10th instant came duly to hand, and at the first convenient opportunity I reply to the interrogations contained therein.

First. As to the merits of the "WILSONIA," I can only speak from my own experience. I was afflicted with varicose veins so that I had been confined to my bed for five weeks. I concluded to try Mr. Wilson's magnetic goods. The first appliance gave me great relief, and in three weeks I was able to attend to my business. I was also afflicted with asthma, and greatly to my surprise I was also entirely cured of that. In addition to the foregoing my general health is much improved, so that I am now ten pounds heavier than I hav been for years through the summer season.

The "WILSONIA" may be a "swindle," but, if so, I hav not discovered it. Swindles, in my opinion, are as likely to originate in Nassau as Eighth street.

Second. Has Dr. Wilson my "permission" to publish? Certainly, if the use of my name will do him or any one else any good, he is welcome to it. Hoping that the above may be satisfactory, I remain yours, frankly,
GEORGE THORN.

OFFICE OF THE MANHATTAN LIFE INSURANCE CO., 156 AND 158 BROADWAY. F. C. LILLIBRIDGE, AGENT FOR NEW YORK, BROOKLYN, AND HUDSON RIVER COS.

A. COMSTOCK, ESQ.,
DEAR SIR: Having seeu your letter denouncing WM. WILSON as a swindler and seen considerable in the papers relativ thereto I would say that I, too, am wearing the WILSONIA, having had a paralytic stroke six years ago. When I first had the stroke I was helpless as an infant, could not speak for eight days. I hav been wearing them since the 25th of June. My friend advised me to get them, but, really, I must confess I had but little faith in them. Had I known then what I know now, I would hav signed a bond for five thousand dollars if I could not receive the benefits from other sources, but what I would hav had them. I fully indorse Mr. WILSON, and do not believe him to be the fraud you represent him to be. It seems to me strange that you should hint at anything as to his antecedents. What has that to do with his invention? I hav several friends that look upon Mr. WILSON as their friend and benefactor, having restored them to health and appiness. Yours respectfully,
F. C. LILLIBRIDGE.

BROOKLYN, Sept. 27, 1881.

MR. COMSTOCK,
DEAR SIR: I received a number of days since a letter from you, asking concerning the WILSONIA garments—if I had tried them, and if I had given permission to publish my name in their connection, and other matter which I cannot now recall. I wore them for six months with most marvelous effect. I do not care to write the details, but will giv them to you in person at any time, as I hav gladly done to all applicants, though my permission as reference was never asked. Respectfully,
J. H. BARNEY.

2,310 THIRD AVE., N Y., Sept. 26, 1881.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.,
DEAR SIR: Miss Claribel Stevens hands me your letter of the 19th inst. for reply. I learned that you had addressed to William Wilson's patients a letter of apology and explanation, so that I ventured to request Mr. Wilson to let the whole subject drop. But, in your letter, you so utterly fail to rise to the importance of the issue, and so belittle the "noble cause," of which you are a recognized exponent, the first, knowing Mr. Wm. Wilson's high character for integrity and earnest love of truth; and, second, being alive to the necessity that a "public censor of vice" should stand before the people sans reproche, the question becomes hyper important; is it wise to pigeon hole the papers and relegate the issue to oblivion, as your letter, prima facie implies a desire on your part to accomplish?

Your will scarcely controvert that great men suffer wrong rather than do wrong, and that a Christian frankly acknowledges his fault. In the issue Wilson vs. Comstock as you hav seen fit to act upon neither of these, in marking out your policy in re, I respectfully ask you earnestly to consider the following propositions?

First. Is WILSONIA the greatest marvel of the nineteenth century?

Second. So far has WILSONIA cured ninety per centum of those who hav been the pioneers to invest money in it?

Third. Are the patients of William Wilson deserters from the great army of chronics, of which such men as Drs. Frank H. Hamilton, Agnew, Bliss, and their like are the officers? Deserters from "Ye men of high degree" to enlist under the banner of WILSONIA, the standard of ye "poor cabinet makers?"

Fourth. Has WILSONIA cured epilepsy, progressiv locomotory ataxia, mitral regurgitation of the heart, paralysis, varicose veins, prolapsus uteri, suppressed scarlet fever, consumption, rheumatism, pyæmia, and all other forms of disease?

Fifth. Is the great army of medical men at fault as to what causes blood circulation, and must their wiseacre idealism vanish as a mirage before the wand of a "Poor Cabinet Maker?"

Such, dear sir, are a few of the salient points in the issue raised, and I am certain the cause of true science will be conserved by a legal jurist in presence of the "Ermine" and

"GOD SAVE THE RIGHT."

If you are a true knight errant you will find WM. WILSON a foeman worthy of your steel.

And now, Mr. Comstock, please note the following; I put it on record here:

The life of James A. Garfield, autopsy facts and all taken into consideration, would, not might, hav been preserved, had Dr. Frank H. Hamilton granted my request, conveyed to him by letter in New York, and telegraphed to Washington. Had I the right to address the worthy doctor, knowing that WILSONIA would save Garfield's life? Let the facts say whether the doctor's silence was courteous. I hav known Hamilton from boyhood. My father, the late I. H. Smith, M.D. of Auburn, N. Y., was the friend of his youth. My grandfather, the late Dr. Goodwin, of Geneva, was one of the founders of the Geneva Medical College, which was moved to Buffalo. Dr. Hamilton has now on his shelves the cream of my late father's medical library, which I presented to him.

Dr. Hamilton's first step to fame was his call to the professorship of surgery at Buffalo. But WILSONIA was not to save Garfield. Hamilton will yet learn that it would hav saved his illustrious patient. It was not to be. God's purpose is declared Your obedient servant,
C. HATCH SMITH.

No. 330 CLERMONT AV., BROOKLYN, Sept. 27, 1881.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK:
In answer to your communication permit me to say, that, whether William Wilson be a cabinet maker or not he has helped me and my wife and daughter. I hav seen what the WILSONIA garments hav done outside of my family, and I can testify that there stands not to-day a man on earth who is doing more good for suffering humanity than this same William Wilson.

You hav not got marble white enough on which to carve his name, and to lay your hand on him in the glorious work he is now performing is to lay the hand of the vandal on the ark of the covenant of common sense in the temple of human health.

I am his friend, for he has been mine, and I only wish, if it should be your misfortune to suffer some of the ills that poor human flesh is liable to, that obeying injunction of the great Master, he may return good for evil by clothing you with the garments you say are a swindle, and that you, like St. Paul, may drop persecution and become an apostle of the new dispensation of health inaugurated by the man who was poor enough to work at the bench for his bread. I am respectfully,
THOMAS DUGGAN, Undertaker,

TO THE AGENT OF THE WILSONIA GARMENTS, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.,
DEAR SIR: I hav been wearing your garments for the past two months, am still wearing them, and I firmly believe they hav saved my life. Previous to wearing the garments I was suffering constant pain from fibroid tumor on the womb. Since using the garments I only hav pains once in a while, and the tumor is greatly reduced. I BELIEVE THEY WILL CURE ME, IF A CURE IS POSSIBLE. Please send me a number of circulars.
Yours truly, Mrs. LEE RUTAN.

REMARKABLE CURE OF RHEUMATISM.

BROOKLYN, Oct. 3, 1881.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.,
DEAR SIR: A few days ago I received a letter from you, and, owing to a little trouble in my family, I did not answer it, and now I take the first opportunity of doing so and reply to your inquiries. I may tell you that Mr. Wilson has my consent to use my name. I had been lying helpless to myself and family for three months, then I got the WILSONIA garments. I could not put them on myself; they were put on by a friend of mine, and, strange to say, after wearing them only ten days I was up and walking about, able to care for myself and family, and attend to my household duties. Therefore, I must say when all else failed the WILSONIA CURED. This is all I know about Mr. Wilson; he has been my best friend, and has my thanks and blessing; may good luck attend him and his. Good work will always prosper. I remain yours, etc.,
Mrs. MARY PLUMSEY, 161 Tillary street.

REMARKABLE RELIEF IN CASE OF LOCOMOTOR ATAXIA IN ONE WEEK.

325 HERKIMER ST., BROOKLYN, Oct. 10, 1881.

Prof. JAMES A. CARMICHAEL.
DEAR FRIEND: I did not see you last week when I called for those garments Mr. Wm. Wilsou was so generous in presenting to me, through your kind influence. I hav had the garments on one week, and I experience quite a perceptible benefit. This to me is very encouraging. In one month I believe others will notice my improvement. I am not able to jump over a table yet, but I hav no doubt but that I will in less than a year. I must acknowledge here that I hav received more permanent benefit in the past one week than I hav in all former experience with physicians. If these garments restore me to activity, which I hav no doubt of, I shall feel it my duty to proclaim to the public, personally or otherwise, what I know about the virtues of WILSONIA, in gratitude to Mr. Wm. Wilson. Very respectfully yours,
PHILIP H. O'NEILL.

Gems of Thought.

I BELIEVE in a power or principle that sits on reason's throne, whose scepter is justice and truth, and that there is a potency in matter which continually forms and creates new existences, new identities, new worlds, suns and stars, and unmakes the old, all with one impulse, fiat, or decree, as you may call it, or more properly, perhaps, necessity—cause and effect. Call this God if you will; names are of little moment except as we associate ideas with them. This new God that I hav found has no "chosen people" to reward, no enemies to punish, nor is he ever angry or revengeful. An angry God, who would sacrifice his own son, to appease his wrath against creatures of his own making, is no longer a God whom I can love and worship.—Elmina D. Slenker.

THERE is no learned man but will confess that he hath been much purified by reading controversies—his senses awakened, his judgment sharpened, and the truth which he holds more firmly established. If, then, if it be profitable for him to read, why should it not at least be tolerable and free for his adversary to write? In logic they teach that contraries laid together more evidently appear. It follows, then, that, all controversy being permitted, falsehood will appear more false and truth the more true; which must needs conduce much to to the general confirmation of unimplicit truth. —Milton.

THERE is a sufficient recompense in the very consciousness of a noble deed.—Cicero.

WHEN there is a great deal of smoke and no clear flame, it argues much moisture in the matter, yet it witnesseth certainly that there is fire there; and therefore dubious questioning is a much better evidence than that senseless deadness which most men take for believing. Men that know nothing in sciences hav no doubts. He never truly believed who was not first made sensible and convinced of unbelief.—Coleridge.

NOBODY loves discrepancy for the sake of discrepancy. But a person who conscientiously believes that free inquiry is, on the whole, beneficial to the interests of truth, and that, from the imperfection of the human faculties, wherever there is much free inquiry there will be some discrepancy, may, without impropriety, consider such discrepancy, though in itself an evil, as a sign of good.—Macaulay.

ALL that a man does is physiognomical of him. You may see how a man would fight by the way in which he sings; his courage, or want of courage, is visible in the word he utters, in the opinion he has formed, no less than in the stroke he strikes. He is one, and preaches the same self abroad in all these ways.—Carlyle's Hero-Worship.

THROUGHOUT the whole of the Decalogue we find no mention whatever of justice or right, no idea whatever of the modern sentiment of duty, no information concerning a man's duty to himself.—W. P. Ball's Ten Commandments.

MY father was a man singularly free from affectation. The feeling that he had not he could in no wise pretend to hav; however ill the want of it might look, he simply would not put on the show of it.—Carlyle's Reminiscences.

IN what he wrote on church government Bacon showed, as he dared, a tolerant and charitable spirit. He troubled himself not at all about Homoousians and Homoiousians, Monothelites and Nestorians. He lived in an age in which disputes on the most subtle points of divinity excited an extreme interest throughout Europe, and nowhere more than in England. He was placed in the very thick of the conflict. He was in power at the time of the Synod of Dort, and must for months hav been daily deafened with talk about "election, reprobation, and final perseverance." Yet we do not remember a line in his works from which it can be inferred that he was either a Calvinist or an Armenian.—Macaulay.

WE ought to make a collection or particular history of all monsters and prodigious births or productions, and, in a word, of everything new, rare, and extraordinary in nature. But this must be done with the most severe scrutiny, lest we depart from truth. Above all, every relation must be considered as suspicious which depends, in any degree, upon religion, as the prodigies of Livy, etc.; and no less so, everything that is to be found in the writings of natural magic or alchemy, or such authors, who seem, all of them, to hav an unconquerable appetite for falsehood and fable.—Bacon's Novum Organum.

LET us examin the Pentateuch—five books of Moses—according to the principles of the pretended Christians, not as the word or testimony of God himself, but as the production of a mere human writer and historian. Here, then, we are first to consider a book, presented to us by an ignorant and barbarous people, written in an age when they were still more barbarous, in all probability, long after the facts which it relates, corroborated by no concurring testimony, and resembling those fabulous accounts which every nation givs of its origin. Upon reading this book, we find it full of prodigies and miracles. It givs an account of a state of the world and of human nature entirely different from the present; of our fall from that state; of the age of men extended to near a thousand years; of the destruction of the world by a deluge; of the arbitrary choice of one people as the favorits of heaven, and that people the countrymen of the author; of their deliverance from bondage by prodigies the most astonishing imaginable. Can any rational man believe all this?—Hume's Essay on Miracles.

NEVERTHELESS, lest we should offend them, go thou to the sea, and cast an hook, and take up the fish that first cometh up; and when thou hast opened his mouth, thou shalt find a piece of money; that take and giv unto them for me and thee (Matt. xvii, 27). "I should not believe such a story, were it told me by Cato," was a proverbial saying in Rome, even during the lifetime of that philosophical patriot. The incredibility of a fact, it was allowed, might invalidate so great an authority.—Hume's Essay on Miracles.

Odds and Ends.

"IF the devil got his due, Pat, where would you be?" "Alone, yer riverence."

TOM HOOD'S most successful poem was the "Song of the Shirt." A great many American poets don't sing that sort of a song, because the subject is in use seven days in the week, and it hasn't time to be sung about.

IN a Highland village the bellman one day made this announcement, "O yes, O yes, O yes, ye mun a' tak' notice, that there will pe nae Lord's day here next Sawbeth, pecause the laird's wife wants the kirk to dry her claes in!"

"A LARGE part of our happiness," says Mr. Beecher, "is due to our mistakes." The printer who got bounced for setting up "infernal" reception for "informal" reception may coincide with Mr. Beecher, but we doubt it.

DID'ST ever thou gaze on a lovely maid,
All glorious, radiant, fair,
And think as thou saw'st those rich, red lips
Of the "unkissed kisses" there?

Because, if thou did'st not, this is a good time to begin'st.—Steubenville Herald.

"WAS it the drum major brave?" asked one soldier of another. "Of course," said the other; "how can I get up the necessary excitement if fife nothing to stir me?" "Oh, well, a man musket courage somehow," said the first;" "I suppose most any one cannon occasion." "Yes, that is the general order, and I'm a bayonet," said the other, "though I wish I'd never be gun."

HISTORY OF LITTLE JOHNNY.

Little Johnny went to view
The circus and the flip-flap flippers,
Johnny tried the flip-flap, too.
Now he wears the golden slippers.
While they turned these things at will,
In the air or anywheres,
Johnny turned one higher still,
Turned clear up the golden stairs.

WAIL OF THE ÆSTHETE.

Oh, sweet is the whang of the wanglewane,
And the snore of the snark in the twilight pale,
As the krail crawls up the window pane—
(Love me, love, in the growsome gale.)

Gone is the wanglewane, weird and weld,
Down to the gate of the nether land,
Where the horned-toads glide and the musty mold
Eats the lily in my lost love's hand.

There he is galloping, ghastly green—
(Blue is the blare of the wobbly wang;)
He is tangling her cardinal hair, I ween—
(Sweet is the song the wild snail sang.)

There are jabberwocks joggling in the east,
And were-wolves howling in the North and West,
(Oh, the goblin crew has a goodly feast,)
And the poet now takes an æsthetic rest.

Hosscar Whit Wildman.

RECENTLY an old darkey was overheard praying over a bag of corn he had just stolen in this wise: "Oh, Lordy God, I'se jes' been and stole a bushel of corn from dat mean man, John Williams' patch, d—— him, an' I axes your pardon. He's got a plenty, an' so has I, but he won't pay me for my work, so good Lord overlook dis little transgress and keep dem from finding it out, for I wants to steal some more, and when I goes to steal help me to get something nice, like you did dem children of Isralum, when you stole dem from de bondage of Egyptium, and I'll be mighty glad. And, oh, Lordy God, if dey find out dat I stole dis corn help me to prove dat Tom Connally, dat black rascal, sole it to me, for Christ's sake. Amen."

THE other evening the jester was bathing his eyes in cold water, and suspended the operation long enough to remark:

"If a woman can't take her parasol to heaven when she dies, she won't be happy there. She will come back after it."

An impressiv quiet followed this dogmatic statement, and the parasols of the court knew some of them were in for it.

"We were driving this afternoon," the aggrieved jester resumed, "and the Princess kindly shaded my head with her parasol. It was very kind indeed. It limited my views of the country, at times, to my knees and the dashboard of the wagon. Whenever we met a team, especially if the road was very narrow, the Princess lowered her parasol between myself and the passing wagon, so that I turned out by faith, or stood on my head to catch a glimpse of the colliding wheels. When we started down a steep hill, she dropped the parasol between me and the horses, and I trusted to the good sense of the animals to keep out of the ditch. When we met any acquaintances to whom I wished to bow, she knocked my hat into my eyes. When she would point my admiring gaze to some exquisitly tinted autumn leaves, she jabbed a projecting parasol rib into my eye. When she turned to speak to any one in the rear seat, she rasped the back of my neck. Oft as the carriage struck a stone or lurched over a rut, she prodded my long-suffering head with vicious little jabs. I drew my head down between my shoulders and sat crouched and bent, but the remorseless parasol still pursued me. I hav been pelted and rasped and prodded, and all from a mistaken sense of kindness. A woman's unselfishness and kindness of heart always prompt her to hold her parasol over the man who drives. And if the man who drives is allowed to choose for himself, he chooses sunstroke in preference to the parasol every time. I do not complain, mind you. I merely make a simple statement of plain fact; any man who has had to drive a pair of horses while some gentle-hearted woman held a parasol over him knows what I hav suffered. And when she holds an umbrella, it is infinitly worse. Then the man is utterly and hopelessly extinguished, and the material world is to him only a wild, blank chaos of alpaca and whalebone."

But here her serene highness closed the debate by deciding that the nose caught it, but the eyes had it, and without appealing from the decision of the chair, the house adjourned.—Burlington Hawkeye.

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."
This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.
This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

"The Gods and Other Lectures."
CONTENTS.—"The Gods," "Humboldt," "Thomas Paine," "Individuality," "Heretics and Heresies." Price cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

"The Ghosts and Other Lectures."
CONTENTS.—"The Ghosts," "Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child," "Declaration of Independence," "Farming in Illinois," "Speech at Cincinnati," "The Past Rises Before Me Like a Dream." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.
Both volumes bound in one, price, paper, $1.00.

"What Must We Do to be Saved?"
"Interpolations are the foundation stones of every orthodox church." Thoroughly revised and corrected by the author. Price, 25 cents.

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.
BY JAMES PARTON.
With Portraits and other Illustrations.
This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.
Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.
A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.
Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.
Spermatorrhea and Impotency,
as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an
EXTERNAL APPLICATION,
which is the doctor's last and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Failing Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.
SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.
Middle-Aged and Old Men.
There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.
☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.
PRIVATE COUNSELOR.
Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]
Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, his system based upon scientific fact."
[From the (Mo.) Liberal.
The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 8. No. 46. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. | New York, Saturday, November 12, 1881. | SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. | $3 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

FATHER O'BRIEN, a Roman Catholic pastor of Milwaukee, and the Rev. Theodore Fossett, a Methodist pastor of Sacramento, hav been arrested for public drunkenness.

A DISRESPECTFUL theological student in Shiloh Baptist Seminary wrote an essay on "The Efficacy of Baptism in an Oil-cloth Suit." For this he was turned out of the seminary.

THE Presbyterian Synod, composed of delegates from presbyteries in the adjoining parts of Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi, admitted a negro for several years, but in the present session the question of excluding him was raised, and a majority voted to turn him out. This action was based solely on his color.

A PENNSYLVANIA Presbyterian danced a waltz, and, showing no contrition for the deed, was expelled from membership. Being a lawyer, and controversially inclined, he appealed the case to the Presbytery, which has sustained the expulsion. This is an authoritativ reaffirmation that it is sinful for a Presbyterian to waltz. A total abstinence from waltzing by all Presbyterians may now be looked for—but not seen.

THE following interesting question is raised by a reader of the New York Sun: "The chaplain of the Yorktown celebration read his prayer from manuscript. Now, this is what I want you to tell me: Did that prayer go up to heaven when it was written, which was the time when its author conceived and expressed it, or did it go up when it was formally voiced by the clergyman?" To which the editor replies: "There are some things which we do not know, and can't find out."

MR. D. M. BENNETT, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, having spent a week in Ireland in his Round-the-World trip, arrives at the conclusion that "priestcraft, whisky, landlordism, and too much baby" is what ails the Emerald Isle. Every woman married has all the babies she can hav, and that is about twenty. God and Moses! who would hav twenty "spalpeens" crying for whisky, mass, and potatoes all at once! We would hate to begin the world over with an Irish woman for a wife—"faith and we would."—Cloud County Blade.

MR. VENNOR'S weather guess for this month is that it will enter cold and decidedly wet, but that this condition will suddenly giv place after the first week to open and genial weather again nearly everywhere, with a disappearance of frosts even in northern New York and Canada for a period. "We may expect," he says, "some of the finest—at any rate most enjoyable—weather of the season during this month at New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Washington." Look out for a very disagreeable November after this prediction of the blundering Vennor!

MR. HENRY S. OLCOTT, President of the Theosophical Society, has published at the society's press in Colombo, Ceylon, a "Buddhist Catechism," which is stated on the title page to hav been "approved and recommended for use in Buddhist schools by Hikkaduwa Sumangala," the distinguished high priest of Adam's Peak, and principal of the Widyodaya Parivena, the training college for Buddhist recluses in Ceylon. None would hav ventured to predict a few years ago that the authoritativ statement of Buddhist doctrin to be used as a text book in Buddhist schools would be written in English and by an American, and that it would be so largely a compilation, as this is acknowledged in the preface to be, from the works of Mr. Rhys, Davids, Bishop Brigandet, and other European scholars. This little work, which can be purchased for a few pence, will giv to those interested in such questions a trustworthy statement of what the Ceylon Buddhists of to-day hold to be the essential points of their religion. It is instructiv to notice how completely and frankly the latest teachings of science are accepted and indorsed in this catechism for Buddhist children; and how they are taught to repeat, on the authority of the archbishop of their faith, that Buddhism, like every other religion that has existed many centuries, contains untruth mingled with truth. Even gold is found mixed with dross.—London Academy.

OF what use are the missionaries? The Flandre Liberale puts this question, and answers it by the following facts: "The Times has a correspondent traveling through Canada in the suite of the Governor-General, the Marquis of Lorne, who thus remarks upon the subject of the red-skins whom he has seen in his travels: 'The agent under whose charge they are speaks of them in favorable terms, at least of those who still remain heathens. He has not so good an opinion of those who hav embraced Christianity. He thinks the latter hav adopted the vices more readily than the virtues of the whites. I regret to add that this is the general opinion among Europeans who hav seen them, with the single exception of the missionaries themselvs.' We may add that all those who hav visited India and Asia make similar statements in regard to the facts in those countries."

THE controversy which has long been raging between ex-missionary Samuel D. Hinman and Bishop Hare of the Episcopal diocese of Niobrara has at last culminated in open legal warfare. Mr. Hinman has brought suit against Bishop Hare in the Supreme Court, laying his damages for defamation of character at $25,000. Bishop Hare claims that Mr. Hinman's character was never worth so much, and that, whatever it was worth, he did it no damage by certain pamphlets which he issued. Bishop Hare's pamphlets charged Hinman with the most revolting crimes. Hinman's pamphlets charge the Bishop with malicious and unfair dealing. An ecclesiastical court was some time ago organized to try this troublesome case, but it failed to act. Mr. Hinman's missionary career extended over a pe.iod of seventeen years, and was brought to a conclusion when Bishop Hare suspended him in 1878. Eminent counsel hav been engaged, and a lively fight is expected.

HAYES'S RIDE.

Out from the West on the Sabbath day,
Bringing the Norwichers fresh dismay.
A spirited steed through the village bore
A pair at the rate of 2:40 or more,
Telling the age of good morals was o'er,
With Rutherford breaking the Sabbath day.

The flew to the windows, they flocked to the doors,
They peeped through the blinds of the dwellings and stores,
The mother turned pale as she thought of her son,
And the prudent Miss Prim was completely undone;
For alas an alack that any should say
It was Rutherford breaking the Sabbath day.

Miss Prudence Persimmons and Priam Patrition
Were wending their way from the afternoon mission,
When fancy their horror on reaching the cross
Roads to be nearly run over by two men and a hoss!
O woe for the heathen of Djokjokartay,
With Rutherford breaking the Sabbath day!

In a quiet confab Mr. Seasongood Slick,
And Timothy Tittlebat Trumpeter Trick,
Were busy in planning some nice civil service,
When all of a start they grew dreadfully nervous,
As they glanced at the street, where they saw with dismay,
Their Rutherford breaking the Sabbath day.

The Puritan saint as he heard the rude tread
Was fain to arise from his sanctified bed;
But his bones were so shaken with holy affright,
They refused to be joined to each other aright.
When Gabriel blows there may be sore delay
From Rutherford's breaking the Sabbath day.

O Rutherford B., in your nobby turnout,
Did you think yourself back on that famous Star route?
Or, just for the time, did you mount to the heaven
Of that storied hand-shaking of '77?
Pray answer, and check all who're going astray
From Rutherford's breaking the Sabbath day!

THE Rev. Plato Johnson seems to hav had an experience with some of the so-called popular preachers of this section of the country. Recently he said to his people, who congregated in unusual numbers at the prayer-meeting to welcome home their venerable and venerated pastor: "My belubbed bredren, dere's two great pleasures in dis life—de pleasure ob goin' away an' de pleasure ob gittin' back agin. De fust I had a week ago, wen I started fer New York to git pints in pulpit eloquence from de great preachers ub de time, an' de second I'm havin' now, wen I can fall right down on yer warm, big heart and feel dat I'm to home. Amongst de udder folks dat I wanted to see was Brudder Talmage, an' I heard him. Dats a preacher fer yer! Why, talk 'bout bein' in earnest, dat man's got 'thusiasm so bad dat he's boun' to save souls, even ef, as St. Paul says, he's got to make a fool ob himself to do it. It jus' made me open my ole eyes, bredren, to hear dat man holler de gospel. He don' care what he says, nor how he says it; an' when he gits a full head ob holy steam on nobody can tell what's goin' to happen. Dat 'ticlar Sunday he prayed for rain jest as though all he had to do was to jog de Lord's mem'ry, an' de Lord would turn an' say, 'Dat's so, Talmage; I done forgot all 'bout it, an' am 'bliged to yer for mindin' me; I'll turn de rain right on fer shore,' an' de fust ting dat come to my mind was, 'Well, ole man, dis preacher's 'rangin' for rain right off, an' you've left yer umbrell to home.' I fully spected to get wet through, but somehow I didn't. Brudder Talmage is de only man in de 'varsal worl' dat kin convert people by makin' 'em believe dat 'ligion has a funny side to it. I don' understan' it, but ob course it must be all right. At any rate, de nex' night I went to see de minstrels wid a frien' who didn' tole me de 'zact truth. He said he wanted me to hear some ob de ole plantation songs by men who had been colored fer de purpuss, an' not by de Lord. I didn' know it was a theater, but I went, an' I has repented ub it, an' been forgibben, an' it's all right. Well, belubbed, I had a good time, but I didn' hev half so good a time an' I didn' laff half so much as I did at Brudder Talmage. Put de minstrels an' Brudder Talmage side by side at the same price, an' I would go to hear Brudder Talmage twice out ob three times; cos you not only git de good laff, but dere's a certain 'mount ob 'ligious 'pression thrown in, jess as de wideawake grocers throw in a chromo wen yer buys two pound ob coffee 'stead ob one. I don't mean to say dat dere is 'nuff 'ligion to spile de fun, but I do mean to say dat wen you'se got home again, an' is 'peatin' to yer wife de jokes dat was made it suddenly 'curs to you dat it was a 'ligious meetin' after all, an' dat dere orter be a pious 'pression left on yer mind. Brudder Talmage is a good man, but it sometimes 'curs to me dat wen he was manufactured de Lord spent 'bout half an hour more dan was necessary makin' his mouf. Under such circumstances somfin is boun' to suffer, for wen de Lord sorter lingers ober one orgin he generally hurries up wid auodder, an' it sometimes 'curs to me dat de Lord spent too much time on de mouf an' too little on de brain. I don' say dat, but de debbil sometimes puts it into my ole head. Brudder Talmage is good whar he is, but he ain't de right sort ob preacher for de colored population ob de Souf, which is very 'vangelican, an' don't want no jimnastics."

THE INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS.—SIXTH SITTING, TUESDAY MORNING, 11 A. M.

The delegates again met in the Minor Hall, Dr. Büchner in the chair. The balance-sheet was read and approved. It was proposed, seconded, and carried after a long discussion, that the following addition be made to Rule XVII. ("The present rules shall only be changed by the decision of a Congress, by the vote of a majority of members"): "and notice of such alteration must be sent to the General Council three months before the meeting of the Annual Congress, and must be forwarded by the Council to each affiliated society. In case of emergency, such case to be decided by the Congress, alterations may be made without such previous notice having been given, by a two-thirds majority of the nations represented at the Congress."

It was proposed, seconded, and carried, that it be an instruction to the Council "that the openers of discussion and readers of papers upon selected subjects at the Congress shall be limited to thirty minutes of speech, that speakers taking part in the discussion shall be limited to ten minutes, that no speaker shall be allowed to speak on the same subject more than once, except the opener of the discussion, who shall be allowed ten minutes in reply."

A long discussion took place on the question of printing the report of the proceedings, and it was decided to instruct the Council to issue a French edition if funds permitted.

The decision of questions to be on the order of the day for the Congress of 1882 was next brought forward. It was proposed, seconded, and carried that there be two theoretical and two practical questions discussed. Nine questions were put to the vote, and it was decided that the theoretical questions should be: "The effect of Christianity upon the world." "Will the coming man need a religion?" Practical, "The oath question in various countries." "The best methods of propaganda."

SEVENTH SITTING, TUESDAY, 7:30 P.M.

The president took the chair at 7:30, and called on Mr. Symes to open the evening discussion, which dealt with the right of the state over education and religious societies.

Mr. Foote in the main concurred with what had been said by Mr. Symes. That the state had a right and a duty to teach was beyond discussion. That is practically agreed to in most, if not all, civilized countries. The most important point is as to the matters the state has a right to teach. Mr. Symes says it should teach morality, but not religion. If this principle is reduced to practice difficulties arise. Every teacher is not qualified to instruct in morality. If children do not have moral lessons from their parents they will, it is to be feared, have few of any value. It is not enough to say, "You must and you must not." The inquiry comes, "Why?" The sanction of morality presses for consideration. Theologians give "the will of God." We give "usefulness to society." As this question of the sanction lies at the basis of the whole matter, it will be impossible in a school to teach morality to the satisfaction of everyone until the nature of the sanction is determined. We cannot, therefore, question the right of the state to teach religion if we give it the right to teach morality. Hence morality must be learned at home. We have in England state schools and voluntary schools. In the former religion is taught, but is not compulsory. Under the Education act, Clause 7, the child can be withdrawn from such teaching by the parents, and as the Education Council is strictly just, the fault of non-withdrawal lies with the parents only. He was in favor of voluntary schools also, as there was thus more chance of independent training. The example of Prussia, where there are no voluntary schools, was not encouraging. So little of individual enterprise resulted. He quoted Mill as to the state's right to insist upon an effective education, and as to its non-right to interfere if parents obtain that from voluntary schools, though it might insist upon the teachers reaching a certain standard. The state has no further right to interfere with the property and discipline of volun tary schools than it has with any corporate property whatever. The time is approaching when it will claim the right to regulate all property left in trust, where often money is left for a purpose rather than for persons. As to convents and monasteries, there ought to be a certain mature age fixed, before which it should be criminal to induce any one to embrace the monastic life. The buildings should never be closed against state inspection. At present the priests only are the inspectors, and we all remember the three divisions of Sydney Smith of men, women, and clergymen. Considering the condition of society to-day, we must win certain instalments and retain them, and at last the Freethinking and republican goal will be reached, when religion will be left to the conscience of the individual. Teaching must refer only to those things on which all are agreed as having to do with the senses, and as being indisputable by all who possess a sound mind in a sound body.

Mr. J. Swaagman, as secretary, read a paper from Mr. Holyoake, "The Right of Teaching."

Mr. Bradlaugh desired to say a few words on the subjects before the Conference. He was not of opinion that the state should exercise any control over religious communities that it did not exercise over private houses. If there were improper detention, then the state had the right and duty of interference. This duty was neither greater nor less because a religious body was concerned. It was said that girls should be hindered from entering convents, boys from entering monasteries. Admitted. But how? Not by using legal compulsion, but by changing the tendency of thought among the people. It was the aim of Freethinkers to free religion from state control, and to bring public opinion to bear upon it. A habeas corpus applied equally to a private dwelling or a convent; the right of inspection should be the same; Freethinkers should not help to swell an ultra-Protestant cry raised against Roman Catholics to-day, but perhaps against themselves to-morrow. No one was more opposed than he was to the Roman church; he believed it to be the greatest foe to progress and to liberty that Europe had ever known, that America would ever know; but it was a blunder to desire to war against it with weapons of the law; fight it with brain, but never with statute. If we admit the right to control one voluntary association, where shall we stop? On the question of education he desired to impress upon all parents that it was their own fault if their children received religious instruction; they were protected by the seventh clause of the Education act, and the authorities were loyal in carrying it out; if parents, to avoid "bother," allowed injury to their children, they should remember that it is not the law that is to blame, but their own negligence and carelessness. A remarkable attempt has been made in the House of Commons to induce the House to interfere unfairly in education; there was a department which gave aid to education, and certain rules were laid down as to the conditions on which that aid should be granted. A certain railway director and chairman of companies had given notice that this hall was not a proper place to teach sciences in; that a Fellow of University College, and a Doctor of Science of London University, was not a proper teacher of science; that a lady who had already passed the necessary standard at South Kensington, as well as the preliminary scientific examination at the London University, was not fit to teach; and that, without condescending to give any particulars in support of the allegation, no member of the Bradlaugh family should be permitted to teach. He did not think that the state would control education in the terms of that resolution. He felt strongly on this matter, because of the importance of thorough teaching; *un*learning had to many of them been the chief difficulty. As president of the National Secular Society, he desired to give a word of thanks to the delegates who had traveled so far to be present there, and he trusted he might be able to repeat it on some future occasion. Whatever faults their country had, at least it had been open to all. Here people from all lands might discuss fearlessly; they were always welcome, and would receive a patient hearing. We knew the debt we owed to other lands: we hoped we also had strength to aid freedom. We hav been glad to have had Prof. Büchner, patiently presiding over our deliberations, and hope he will come to us at some future time, to aid here in the work he has so helped in his own country. One good comes of organization; we can giv publicity all over the country to what is done here; we can publish all distinct thought wherever it may come from, and (turning to Dr. Büchner) men in pit, men in factory, men in shop will listen to you as thoroughly as if they were philosophers. We have at least learned to get rid of one folly; nature has divided men, but Freethought joins them, and places humanity above nationality; we have learned to see in the wise of all lands not foreigners, but workers for the redemption of our common humanity. The International Conference has indeed been really international, bringing men and women together from either side of the Atlantic. Through those from the other side present here to-day, I would send word of greeting to those, who speaking the same tongue, sharing the same literature, seem to us as of our family, dearer than men of other lands. We send them message that our struggle is the same as theirs, and we pray them to give their genius, their inventive faculty, which are of greater value than those know who have not seen them, to link the New World to the Old and help us. In every country we must work to make our union strong, communicating continually, giving to each the advantages of all. Then shall the International Freethought Association serve to paralyze the church and to knit men together in truth and love.

Dr. Büchner, as president, rose to close the Conference. He said that we stood at the end of our work and of our Congress, and he would throw a glance backward at the work that had been done. He thought that we could do so with the consciousness that on the whole the work had been well done. We had performed the task set us by our predecessors to the best of our means and of our abilities. They had given us questions to discuss in brief space on which books, nay, on which libraries, had been written; we did not, therefore, pretend to have discussed them fully; it was not so much in the amount as in the spirit in which the work was done that we might fairly rejoice. We had kept nothing back; we had not hidden our thought, nor been afraid to speak out honestly that which we believed to be true. We have not, like Lord Shaftesbury, said that "all wise men were of the same religion," and when asked what that religion was, answered, "No wise man says." We have spoken openly, boldly, frankly, and have endeavored to destroy darkness and to bring science to bear upon old traditions. Schopenhauer has said, "Religions are like glow-worms; they need darkness to shine in." We have tried to lighten the darkness in which the glow-worms of error and of superstition shine. I thank specially the audience for the hearty sympathy they have shown; the work could not have been done so smoothly save for the help and the patience given by the audience to readers and speakers. I thank you in the name of all the delegates who have come from so far to meet and to work. I trust that next year we may meet again personally, without exception, and I close this Congress with gratitude and with hope.

The Congress adjourned until September, 1882.

Now, friends, I have wearied you long enough. I must now leave my kind friends in London and hie myself to the Continent and the East. I bid you good-bye.

D. M. B.

AMSTERDAM, Oct. 5, 1881.

DEAR FRIENDS: Before I leave England entirely I will just say a few words more. I have criticised her weather somewhat severely, but I have been compelled to revise my opinion more or less with respect to it. For the past ten days we have had nice weather, with very little rain; and not wishing to do the weather clerk of Queen Vic's realm too great injustice, I am constrained to acknowledge it. It is settled in my mind that it is possible to have a week together in England without rain. But I am not so sure about fog. On several of these rainless days the fog has been dense and continued so till noon.

I will mention my visit to Guild Hall, the headquarters of the mayor and corporation authorities. The large hall in the edifice is where mass meetings are held for various purposes, especially in honor of distinguished foreigners. (Not a word has been said, however, about holding a meeting here on my account.) It has several statues and paintings of those whom England delights to honor. Connected with the establishment is a free library, which the public can have access to, with a large reading room and fine accommodations for copying. In the corridors are many cases containing antique books, printed during the early years of the art preservative. Some of them are very curious. Here also are many original documents, such as deeds and other instruments, executed several hundred years ago, and numerous letters written by distinguished men and noted authors. In the basement of the building is an interesting museum containing many of the articles, tools, and implements used by the Romans during their occupancy of London and the surrounding country nineteen hundred years ago. The pottery ware is not as fine as is gotten up at the present time, but displays ingenuity and workmanship. I saw several cinerary urns for containing the ashes of the cremated dead. One still has ashes and pieces of bones in it. The lamps they used to have in those days were not as fine as our richest lamps, but probably answered a good purpose. The bronze instruments of many kinds are much corroded. Various samples of pocket knives used in the olden times are still preserved, but they are not as pretty specimens of mechanical skill as Rogers's best cutlery. These numerous articles have been found at different times in making excavations within the limits of the old city, and they bring pretty vividly to mind the times that long since passed by.

I was very much interested in the massive bones of mastodons, mammoths, and elephants, and other animals which have been excavated in different parts of Great Britain. They come down from times infinitely more remote than the Roman period. It is thought they must be 150,000 or 200,000 years old. At the very slow rate at which the poles and the equator of the earth change it must have been very, very long ago when this country was warm enough for those animals to flourish in it. Some learned men think it was before the last glacial period, which of itself is believed to have continued one hundred thousand years. How little, indeed, the writer of Genesis knew of the age and history of this planet!

On the same day I visited the National Gallery, and wandered through its numerous large rooms filled with the best productions of Turner, Landseer, Rubens, and many others of the best masters. As there is enough in this gallery to study over for a month, no one will expect me to give much of a description of it from a two hours' visit. I will not attempt it. Suffice it to say the establishment contains many of the best pictures in the world, for some of which as high as $75,000 was paid.

I paid very little attention to the Methodist Ecumenical Council, which held its two weeks' session in London during the early part of my stay there, and in which the United States was represented by some fourteen colored bishops and clergymen, and as many or more of the white brethren. They of course did a large amount of praying and a still larger amount of talking, but whether it all amounted to anything is very doubtful. They made it a special order of business for several days to pray for Garfield. How much those special prayers effected is now too well known. A long discussion was held as to whether the church should allow its members to read novels; some thought they should be forbidden altogether, while others thought they should be allowed, as many novels taught good moral lessons, and belonged to a class of reading many are fond of. Others again thought some novels should be prohibited and some allowed. So I presume people will continue to do about as they please whether to read a novel or not. I saw several of the delegates from the United States at the hotel I stopped at when I first came to the city. Some of both colors stopped there; and when they learned that I was an Ingersoll kind of man, they turned up their eyes in holy horror and wondered why God suffers me to live. My opinion is that God thinks just as much of me as he does of them, that he is just as willing I should live on for fifteen or twenty years longer as that they should and that he will leave nature to turn my gas off unless something before befalls me.

I did not attend the noisy Rev. Spurgeon's tabernacle, though I saw the exterior of it. It is a very large, plain-looking edifice, without a spire, with some half a dozen large columns in front, making it look far more like a city hall or court-house than a church. The building holds six or eight thousand people and is sometimes filled. The man has got his name up, and he draws like a blister plaster, though he is not a man of mueh real ability. Probably he is something like D. L. Moody—he can roar like a bull, but it is not easy for him to talk good hard sense, or to utter what he has to say in an able manner. I preferred on the last Sunday evening in London to hear my friend Robert Forder give a lecture at the Walworth Secular Society Hall in the southern part of London. This hall was completely filled. His subject was, "Is Christianity New or True?" He proved very conclusively that it is neither.

I hope you will not think I left England because of the arrival of Moody and Sankey, who have made another starring visit to England, with the hope, doubtless, of winning a few souls to Jesus, and taking back a thousand pounds or so of the coin of the realm. I place the souls before the coin, but I am not sure that Moody and Sankey put them in that order in their heart of hearts. They did extremely well financially when they were here before, and it is not unlikely that they are willing to have another time of refreshing the coming winter. It is very nice to work for Jesus when it pays well.

I left London, probably never to see it again, last night at seven o'clock. My friends John S. Dryden and Samuel and George Standring accompanied me to the railway station and saw me off. I could not ask for better friends, and have every reason to hold them a long time in fond remembrance.

As I am now taking my leave of England, a word or two by way of parting reflections may not be out of place. England is a great country—very great for its size. No person can take a review of what England has accomplished in the way of extending her rule over the world, by disseminating intelligence and liberal institutions, in fostering a spirit of enterprise, and in accumulating half of the wealth of the world, without deciding that she is in a great many respects one of the first nations in existence. She of course has her faults, as all nations have, but they are not more serious than those of other nations. She rules with a heavy hand the colonies, provinces, and dependencies over which she has extended her dominion, but with all her severity she has carried forward civilization and prosperity. The English-speaking people are now the masters of the world and must continue to be. May they dispense the happiest and freest forms of government, the highest and best systems of civilization.

England has several reforms to effect before she will occupy the proud position among the nations of the earth which she should. She should do away with her sham royalty and take the grand position of the equality of humanity. Birth should not continue to be the measure of honor and wealth, but worth and effort should confer these.

England's system of land tenure must be greatly changed. A few favored lords, the descendants of the old feudal barons and dukes, should not continue to own all the land, and the tillers of the soil have no share in its ownership. No man should be allowed o be owner of more land than he is able to properly cultivate. So far as possible, all classes should be placed upon an equality.

England should make a great reform in the use of intoxicating liquors. I am sure she now makes a more general and extensive use of them than any other nation in the world. It cripples her influence for good work; it degrades her morals; it produces the most abject poverty on the part of thousands; it shortens life and greatly lessens the welfare and prosperity of the people. A crop of apostles of temperance is needed in England, and every person who has the future greatness of England at heart should seek to make the imbibing of intoxicating drinks disreputable among the higher classes, the middle classes, and the lower classes. This may be too much to expect of the people of England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, but they must achieve it, or fail to reach the elevated position and the general prosperity they are capable of.

England should rid herself of priestcraft and the shams of theology. They are expensive incubuses that bear down mercilessly upon the masses and cause them to believe the most absurd falsehoods and to munificently sustain their promoters. Great Britain has over thirty thousand priests; and to sustain the state religion and the other churches costs the people some hundreds of millions of dollars annually—a burden most unremunerative and uncompensating. England is under a pitiable subserviency to the theological machinery that burdens the world, which it must learn to throw off before it can be truly free. But there is hope; even if long years are required to bring around the great changes that must be effected, it is probable that they will come in time, and that all English people, and all the nations of the earth, will learn to be free and to be wise.

Let me say here that among the movements to accelerate the march of progress in the civilized nations and to promote the spirit of fraternity and harmonious action among men the Annual International Congresses of Freethinkers must prove themselves of considerable value and be productive of good. I hope American Freethinkers and Liberals will not underestimate their importance nor the necessity of sending delegates to them. I wish to now propose that T. B. Wakeman be sent over as a delegate of American Liberals to the Congress that is to assemble at Paris next year. His familiarity with French and German, together with his clear, broad views on all subjects pertaining to man's progress, and his acknowledged ability, constitute him a very fit person to come over and compare views with the leading thinkers of Europe. I wish bim to be the delegate to the next Freethinkers' International Congress. If my business will bear the strain I will contribute fifty dollars to help bear his expenses, and trust that hundreds of the Liberals of America will join with me in the movement.

OFF FOR THE NETHERLANDS.

Two hours of fast running in a northeasterly direction, without stopping, brought the London train to Harwich, a distance of some seventy-five miles, the point where the steamers leave for Rotterdam, Antwerp, etc., across the North Sea. In half an hour the "luggage" was all aboard, and we were moving out the harbor toward the Netherlands. Harwich is an unimportant place. I saw very little of it; and will of course have very little to say of it. The night was pleasant, though as the wind had been blowing hard the sea was somewhat rough, but I heard of no sea-sickness on board our steamer.

The passengers did not number over forty. The voyage upon the whole was a very good one. Soon after the morning dawn the low shores of Holland (etymologically Hollowland), or the Netherlands (in Dutch Der Nederlanden), began to make their appearance. The morning was chilly, but the weather pleasant. In due time we entered the river Maas, a combination of the Rhine and other rivers, making a very capacious stream, if stream it can be called. The descent is so very slight that the Maas may be considered almost as an arm of the sea with rivers running to it. At the outer part dykes have been made, to keep old ocean under some control. Low ridges of sand are first seen, followed after a while with fair-looking land. I shall have to take no time in describing the mountains and hills of Holland, for it has none. It is as level as the water itself, and is very little above it—a very few feet above the ocean, and in many places but a few inches. After leaving Rotterdam by rail I passed by much farming land which seemed not more than ten or twelve inches above the water, but probably these interior streams are a trifle higher than the ocean. Every eight or ten rods there is a canal some ten feet wide, in which small boats can run, and in this way manure is carried to the land. I will not say this is the case all over Holland, but east of Rotterdam it is so. I saw very little land that had been plowed; nearly all is pasture land; there are more cattle pastured in Holland than Yahweh used to have on his thousand hills in Judea. The pasturage is good and the cattle look well. I saw a few sheep, but only a few. The agriculture of Holland consists very largely in cattle-raising, and England is the great market. Johnny Bull is so fond of beef-steak, roast beef, and hot joints that it takes Scotland, Ireland, Holland, and a good share of America to satisfy his voracious appetite. The exports of Holland to England are about $100,000,000 annually, and the major part of this is in cattle. Her imports are not far from the same amount. The greatest length of the country from northeast to southwest is 190 miles, and the greatest width 123 miles, comprising eleven provinces and containing over 4,000,000 inhabitants. It was originally a swamp, largely formed, doubtless, by the washings and deposits from the Alps and other high grounds hundreds of miles in the interior, which for hundreds of thousands years have been steadily adding to these alluvial deposits. But Holland has virtually been made by the sturdy energy and industry of her people. The ocean has been dammed out by the dykes which have been made along the northern shore, and thus the greater part of her 1,300 square miles has been reclaimed from the domain of old Neptune. Occasionally the furious old monarch has rushed over these barriers, regardless of the puny efforts of man, and spread desolation and death over hundreds of square miles. But the energy of the dauntless Dutch does not quail before the encroachments of the ocean, and again and again these dykes have been repaired, and time and again the lands reclaimed. To keep these dykes in good repair costs the country some $2,500,000 annually. When the dykes in progress here at the city of Amsterdam are completed, and what is called the Zuyder Zee is reclaimed for habitation and cultivation, six per cent will be added to the habitable land of Holland and room for over 200,000 people.

As small and insignificant as Holland looks upon the map of the world, it has made its mark in the history of the past, and has done its share in molding and influencing the character of mankind. Next to England, in the centuries of the past, has she been mistress of the waves; her ships have gone everywhere, and her sails have whitened all the known waters of the globe; she has gathered of the wealth of all lands, for her commerce has extended to the uttermost parts of the earth; her naval engagements have been many, and she has played her part in the Christian wars of the world with creditable valor and persistence; she has somewhat extensive colonies in the East and West Indies, and on the coast of Africa, which aggregate a population of 24,000,000.

The government is a limited monarchy. The ruling monarch is William III., who is a year older than myself. It cannot be many years before nature will require him to give way in favor of his son William, Prince of Orange, born in 1840. The legislative body consists of two chambers; the first is chosen by the provincial states, their term continuing for nine years, and consisting of thirty-nine members; the second chamber, consisting of eighty-six members, is chosen by ballot by the tax-payers, and their term is for four years. This chamber contains the ablest politicians of the country, and with them rests the labor of doing the principal legislative work of the country. Each province has its own governor, or "king's commissioner." The revenues and expenditures of the government amount to about $50,000,000 per year. And, not to be out of the fashion of the civilized world, Holland owes a national debt of $400,000,000. It has a standing army of fifty thousand, and one hundred thousand militia, exclusive of its colonies.

The manufactures of Holland are not very extensive. Linen, tapes, etc., are manufactured to a limited extent, and for home use. There are some few large factories for manufacturing cloths for their colonies, with which they are arbitrary, compelling them to buy of Holland exclusively. Sugar refining and the manufacture of tobacco, which is extensively used, give employment to many. Breweries are also numerous. A national feature of their industry is the manufacture or Holland gin, or "Schiedam schnapps." On our way up the Maas to Rotterdam we passed Schiedam, where schnapps are principally made, and where are three hundred distilleries for the purpose. The tall chimneys of these establishments are seen very often. Gin, as is well known, is a spirit distilled from rye and other grain, and flavored with the oil of juniper, from juniper-berries. This manufacture is largely exported to England and to the United States, for it must be known that Americans swallow not a small quantity of the Schiedam schnapps, to say nothing of the hundreds of thousands of gallons manufactured in our own country by adding the essence of juniper and a small portion of syrup to our fiery corn whisky. For mildness and smoothness the Holland gin compares favorably with any spirit manufactured. Schiedam, the town where it is made, contains nearly twenty-five thousand inhabitants, and is almost a suburb of Rotterdam.

There are several iron and metal works rising to some importance in Holland; but the most important business of the country is the building of ships, barges, and canal boats, for it must be remembered that Holland abounds in canals, both in town and country, and the internal carrying trade is very considerable. There never was a country where canals could be more easily made; no grading is necessary; all that has to be done is to dig out the ditch and go where they please. The Dutch ships and sailing craft have been well known for centuries. The country has one hundred ironclads, mainly war ships, but I think they are not manufactured in the country; I presume Glasgow and other places in Great Britain have to be depended upon for these. I judge that her own locomotives are made in England; they look like the English style and manufacture.

The government of Holland is a mild one, and, though a monarchy, it may be called a free country. Taxation is based upon equitable principles, and—much to its credit—it has no state religion. Religion is entirely free, and a Hollander can have just as much of it as he wants, just the kind he wants, and just as little as he wants. In this respect the little country is far ahead of England, which retains its state religion—its established church—with so much tenacity. The Protestants of Holland are about a third more than the Catholics, and in the country there are sixty thousand Jews.

The steamer which brought us across the lower portion of the North Sea landed at the lower portion of Rotterdam, and a small river steamer took us up to the city proper, and from its deck I had a good opportunity to view the Dutch town, its bright, clean buildings, many of them with the gable end toward the streets, rising to the hight of five or six stories. The Dutch are very lavish in the way of paint. They have an adage that "paint costs nothing," and everything is painted; everything looks bright. As I had an hour or two before the train left for this town, I used it in looking about the quaint, neat Dutch city of 150,000 inhabitants. It has been called a little Paris set down in the midst of Dutch scenery, but to me it seems quite as much like Venice, because canals permeate the entire city; but the canals are larger or wider than in Venice. Large sized vessels pass into these canals and are unloaded of their cargoes a square or two back from the river. Nearly every street has its canal, and, unlike Venice, every canal has its streets. In Venice there are but very few streets, only canals with a narrow sidewalk beside some of them, and no carriages or horses in the city. In Rotterdam the streets are the same as the streets in other cities, with the canal accompaniment in addition. Horses are used plentifully, and so are dogs, for draft purposes. I saw them working in pairs and singly, and was surprised at the big loads they haul. I saw a pair of dogs hauling a load of vegetables sufficient for a horse. Often men and dogs were working together in getting along with a cartload of freight. So far as I am, concerned, I have no objections to dogs beings made to pay their way through the world. They are good feeders, and are able to acquit themselves of much service, and I cannot see why they should not labor as well as men, horses, and oxen. As a rule they are an idle class, doing little in return for the food they eat. I do not wish to see them overworked, nor small dogs made to do what a large dog should do, but it is well enough for them to be utilized in doing good when it is practicable. The Dutch women are very industrious; they may be seen performing almost all kinds of labor, many with a neck-yoke, carrying various commodities about the streets for sale and in transit. I went into the market and found that women transacted the larger share of the business. The display of meats, fish, vegetables, and fruits was very fair. Cabbages and cauliflowers in particular were plentiful and fine. Holland is noted for its gardens. The greater part of the flowering bulbs used in the world are grown here.

I noticed a kind of head-gear worn by some of the women unlike anything I have seen before. A gold or silver plate two and half inches by three and a half, roundish in shape, is attached to the side of the head (not to the skull, probably, but to the hair by pins or some such arrangement), and from this spiral quirls or ornamentations go forward like horns, with pendants hanging from them something like earrings, and varying in style. They are very conspicuous, and if they are worn to make a show I think the end is accomplished. Probably the custom is one that has been handed down from the past centuries, and perhaps is quite as sensible as hanging golden and other ornaments to the nose, or even to the ears, as fashionable American ladies are so fond of doing. I also noticed several of the better dressed ladies wearing capacious lace capes over their necks and shoulders. Sometimes the needle work on them is very elaborate. It is quite common to see the babies of the better classes dressed in the same manner.

This is also the land of wooden shoes. About half the people are wearing them, probably the poorer class, and the way the woman and children go clattering about with their wooden shoes is rather amusing. I notice there are stores where wooden shoes are sold exclusively, and they are piled up in front of the shops like so much stove-wood. Speaking of stove-wood, there is not very much of it here. I see small limbs of wood from an inch to an inch and a half in diameter and three feet long, tied up in small bundles or parcels and carried about the streets for sale. The main fuel of the poorer classes is peat or turf, the same as is so much used in Ireland. I learn that extensive beds of it abound in the country, and it is brought into the towns in boats and kept by dealers the same as coal, and is hawked about the streets in carts. It is cut in pieces about the size of bricks and seems quite solid, as though there ought to be a good deal of heat in it. It is composed of fiber and vegetable texture, and I judge it to be heavier and more solid than the Irish peat. The richer classes use coal, principally brought from England and Wales. There is but little wood grown in Holland and that is cultivated. By the sides of the canals rows of trees are often seen, which give much pleasantness to the landscape, and variety to that which would otherwise be monotony. I have seen many trees of large size. In the cities there are also many shade trees by the sides of the canals and streets. In this respect the contrast with London is very pleasant. In that large city there are very few trees save in the parks.

I must say the streets of Rotterdam are very clean and well paved, and cleanliness is a great characteristic of the place. I saw women engaged in sweeping the streets. In walking about the streets I came to a cathedral, and of course was impelled to look in, but found it very plain. Two rows of heavy columns ran the whole length, but I saw no statues and only one or two paintings. I think it is Protestant. The Catholics always make more show. In the small angles all around the outside of the cathedral are urinals, wholly unshielded and unhidden in any way—some twenty, I think, around the whole building—and they are freely patronized. It is not for me to say that the exterior utility of that cathedral is not greater and more practical than the inner.

I think I never saw so many windmills before as since I entered Holland. On all sides they are spreading their wings and moving in obedience to the winds that abound here. They are not the modern windmills, such as we have in America, but the old-fashioned kind which Don Quixote and Sancho Panza used to fight in Spain. Each has four long arms or wings measuring some twelve or fifteen feet in length, and looks, for all the world, like the pictures of windmills I used to see when a boy. They revolve slowly, and if the power thus utilized is not as reliable and strong as a steam engine, it has the merit of being cheap, and what is accomplished in the way of grinding and such other work as is found for them to do is so much saved.

In taking the train from Rotterdam to this city of Amsterdam I made a mistake. I should have come by the way of the Hague, which is the seat of the court and government, and is said to be a very pretty town of 150,000 inhabitants; but not being extremely familiar with the language of the country, and not as well posted as I might have been, I took the train for Amsterdam via Utrecht instead of the Hague. I was most anxious to see this old city, which may be regarded as the prototype or father of New York. That city was settled by the Dutch, and for a long time was called New Amsterdam, but when the English came to be the possessors of it the name was changed to New York. From this Dutch country came the old Knickerbockers and Stuyvesants, the Ten Eycks and Ten Broecks, that once formed the aristocracy of the principal town in the New World, and for the better part of a century were its leading powers. I was anxious to see Amsterdam, for I felt I could claim a sort of relationship to it by virtue of my residence in New York, and I find there is more than one point of similarity, It has a Haarlem for a suburb the same as New York has; it has the principal commerce of the country, and is admirably located for the purpose.

Let me say that the use of the word dam in this country does not arise from any special fondness for "cuss words," but the meaning is simple enough. Dam, in Dutch, is not very unlike the English meaning—if it does not mean to stop the water, it means to direct it or confine it; thus Rotterdam comes from the embankments, or dykes, to conduct the river Rotte, Schiedam from the river Schie, and Amsterdam from the river Amstel. So, the Hollanders dam a good deal though they do not mean thereby to use the word damn.

We arrived here in Amsterdam a little after the middle of the day, and I at once commenced looking around to see the character of the town, though I must confess my total ignorance of the language proves a serious drawback in acquiring information, especially as I have been able to find but few persons who speak English. I wish all the nations would hurry up and learn to speak English, or that a universal language would come into use. I have heard of an ingenious Frenchman who has devised a new and very simple language for universal use, based upon the seven syllables used to denote the seven musical characters, to wit, do, re, mi, fa, sol, la, si. By combining these simple sounds in different ways and in every possible order he gets six thousand words, which are enough, at least for traveling purposes, and nearly as many as Shakspere used in writing his immortal plays. Whether the Frenchman, or my philological and universological friend, Stephen Pearl Andrews, in his Alwato, has got the better system, I am unable to say; but I am willing the two systems should be submitted to a "Consensus of the Competent"—no, I don't like that term—to an international congress of philologists, and they decide which is the better of the two, with powers to enforce its early adoption, so that the next time I make a tour around the world I will not have as much trouble in finding streets, etc., as I do now. I wished here to call on Monsieur D'Ablaing, editor of De Dageraad, the radical journal of Holland, which journal I exchange with, and which editor I met at Brussels last year and at London this year. His place is 97 Damrak street, a street which runs out from the Dam, in the very center of the town; but I had not a little trouble in reaching it, though I sought diligently for it and made repeated inquiries. Somehow my accent is so bad, or my understanding so obtuse, that I could not fully bring myself en rapport with the Dutchlanders, of whom I wished to obtain information. I misunderstood them, or they persistently misunderstood me and misdirected me, for they sent me in different directions, and some entirely contrary to the others, and thus I went up streets and down canals to little purpose. I said Damrak just as plainly as I could speak it, but the dam Amsterdamians did not seem to understand Damrak worth a damn. Once I thought it, if I did not speak it, "Damn it all, don't you know where in Amsterdam Damrak is? You must be dam obtuse. I almost feel as though I could Rotterdam or cofferdam some of you, or even take a dose of Schiedam myself by way of revenge and to get even with you." But I did not have to do it, and at length my struggles and trials were triumphant, and I was gloriously rewarded for my labors. I found the Dam; I found Damrak; I found the office of De Dageraad and its genial editor and its gentlemanly publisher. They treated me very kindly, gave me the information I desired, and made me welcome to Amsterdam. Oh, it is so sweet, when in the adversity of being among the strange ones of the earth, who are so benighted that they cannot understand the English language (while every little child in America can rattle it off as easily as he can eat gum-drops), to find a person who can understand you; who can feel for you in your afflictions; who can sympathize in your sorrows, and who can speak words of consolation to your soul! Mons. D'Abliang speaks English, though the publisher does not. I was glad to learn that there is much Freethought in Holland, and that their journal is doing well. This is an intelligent country. The education of every child born in the country is provided for by laws of a very equitable character, founded upon equal religious privileges. The laws do not compel parents to send their children to school, but refuse relief from the public funds if their children are not thus sent; the result is, there are no children raised without a fair education.

I find Amsterdam much like Rotterdam, only a good deal more so. It contains 370,000 inhabitants, and is a brisk, thrifty city. Its buildings are four and five stories high as a rule, and some even more. The old-time houses stand with their gable ends to the street, giving the place a decided Dutch appearance. Like Rotterdam, it is traversed by canals in all its parts, which make ninety-five islands or squares, which are densely built up. It is literally a city built upon piles, they being driven through sixty feet of peat and sand. The harbor is inclosed by two piers, each five thousand feet long, with a mouth eight hundred and fifty feet wide, and has a basin inside the entrance of the canal which is fourteen miles long and twenty-six feet deep, and two locks 239 and 313 feet long. Large colonial ships, as well as from other parts, enter here freely. A new canal, built in 1876 by an English company at a cost of $12,500,000, cutting through the Isthmus of Holland to the mouth of the river Ymuiden, on the North Sea, is now the principal way for ships and steamers to reach Amsterdam. The Zuyder Zee, containing 1,400 square miles, is being shut off from the tidal waves, and will be reclaimed as dry land and make homes for many thousands. The city is nine miles around, and contains as much wealth and enterprise as any city of its size in the world.

The publisher of De Dageraad kindly brought me to this hotel where I am stopping, and then conducted me to the National Picture Gallery and Museum, first calling at the Caffe Poolsche Kuffijhuis, which is really a grand place for concerts, with an extensive restaurant and a large brilliant room adjoining, the whole being rich, gorgeous, and extensive. I found at the picture gallery many excellent works of art by Van Dyke and other eminent painters. Many of the subjects have a decided Dutch cast of countenance, but that is to be expected in a Dutch gallery. The Bible subjects I was most pleased with were the temptation placed before Joseph by Potiphar's wife and Susannah and the elders. The Dutch painters who got these pictures made the females extremely lovely, and they evidently had no fear of an impure-minded Comstock before their eyes, for they were true to nature. When I viewed the exquisite beauty of Mrs. Potiphar I irresistibly thought, "O you silly Joe; if I were you I would consent just a little." But the poor, cowardly simpleton looked frightened out of his wits, and tore the only coat he had "plumb in two." Possibly he divined her dream and concluded he had more important business somewhere else. "Not for Joseph."

Good houses are built for the different animals, properly classed, and at such distances apart that the whole collection must cover from fifty to a hundred acres of ground. Over one of the larger buildings is an excellent anatomical museum, all forms of animal life in skeleton, with every conceivable form of coral and marine productions, including, I should think, thousands of forms of singular animals, well preserved, that only inhabit the waters of the ocean. The whole affords a wide field for study.

From the Museum I returned to the Dam, where stands the palace which the king of the country occupies but eight days in the year, staying the remainder of the time at the Hague. It seems like a waste of capital to keep such a valuable piece of property to be occupied for eight days out of three hundred and sixty-five. It is no wonder that the Amsterdamians think the king ought to relinquish it and let them have it for a town hall. Here I took the tramway—street cars—about two miles out to the Zoological Gardens, where I saw a splendid collection of wild animals, from the stately elephant down to white mice; from the monstrous hippopotamuses disporting in the water, down to Guinea pigs; from three tall giraffs, which can reach limbs twenty feet from the ground, down by the way of several camels with both one hump and two humps; three zebras, llamas, moose, deer, antelopes, goats, ibexes, etc., down to the hairs and rabbits; from the largest ostriches, with heads ten feet from the ground, from condors, vultures, and eagles, down to the tinniest sparrows and humming-birds; from the boa-constrictors and anacondas by way of the cobras, moccasins and rattlesnakes down to the vipers and garter-snakes; from the three large sea-lions (one of which would climb up on a ledge of rocks ten or fifteen feet high, and dive off into the deep fountain below) the crocodiles and alligators, down to the gold fish, small crabs, etc., which inhabit the water. But I need not dwell on the varieties of animal life I saw; they were all there—I did not miss any—all that Adam named after Yahweh turned them out. But if we in America use the names Adam gave all these animals, then the Dutchmen have departed from the true paths, for I notice the names they gave them are entirely different from ours. Adam, while he was about it, should have marked their names in their foreheads so we nations could agree and call them alike. Probably Adam made no arrangement for the confusion of tongues at the tower of Babel. So much for ambitious man trying to get to heaven before he was invited. I will say that this zoological collection at Amsterdam is one of the best I ever saw. The one at London is no better. I always view the great number of forms of animal life with interest. It helps me to admire nature; and if she has not produced the many orders and species of life with as great perfection and unobjectionableness as might, with infinite power and wisdom, have been possible, I inevitably have to admire her works, and silently exclaim, "O nature, what a splendid workman you are!"

Adjoining the grounds is an extensive restaurant, with a fine large space filled with seats, where the natives can sit and listen to the discoursing of music by the band on pleasant summer evenings. It is an agreeable place of resort, and is much frequented by the staid people of Deutschland. They seem to live as sensibly as any people in the world, and have as few faults as those of any nation. I must say I am pleased with the Hollanders, and regard them as a thrifty, industrious, frugal, and happy people. I see no beggars here, and no indications of sickening poverty and destitution. The dwellings of the poor, even, are not repulsive and disgusting. The streets are clean and the dwellings comfortable. The Dutch may not be as "fast" as some nations, but they are sure.

This is the city where the great Spinoza lived; here is where he worked out the wonderful problems which his mind evolved, and here is where the narrow, unappreciative bigots persecuted him because his intellect towered above theirs and because he was able to disclose greater truths of nature than their pigmy minds were capable of grasping; here is where he toiled at diamond-cutting in order to secure to him the means of eking out an existence; but he here gave to the world some of the sublimest truths which man has ever uttered. If a Moses ever lived he was not equal to Spinoza, and could not compare with him in a true conception of the powers of the universe and in solving the great problems most important to the welfare of the human race.

Diamond-cutting is still prosecuted here to a large extent. Ten thousand persons are said to be constantly engaged at the business, nine thousand of whom are Jews. For centuries Amsterdam has been quite a place of resort for the persecuted Israelites; they have here found shelter and protection when it has been denied them in other places. It seems like a heartless piece of cruelty and meanness on the part of Christians, when they are indebted to the Jews for their Virgin Mary and for the gods they worship, to turn against them, to despise them, and oppress them and despitefully use them in every possible way. But Christians have been cruel and mean in so many directions and on so many thousand occasions that we are almost forced to the conclusion that cruelty and meanness are their principal stock in trade and about the only qualities for which they are remarkable. There are thirty thousand Jews now living in Amsterdam.

When I had seen the animals, etc., as much as I desired, the day was far spent, and I returned to my hotel for supper, after which I did not venture out among the streets and canals. I did think I would like to see what a Dutch theater is like, and that perhaps you would conceive it my duty to do so for your benefit; but thinking that I might possibly get lost in this dam—I mean Amsterdam—town, and remembering I had this letter to write I remained in.

Thursday, Oct. 6.—After looking about the city for an hour or more, I took the train for Arnheim, via Utrecht; the latter a town of 60,000 inhabitants, but which I did not stop to inspect. After passing it we came into a dry, sandy district, where is but comparatively little vegetation. Some of the sand is in ridges, doubtless as left by the ocean thousands of years ago. The canals were not so numerous heie, and the country is dryer. I had previously seen much of the basket willow in cultivation, and it struck me that Holland is the best country for that crop of any place in the world. I noticed the baskets are made of the willow, the common ones with the bark on, the finer ones with the bark taken off. The growth and preparation of madder for dyeing is also quite a business in some parts of Holland, of which considerable quantities are raised.

I stopped over at Arnheim for some two hours; it is a place of something more than 45,000 inhabitants, and withal a very pretty, neat, and well-built town. I had time enough to look it over somewhat thoroughly, and make a few purchases of fruit and other edibles. I found at the outer part of the town, near the station, a hill or mountain nearly twenty feet in hight—perhaps the highest land in Holland. After leaving the town the country is very fine; it is cultivated like a garden and produces very fine crops. The land here is a trifle higher than nearer the sea, and better adapted to plowing and crop-raising. It must be a beautiful land to work, being a mellow, sandy loam, without a stone or other obstruction.

We had a slow train and did not get ahead very rapidly. It got to be dark before we reached the little station over the German frontier, the name of which I did not learn, when our baggage had to be overhauled to see if we had any "tabac" or other contraband goods. The examination was not at all rigid. Finding no tabac or spiritus in my sachel they allowed me to pass; but from some small sums were collected.

On the train from Amsterdam I was fortunate in meeting William Tebb, of London, who is on his way to Cologne to attend an International Anti-Vaccination Congress, which is to be held there on the 9th, 10th, 11th, and 12th inst. I had considerable conversation with him upon the evils of vaccination, and learned facts of him which I was not before in possession of. I found him a very intelligent man, and thoroughly aroused to the wrongs that are done both in Europe and America in enforcing compulsory vaccination. He is editor of the Vaccination Inquirer and Health Review, and is working with all his intelligence and energy to undo the evils that have been enforced by modern governments, in compelling people to have their children vaccinated, by which poison is introduced into their systems far more pernicious and deadly than the smallpox itself. I have long been of the opinion that vaccination has not proved so great a blessing to mankind as Jenner and his admirers have claimed, but since conversing with Mr. Tebb, and obtaining from him the most reliable and authentic statistics upon the subject, I am more positive of it than before. As this is a most important subject to every person who has children, or who may have them, I feel sure you will excuse me if I detain you for a few minutes with it.

So far from vaccination proving a blessing to the world, it has been an absolute curse. By this operation thousands have not only been thereby so poisoned with the virus of syphilis, scrofula, and other dreadful impurities that they have met terrible and premature deaths, but tens of thousands who have not been so unfortunate have nevertheless had their blood so impregnated with such vile diseases as to imbitter life and induce wretchedness, though death were not the direct result. We are all sufficiently liable to contract impurities of the blood without expressly introducing into the systems of little children and others such serious infections must both sadden and shorten life.

There is a popular prejudice both in England and America that vaccination has lessened smallpox, but a careful examination of the subject dispels this error. Vaccination was made compulsory in Great Britain by act of Parliament in the year 1853; again in 1867; and still more stringent in 1871. Since the first year named England has been visited with three epidemics of smallpox, each being more severe than the preceding. In the epidemic of 1857, '58, and '59 14,240 deaths from smallpox occurred; in 1863, '64, and '65 20,059 deaths; in the third, 1870, '71, and '72, 44,840 deaths. Increase of population from the first to the second epidemic, seven per cent; increase of smallpox in the same period nearly fifty per cent. Increase of population from the second to the third epidemic, ten per cent; increase of smallpox in the same period one hundred and twenty per cent. Deaths from smallpox in the first ten years after the enforcement of vaccination—1854–1863—33,515; in the second ten years—1864–1873—70,458. These figures are from the "Vital Statistics," authorized by Parliament.

The following truthful analysis has been made from the Registrar-General's return to the House of Commons, No. 433, session 1877:

1. In 1847, out of 539,965 infants born, that foulest of diseases, syphilis, carried off 255 before they had lived a single year, being at the rate of 472 per million births.

2. In 1871 eleven out of thirteen robust adults were syphilized by re-vaccination with lymph from one apparently healthy child at a vaccination station.

3. In 1875, after rigid enforcement of vaccination for many years, the deaths from syphilis among infants under one year reached 1,826 per million births, an increase of 1,354 per million (or more than four times the 1847 rate of mortality) among infants, from this foul cause alone. In like manner, the infant deaths from scrofula had increased in 1875 as compared with 1847 660 per million births. Tabes Mesenterica (internal scrofula) increased 2,276 per million. Skin diseases increased 320 per million. And Erysipelas increased 240 per million. From bronchitis there was an increase of 12,400; also from diarrhœa and atrophy, and debility (on an average of seven years) 12,750 per million.

4. The foregoing eight causes alone, then, increased the mortality under one year to births, 29,944 per million in 1875 as compared with 1847 (when the blood was not poisoned by law at three months old) say in round numbers about 25,000 babies a year carried off by inoculable and invaccinated diseases and lowered vitality. How could these infants die of smallpox? They were all obviously saved by vaccination as claimed by the medical department.

5. Notwithstanding this so-called infant-saving, out of 80,000 smallpox deaths during twenty years 43,000 were those of children under five years, after vaccination enforced to afford protection.

6. Thus may an inquiring person inform himself why $600,000,000 expended in England on sanitary works have not, apparently, lessened the general death rate.

In view of these apalling facts, it is not strange that Dr. J. W. Collins, at the Medical Animal Vaccination Conference, London, should have introduced this resolution: "That having regard to the fact that vaccination has in no way mitigated the severity nor lessened frequency of smallpox epidemics; and farther, that it has on several occasions been the means of extensively propagating syphilis, as shown by Drs. Wartoment and Cameron. Resolved, That this conference condemns the present system of vaccination as mischievous in its results, and inoperative as a prophylactic against the disease it was designed to suppress.

It is not strange that J. Emery Codere, M.D., Professor of Materia Medica, Victoria University, and for thirty years physician at Hotel Dieu, Montreal, should say this, "The idea of introducing into a healthy organism the virus of an inflammatory and gangrenous malady in order to keep it from a disease that does not exist is revolting to common sense."

It is not strange that F. W. Newman, Emeritus Professor, London University, should say, "To attack a perfectly healthy child under pretense of public health is a tyrannical usurpation which no medical theory can defend."

It is not strange that Dr. Charles Cameron, M.P., should express himself in this wise, "The recurrence, therefore, in the latest period of a mortality almost as high as that experienced prior to the Vaccination act shows that the protective virtues of vaccination are mythical, or that there is something radically wrong in our national system of vaccination."

It is not strange that Florence Nightingale, who did so much for suffering human beings, should have said, "Every one who knows anything of public health questions will agree as to the practical unity of epidemics and their determining causes, and that exemption from all alike must be sought, not by any one thing, such as vaccination, but by inquiring into and removing the causes of epidemic susceptibility generally."

Methodist Kissing.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Straws show which way the wind is blowing, and Bishop Wiley's preliminary address to the Methodist Conference in the town of Sycamore, Ill., on the 5th of October, the conference that silenced Dr. Thomas, of Chicago, for heresy, reveals one fact and explains another in a most edifying way to the outside world.

The town of Sycamore is not a large one, and the members of the Conference, one hundred and forty in number, must needs be quartered on the families residing there instead of being accommodated at the hotels. In view of the clergy mingling with the lay brethren, and their wives and daughters for a week or two, Bishop Wiley givs them three pieces of advice, the last of which is that they should "not indulge in kissing, as it was a dangerous business." The fact which this official warning reveals is that Methodist ministers hav been in the habit—business the bishop calls it—of kissing the sisters. If the bishop had warned them against stealing the silver forks and spoons of their entertainers because it was a "dangerous business," and might lead to detection and disgrace, the brethren present would hav risen up in indignation and rebuked the bishop on the spot for daring to insinuate that they could do any such thing. But when he warned them, as shepherds of the Lord's sheep, against leading any of the flock beside the still waters in the wilderness of this world, and fondling the ewes and lambs, not a mother's son in all the one hundred and forty who composed the conference ever manifested the least anger. The whole of them sung dumb and tacitly acknowledged the corn. There was a general grating of the teeth and a rolling up of the whites of their eyes toward heaven in amazement at Dr. Thomas's heresy in denying the doctrin of hell fire for the wicked. But when the bishop, to use scriptural phraseology, warned them against playing around the hole of the asp, and putting coals of fire in their bosoms with the expectation that no harm would come of it, the brethren threw furtiv glances at each other, winked expressivly, and seemed to think that if the bishop was Wiley by name he was not wily enough by nature to deceive and bamboozle them.

The reason why the one hundred and forty members of Conference laughed in their sleeves and put their thumbs against the sides of their noses when the old bishop warned them against kissing the female saints of Sycamore is that they knew full well that Bishop Wiley was no rule of faith and practice to them. They went for the Bible; and in the New Testament, over and over again, the inspired apostles, Paul and Peter, expressly enjoin upon the saints to "greet one another with a holy kiss." The Conference was just going to decapitate Dr. Thomas for denying that Balaam's ass was plenarily inspired when he spoke in the Hebrew tongue to his rider. Would the bishop dare deny the inspiration of Paul and Peter when they repeatedly enjoin the duty of kissing among the saints as one of the means of grace? By no manner of means. Let the bishop repeat his commonplaces, and go the round of his platitudes and other ceremonies. They were not the inspired word of God. The Conference was a body of Christian ministers whose rule of faith and practice was the Bible, and as the New Testament was the most important part of the Bible, and clearly and repeatedly not only permitted but enjoined the practice of kissing among the saints, they would perform this Christian duty during their stay among the sisters of Sycamore and let the bishop go ——— among the octogenarians of both sexes. And they apologized for the bishop by saying that as in ancient times among the Greek philosophers there was exoteric teaching addressed to the outsiders who did not understand things, but esoteric instruction given to the initiated who did understand, so the wily old bishop's warning against the clergy kissing the women of Sycamore was merely exoteric, and meant to play upon the credulity of the marines.

To men of gumption, who hav eyes to see and minds to reflect, this warning of Bishop Wiley to one hundred and forty of his clergymen reveals a fact indisputable, so far as the Rock River Conference is concerned, that the common practice among the Methodist preachers is the "dangerous" one of kissing the women indiscriminately. And they keep up this "business" because they and the women like it, and because, as I said before, the New Testament commends it to be done—"Greet ye one another." Let the brethren greet the sisters and the sisters the brethren "with a holy kiss;" or, as Mr. Beecher used to say, "kiss all around." That the practice is a dangerous one, as the bishop says, although enjoined by two inspired apostles, is clear from the fact that it, or something else, plays the devil in so many instances with the morals of the Methodist clergy, for in the long list of clergymen who hav been chased down and nabbed by the dogs of the law, as reported by the newspapers all over the country, because they were unchaste and meddlesome among the women, the Methodist ministers head the list. And let it be remembered that it was this class of the clergy mainly who, when Hayes promised that Mr. Bennett should not be sent to prison for an offense he had not committed, gathered around the madam and through her changed the purpose of the chicken-hearted fraud and had a man sent to the penitentiary as a criminal who, as the authorities at Washington admitted, had violated no law.

Mr. Editor, the church, and especially the Methodist church, is a breeding-place for the ignoble vice of lying in its various phases of dissembling, dishonesty, and hypocrisy. It not only makes its own ministers and people in so many instances liars and hypocrits, but by its false standards of morals compels outsiders to at least dissemble by suppressing the expression of their honest opinions for fear of losing caste and patronage in their business vocations. Truthfulness and candor are the most beautiful traits in the human character, and no man ought ever to do in private what he condemns in public.

Nine-tenths of the influence of the church is evil; it has honeycombed society with hypocrisy and cowardice, and has destroyed the means of rightly estimating character. It is a nuisance which it is the province of Freethought to abate.

The only argument that has ever been offered against the taxation of church property is that the churches, by their inculcation of good morals, pay to the commonwealth more than they cost by their exemption. But look at the facts in connection with one single penitentiary in the state of Ohio. The Cleveland Leader of the 21st of November, 1879, publishes the report of the directors of the penitentiary for that year, in which they announce the fact that of the 1,316 criminals in the institution at Columbus the Catholics number 133; Baptists, 65; Presbyterians, 53; Disciples, or Campbellites, 18; Episcopalians, 33; Dunkard, 2; Jews, 3; Universalists, 3; United Presbyterians, 6; Quaker, 8; German Reformed, 5; United brethren, 6; Spiritualists, 0; Infidels, 0; Methodists, 172.

How many of these Methodists are ministers who began their career by disregarding Bishop Wiley's caution not to kiss the women because it was a dangerous business, this deponent sayeth not. My brother David, who is quite a statistician, and who has a warm side for the Methodists, says he is afraid to inquire.

Scientific Liberalism.

The recent action of the Chicago Congress betokens a new and forward movement in Liberalism. That action is not so much a cause as an effect. It represents the point to which, through many ways, the evolution of human thought has arrived. Like all great movements in the development of humanity, Liberalism was at first the outcome of feeling and temperament; it was a sort of idiosyncrasy—a purely individual affair; it sprang up here and there like a wild luxuriant growth of nature. Hence it went into many hobbies and notions and personal proclivities. In such a state there was no possibility of organization. There could only be the impulsiv life of childhood.

If Liberalism had always remained in this state it would hav been a mere eddy in the world's progress, and not the main current. That it has at length acquired strength and depth enough to become organized and shape itself into an all-inclusiv movement shows that it is not a mere stream in human thought, but the ocean of destiny itself, upon whose ample bosom all the riches of the future must pass.

Liberalism is now not simply individual, but universal; it is no longer so many atoms, but a world. This is not an artificial result, but a natural crystallization; it is the outcome of a law of growth.

Every great process is born out of feeling—out of human hope and aspiration; but if it remain simply a matter of feeling it cannot reach to permanent results; it dies like a wave upon the vast sea—another wave takes its place.

From feeling each great movement in human progress must pass to thought, and through thought to sublime and all-comprehensiv harmony.

Liberalism has now become organic, and the law of its organic life is science. Through science Liberalism becomes perfect; it builds the ideal republic and clothes humanity with new and splendid powers.

Without science Liberalism will flash away like the bright foam; it may catch the light of heaven in dazzling colors, but it will not endure in the edifice in which the sons of men must dwell.

Hereafter Liberalism must be a study. He who would be a thorough-going Liberal must be a devout and persistent thinker; and he must learn to think with others, that together the grandest results may be accomplished. We must put on the harness, for if we dash off free and wild how can we ever draw the chariot of progress?

There is a common work before us, and a common method. There is in the noble sense of the word a sublime and beautiful creed by which we are bound together—it is the creed of human reason and all the varied and vast results of our united experience.

This creed is not made or imposed by any set of men, but by the enthusiastic work in which we are engaged. It is the lesson that nature herself teaches. We must be learners and scholars in many directions. We do not know it all yet. The demands of human life are immense. How much is to be built up with new knowledge and new instrumentalities!

Scientific Liberalism is something vastly different from "cultured Liberalism." This has proved a most pitiable failure.

"Culture" has run itself into the ground, and is fast going to seed. The world despises it, as it ought to do. Mere culture is of all things the most despicable. It leads to that most cursed of all sins, spiritual pride. In that it rots and dies.

He who makes "culture" the end of life builds about himself a tomb.

Of course there is a true and natural, and we might say unconscious, culture that is eminently beautiful. As beauty is the most beautiful when unconscious, so culture is the most noble when it knows not itself. Culture will come through knowledge and a high purpose. We need not and should not seek for it as a special end. If one does he is apt to become narrow and unsympathetic. He shuts himself up to his own peculiar tastes. His "sweet reasonableness" is apt to become a fierce unreasonableness against what he does not happen to like. The cultured man is one who pets himself, who, having on a clean shirt, will not associate with one who has a soiled one, although it may hav become so by very honest work. Culture, after all, is only intellectual dandyism. It is taking pride in what is but an outside accomplishment, and too often results in a disdaining of what is really manly.

If we insist upon science, the most noble culture will result, as if we insist upon love the most noble politeness and etiquet will come; but to insist upon mere culture is like insisting upon mere politeness and etiquet without reference to underlying sources.

Mere culture is aristocratic and exclusiv, while science is thoroughly democratic and inclusiv. Culture picks out a few select facts and dwells in their radiance, while science takes all facts and makes the most and the best of them.

Scientific Liberalism draws no lines. It is afraid of no associations. It simply seeks the truth. It dwells in the universal. It avoids no man nor woman. It evades no issue. It calls nothing unclean that is a part of humanity. It touches and includes all life. It is not wilful or arbitrary. It has no ruts, no favorit truths, no pet ideas. It is open to every relation and to every sympathy, yet it binds and controls. It makes law, it builds, it perfects. It allows liberty only for high ends. It would hav all living obedient to a sublime purpose. It has a noble meaning. It believes in sacrifice and toil; in humility and devotion.

This is the new and broad career to which we are committed by the Chicago Congress voicing the large demands of the hour. We are sweeping into vast and mighty currents of progress. All the streams are uniting. We are now in a position to conquer the future. We hav insisted upon freedom, but even more peremptorily shall we insist upon knowledge. We wish every man to be wide awake and be able to use his liberty for the noblest acquirements.

Samuel P. Putnam.

No Honest Man Need Apply.

The church does not ask for honest men. It desires only mere consenting passivly to formulated creeds—creeds which it is impossible for the candidates to fully and properly understand as to their merits relativly considered with all other creeds, for it must be remembered that if a creed is the correct exposition of the divine will there can be but one correct exposition of that will. Hence no man can intelligently determin which is the correct creed until he has examined them all and compared the different principles enunciated therein. A life-time would not suffice for such a work, hence an intelligent decision is an impossibility. Then if there is not an intelligent decision there cannot be an honest belief. Of what use can it be to an individual to assent to something somebody else has said. There cannot be honest consent without practical knowledge. There is no point upon which to rest honesty, and the man who accepts these things must either be an imbecil or a knave. Why? He accepts because he does not know better, or because he has some object in making such an avowal. In either case what I hav said is true, and about the best that can be said of the matter is the church holds this position, "We will take an honest man into our fold if he assents to our dogmas; but if he don't, we hav no use for him."

But can it be said that no man is honest and sincere who in his rules of life is not acquainted with every other system of ethics or philosophy; and if not hence the prior reasoning is sophistical? No, because Liberalism does not base salvation on belief of any system, nor is it considered requisit for membership in our ranks. Ours is not a creed, but a life, and we hav but one common principle, to wit, perfect individual mental liberty; and as no man's standing depends on profession, there is no inducement to hypocrisy. Hence we ask for honest men first, and afterward honest men with correct theories, but sincerity is the basic rock of our temple, and if a man hav that then correct principles and good acts will assuredly follow. REUBEN DAILEY.

Book Notices.

THE BENNETT–MAIR DISCUSSION.

I hav received and reviewed the "Bennett-Mair Discussion," which we read with such interest in THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is one more valuable contribution to Liberal literature, and ought to sell well. I could hav sold this copy before it was unwrapped had I so desired. There are no books that are so well calculated to provoke inquiry and discussion, and consequently Liberal conclusions, as these which present both sides in their extremes and fulness. Both Christian and Liberal here finds his very best arguments for his positions, and he cannot fail to learn much that is new and interesting. Mair is not a clergyman, but he has probably done as well in trying to support a "lost cause" as if he had been one, and Bennett has fairly excelled himself in presenting mountains of evidence proving the mythical and fabulous character of the Christian religion, as well as its degrading, baleful, and belittling influences upon humanity. He effectually settles the question as regards the divinity and usefulness of the Bible by proving it to be full of falsehood, error, legend, cruelty, and obscenity. He proves that every dogma of the church was held by pagans long before the Christian era—that belief is no virtue and unbelief no crime—because they are both involuntary and cannot be controled by will. He proves that Christianity has never made men moral or good, but that vice and crime of all kinds are more prevalent in Christian countries than any other.

I hope every League will buy this book for its library, and every individual Liberal who is able will order one to lend to his pious neighbors. We all need to do some good work for humanity, and the best work of all is to free the mind from error and superstition and thus prepare it for truth and progress. Truth is the aim of all honest inquirers. We cannot hav too much truth or be too free in its utterance. Truths mildly and properly presented are never harmful to any good cause.

"Men talk of dangerous truths, as if't could be
That truth is ever dangerous or unsafe!
'Tis only we and our imperfect ways
That are at fault. Nettles touched timorously
Sting to the quick; but grasp them with a will
And they are harmless as sweet beds of balm.
And so with truth, approach her with distrust
Or fear, she stings us with her positiv
Sharp weapons, and we cry out, 'We are hurt!'
But front her boldly and she harms us not;
Nay, wrestle with her, hold her till the day
Breaks, and the cry bursts from our lips,
'I will not let thee go, except thou bless!'
And we shall know her as she is, sweet,
Strong, and helpful, sent to us of good,
And blessing ere she goes.

"Only half truths
Are dangerous; of them, my soul, beware!
Look to it that they cheat thee not with shams,
And flattering specious forms of lower good,
When the supremest good is in thy grasp,
Or may be for the reaching after it."

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

This is another of those full and candid expositions of theology that our friend Bennett hands to the world every now and then, and very readable it is.

Having read these papers, pro and con, as they appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I know them to be most interesting and valuable, as containing rare information suited to all persons desirous of being posted on the preposterous and monstrous superstitions of the ages past, as well as the present age.

The quotations from the Zend Avesta, the Chinese and other ancient philosophers, are gems in themselvs, and are alone worth the price of the book to those who might not be able to get them in any other form.

Mr. Bennett sustains his part well, handles the theme splendidly throughout, and makes objections to Christianity stronger than ever, and the book will, we hav no doubt, find a ready sale and many readers.

SUSAN H. WIXON.

VOLTAIRE IN EXILE.

This, if but a bird's-eye view of the great philosopher, is still a very comprehensiv and good work, considered as an epitome of his life and labors. To those who cannot afford the larger and more elaborate history of Voltaire by James Parton this little work will be of great value, since it contains all the leading facts, incidents, and principal details of his life in brief. Every one should know something of the eminent scholar and brilliant genius whose remarkable career and brave thought will resound throughout the world for ages to come, and hence a copy of this timely translation should find a welcome in every household, especially every Liberal household, and the price is so small, it undoubtedly will hav a large sale. SUSAN H. WIXON.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Am in receipt of "Voltaire in Exile." Hav not yet found leisure to examin it thoroughly. For a description of the work I would refer your readers to THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 1st. That it is a most delightful production is evident even upon a cursory examination. Would that every Christian, as well as Freethinker, was in possession of the contents of this book. Though, like Paine, Voltaire believed in the existence of a God, like Paine he dealt destructiv blows at the myths of the Bible, church frauds, and bigotry, from which the former has never recovered and the latter has never forgiven him. Paine was the great English iconoclast, Voltaire the great French wit and thunderbolt. "Crush the wretch," or "crush the Infamous," was powerfully leveled at the then existing church monstrosities at home and abroad. Vile as his enemies hav represented Voltaire, he was in manners and morals far in advance of the dignitaries of the church who reviled him. But in order to be appreciated "Voltaire in Exile" must be read, and we advise all to send $1 to THE TRUTH SEEKER office for this remarkable book, the reading of which will but whet the appetite for a perusal of the much larger volume by James Partan, the great historian and Freethinker.

Let our Liberals not content themselvs in ignorance of the lives of our noble, heroic workers, dead and gone, but invest every spare dollar in Liberal literature and thus aid the present worker in disseminating the seeds of Freethought at the same time he is feasting himself. ELLA E. GIBSON.

Barre, Mass., Oct. 12, 1881.

"Voltaire in Exile" is a new book by M. Gastineau, which has just been issued by D. M. Bennett, the well-known Freethought publisher.

It was written a few years ago to meet the occasion of the centenary of Voltaire's death, and is a fitting tribute to the memory of the great man.

While entering into many of the smaller details and incidents of his long and checkered career, it is concise and crisp; and, while lauding his many good qualities and his genius, it does not seek to cover up his equally numerous faults, among which not the least were his broad notions regarding the relations of the sexes. The book, in short, is intended to be a faithful history of Voltaire's life in exile—an impartial picture by the hand of an admiring but conscientious artist.

The author turns to his work as a philosopher, and is thereby very naturally seized with such admiration for it as to entirely forget the weaknesses of the man. It is when beheld as the equal of kings and protector of the weak—when, armed with the sword of philosophy, he opposes, almost single handed, the combined forces of superstition, cant and priestly despotism—that Voltaire appears to the author as the ruling genius of the eighteenth century. Remembering Voltaire's humanitarian, watchful, and ready step forward to champion the cause of the oppressed—as he did in the Calas case—giving them his time, money, and hospitality, as well as his benevolence to his tenantry at Ferney, where he illustrated his life-long principles by becoming the author of the prosperity and happiness of a hitherto stagnant community, Monsieur Gastineau grants him, not admiration alone, but also the profound admiration which true goodness, allied to genius, must ever command.

The most interesting portion of Monsieur Gastineau's work is that touching the philosophical system of the great man. It is the most interesting because it dispels many false ideas even well-educated people entertain regarding Voltaire's religious belief. As the author very well says: "In spite of his sallies against metaphysics, Voltaire constantly interested himself in the great questions of God, the soul, thought, and free will. In contrast with Diderot, he had begun with Spinozism (pantheism). After having wandered for some time on the vast ocean of matter, he returned to deism."

In other words, the greater part of his life Voltaire was a believer in God, which fact, however, never prevented him from being tolerant toward other sincere and conscientious Christians or absolute Atheists and Materialists. As Monsieur Gastineau very correctly puts it, "Voltaire found his belief in God principally on the cosmological arguments." According to him, something exists, and, consequently, something had existed from all eternity. This world is built with intelligence, therefore it has been created by an intelligence. The movements of the heavenly bodies, the revolution of the globe around the sun, are subject to and accomplished through laws of mathematical exactness. Either the stars themselvs are great geometers, or else they are the work of the great geometer, in accordance with Plato's definition. According to Spinoza, God is the whole of everything; according to Voltaire, on the contrary, everything springs from God.

And yet, while separating God and nature, Voltaire was not a dualist with regard to the body and soul. For him they were but one. What was understood by spirit or soul was after all nothing more than mind in his eyes, than the faculty of thinking, given to the refined matter of the brain. He denied the immortality of the soul, that is, the survival of thought to the brain, and considered man like a musical instrument, which givs forth no sound after it is broken.

Curiously enough, as Monsieur Gastineau presents him to the reader, Voltaire always remained a monarchist and an aristocrat. Republican Switzerland, where his books, like those of Rousseau, were burnt, was not calculated to inspire him with love for the democratic form of government. To him republican was a word of very vague and empty signification, which he believed, moreover, synonymous with intolerance and mediocrity.

In conclusion, it may be repeated that, without becoming tediously minute, the author has given the public as complete a history of Voltaire in exile as can be written. The translators, Messrs. T. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg, deserve full credit for the masterly manner in which they hav conveyed the innermost meaning of the original French into the English language.—Truth.

"Voltaire in Exile, his Life and Works at Home and Abroad," is the title of a neat volume just issued by D. M. Bennett. It is a translation from the French of Benjamin Gastineau. This is a very elligible life of Voltaire, embracing the material facts in convenient form. It will find a ready sale amongst Freethinkers who are admirers of Voltaire and his works.—Seymour Times.

A Letter from Mrs. Colman.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It is so long since I hav written you a word that I almost feel like being newly introduced; but I presume if I shall write you many lines I shall so pronounce myself upon the page that my old friends will recognize me. I am not one of the fortunate who go through life misunderstood or in any way disguised. I hoped till almost the last moment to go to Chicago to the Annual Meeting of the National Liberal League, but I could not arrange to get there. I am a good deal older than I once was, and am more easily frightened by the "lions in the way." I am very glad to know that the meeting was a success; but I do not relish being constantly admonished by the seceders of last year to behave well and keep harmonious. It is just as though the seceding states of the South should constantly say to the North: "Now we hope you will keep the peace and not again leave the Union. Be harmonious. We are very good people. Be sure, we fired on Sumter and did you all the wrong in our power, but then you conquered us, and we didn't enjoy it, and now don't you do it again." For my part, if those who went out from us and said wicked things of us hav satisfied themselvs and learned better I am glad of it, but it would be in better taste to say less about harmony.

I am glad that the League was wise enough—if Mr. Wright would resign the Presidency—to appoint the right man to succeed him. Mr. Wright stayed by us through our greatest need, for which I bless him with all my heart. He will still be with us, whatever may betide. I hav spent some days at his beautiful home in the past few weeks, and esteem it one of the great pleasures of my life. Dear, good man! The world at large is much, much better for his having lived in it. But you must see him in his daily life, at home, and with friends to know how grandly great he is.

Of our new President I am sure we shall always be proud. Whenever I wish to make a picture of man representing the powers of divinity I bring to my recollection T. B. Wakeman as he stood upon the platform in Chicago in that trying hour of secession speaking the grandest inspiration—the inspiration that has its root in the love of humanity.

All the other officers seem well chosen. I think very few of us would dare to take Mr. Leland's place; he has filled it so well, and writes such charming reports, it is quite a feast to read them. I wish we had money enough to fill the treasury, so that Mr. Palmer and Mrs. Lake would find their offices easy to fill.

I hope all who possibly can of your subscribers take also the Infidel Pulpit. Mr. Chainey is doing a grand work; his audience is large and appreciativ, and Boston must be greatly improved by his weekly lectures. It is so good to hear a man who dares to speak the whole truth and is so gifted that people cannot help listening.

I cannot help being constantly anxious for dear Mr. Bennett. I trust no harm will befall him. Love to Mrs. Bennett. Truly yours,

LUCY N. COLMAN.

A Trinity of Lithographs.

We hav for sale the lithograph likenesses of the three leading Liberals of this country—Thomas Paine, D. M. Bennett, and R. G. Ingersoll. They are all splendidly executed, and with a neat frame around them—which can be procured from picture-frame makers at slight expense—will be an ornament to any home. They will be sent, secure from breakage, by mail at the following prices: D. M. Bennett and R. G. Ingersoll, 50 cents each; Thomas Paine, $1.

A CATALOG of our publications will be sent free upon application.

Voltaire's Death.

We recently received the following note from an esteemed friend:

MAUSTON, WIS., Oct. 24, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I send you a copy of the Christian Statesman containing an article on "Voltaire's Renunciation of Infidelity." Is it true that Mr. James Parton says in his "Life of Voltaire" that he recanted on his death-bed? I was intending to get this work, but if this is true, I, for one, don't want it. I hope and think it is not true. WM. HOLGATE.

This is the article referred to:

VOLTAIRE'S RENUNCIATION OF INFIDELITY.

Let it be distinctly understood as forever beyond question that Voltaire fully recanted his Infidel principles, and professed his belief in the Christian religion. The new Life of Voltaire by James Parton settles this point beyond contradiction. "Mr. Parton cannot be suspected of an undue bias for orthodoxy," and it is only "after a patient and candid study of authorities" that he gives this confession to the world.

Mr. Parton says: "The profession of faith, written in Voltaire's own hand, was as follows: 'I, the undersigned, declare that having been attacked four days ago by a vomiting of blood, at the age of eighty-four years and being unable to get to church, the cure of Saint-Sulpice being willing to add to his good works that of sending to me the Abbe Gaultier, priest, I hav confessed to him, and declare further that if God disposes of me I die in the Catholic religion in which I was born, hoping from the divine mercy that he will deign to pardon all my faults, and that if I hav ever scandalized the church I ask pardon of God and of it. Signed Voltaire. March 2, 1778, in the house of the Marquis de Villette in the presence of the Abbe Mignot, my nephew, and of the Marquis de Villevielle, my friend.'"

We can assure our friend that Mr. Parton does not say that Voltaire recanted. Neither does anybody else who knows the circumstances of his death, except ministers and editors of pious papers, who make no scruple in perverting the truth to their own base purposes. But Mr. Parton does giv the above profession of faith, which is undoubtedly genuin. Mr. Parton tells the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so far as he can. Anybody who imagins that his "Life of Voltaire" is a partisan work, concealing his hero's faults, is mistaken. Mr. Parton has given us the life of Voltaire just as it was. It has never been pretended that Voltaire was a saint, but take him all in all, put his work for humanity in one side of the scales and his personal faults in the other, and he must be conceded to be the grandest man of his time. He believed in God, hated superstition, and loved his fellow-man. He did more than any one else to break the hold the church had upon the people of Europe. He was a man of letters, of science, a lover of art, a patron of the drama. In his personal affairs he was a man of the world, yet a good deal better and more moral than the kings and courtesans—all good Christians—among whom he lived. He braved the anger of the church, when although "living virgins were merchandise which the king himself bought, a light song about the Virgin could bring a man to the fire." And for it he has been execrated by that church, and the cry has been echoed by Protestants who hate the Catholic church as vigorously as Voltaire did, and who, did they but know it, are in closer sympathy with some of his views than are the Infidels they so persistently revile. But he was a Freethinker and heretic, and it is a part of the Christian gospel to slander all such, whose arguments they cannot refute.

Voltaire's "profession of faith" was written and signed simply that when dead he might not, as he expressed it, be "thrown into the sewer." He knew what could be expected for a heretic. The sight of the burial of poor Adrienne Lecouvreur never left him. The great actress was a warm friend of his, and when she went one night from the scene of her triumphs at the theater "to die after four days of anguish, Voltaire hastened to her bedside, and watched near her during her last struggle for life; and when she was seized with the convulsions that preceded her death, he held her in his arms and received her last breath. Being an actress, and dying without absolution, she was denied 'Christian burial,' and the gate of every recognized burial place in France was closed against her wasted body, the poor relics of a gifted and bewitching woman, whom all that was distinguished and splendid in the society of her nativ land had loved to look upon. At night her body was carried in an old coach (fiacre) a little way out of town, just beyond the paved streets, to a spot near the Seine now covered by the house No. 109 Rue de Bourgogne. The fiacre was followed by one friend, two street-porters, and a squad of the city watch. There her remains were buried, the grave was filled up, and the spot remained unin-closed and unmarked until the city grew over it and concealed it from view.

"The brilliant world of which she had been a part heard of this unseemly burial with such horror, such disgust, such rage, such 'stupor,' as we can with difficulty imagin, because all those ties of tenderness and pride that bind families and communities together are more sensitiv, if not stronger, in France than with our ruder, robuster race. The idea of not having friendly and decorous burial, of not lying down at last with kindred and fellow-citizens in a place appointed for the dead, of being taken out at night and buried at a corner of a road like a dead cat, was and is utterly desolating to the French people. Voltaire, for example, could never face it; he lived and died dreading it."

It is no wonder he wished to avoid such a burial as that; most Frenchmen would hav done a great deal more than sign such a "profession of faith" to hav avoided it. All that the "profession" says anyway is that "if God disposes of me, I die in the Catholic church," and it is not hard to belong to that institution if one wants to. A very slight ceremony will suffice, and a change of faith is in no wise necessary. The clause that "if I ever scandalized the church, I ask pardon of God and of it," was added at the requisition of the priest, and as Voltaire said, "to hav peace." This "profession of faith" is not a "profession" at all. It nowhere recants what he had all his life been saying, that the church is a monster sapping the life of nations, and should be crushed. He had his reasons for doing what he did, which cannot be better stated than by quoting Parton. When he returned to Paris after his long exile he was overwhelmed with work, so much so that "his health visibly declined." "Standing so many hours every day to receive company caused his feet to swell, for he had been accustomed at home to spend most of the working day upon his bed. Other painful and menacing symptoms warned him of the risk he was incurring, and he began to foresee the need of making arrangements in Paris to avoid the indignity of being denied burial. Ferney being five days' laborious journey from Paris, if he were taken sick, he could scarcely hope to be again in a condition to travel so far. He had had visits from several unbeneficed priests, besides the one whose coming he related to Madame du Deffand. One of these Wagnière had had the pleasure of hustling out of the room; but there was another, the Abbé Gaultier, who seemed more tolerable than the rest, and him he had received very politely, as a good-natured simpleton, who would be content with the minimum of concession from a penitent like himself. About February 20th, when he had been ten days in Paris, he consulted D'Alembert upon the delicate point in question, and in a letter to the king of Prussia D'Alembert mentioned the advice he gave:

"'He asked me,' wrote D'Alembert, 'in the course of a confidential conversation, how I should advise him to proceed if, during his stay in Paris, he should happen to fall dangerously ill. My reply was such as every prudent [sage] man would hav made in my place, that he would do well to conduct himself, in that case, like all the philosophers who had preceded him; among others, like Fontenelle and Montesquieu, who had followed the usage, "and received you know what with much reverence." He much approved my reply. "I think the same," said he to me; "for I must not be thrown into the kennel, as I saw poor Lecouvreur." He had, I know not why, much aversion to that manner of being interred. I avoided combating this aversion, desiring that, in case we should lose him, all should pass without trouble and without scandal.'

"Fortified thus by the advice of the most eminent of his co-workers, he looked to the Abbé Gaultier, chaplain to the Hospital for the Incurable, as the man upon whom to call in case of need. That unhappy case soon arrived.

"February 25th, his fifteenth day at Paris, about noon, as he was dictating in bed to Wagnière, he coughed violently three times, and a moment after cried out, 'Oh! oh! I am spitting blood.' The secretary turned toward him, and saw blood bursting from his nose and mouth, 'with the same violence,' he says, 'as when the faucet is turned of a fountain upon which there is pressure.' Wagnière rang, and Madame Denis came. Dr. Tronchin was sent for. All the household came running in, and the room was soon filled with people. 'He ordered me,' says Wagnière, 'to write to the Abbé Gaultiere, to ask him to come and speak to him, as he did not wish to be thrown into the sewers. I avoided sending my letter, not wishing to hav it said that M. de Voltaire had shown weakness. I assured him that the abbé could not be found. Then he said to the persons who were in the room, "At least, gentlemen, you will be witness that I hav asked to fulfill what are here called our duties" [devoirs.]'

"For three or four days the patient was extremely weak, and sufficiently obedient to the doctor's orders. Very slowly, and with frequent relapses, he gained a little strength. Several of the notes which he wrote and dictated to Dr. Tronchin during his dubious convalescence hav been preserved, all of which contain gleams of his wonted gayety and complaisance. An ill turn, however, induced him to send again for the Abbé Gaultier. Upon his arrival, the patient said to him, 'Some days ago I invited you to come and see me for you know what. If you please, we will at once transact that little business.' The abbé replied, 'Very willingly,' and requested all present to leave the room. 'The patient wished us to remain,' says Wagnière, 'but the Abbé Gaultier did not.' So they all went out, and left the priest alone with his penitent for an hour. On that morning D'Alembert visited him, and his narrativ, as given in his letter to the king of Prussia, is the best source of our information concerning what followed:

"'Finding himself worse than usual on one of the days of his sickness, he bravely took the part of doing what he had agreed upon. During a visit which I paid him in the morning, as he spoke to me with considerable vehemence, and as I begged him to be silent in order not to distress his chest, he said to me, laughing, 'Talk I must, whether I wish it or not; don't you remember that I hav to confess? The moment has come, as Henry IV. said, to make the perilous leap; so I hav sent for the Abbe Gaultier, and I am waiting for him.' This Abbe Gaultier, sire, is a poor devil of a priest, who, of his own motion and from mere good will, introduced himself to M. de Voltaire some days before his sickness, and offered him, in case of need, his ecclesiastical services. M. de Voltaire accepted them, because this man appeared to him more moderate and reasonable than three or four other wretched priests [capelans], who, without being sent for, and without any more knowing Voltaire than the Abbe Gaultier, had come to his room to preach to him like fanatics, to announce to him hell and the judgments of God, and whom the old patriarch, from goodness of heart, had not ordered to be thrown out of the window. This Abbe Gaultier arrived, then, was shut up an hour with the sick man, and came out so well satisfied that he wished to go at once to get at the parish church what we call the bon Dieu. This the sick man did not wish, 'for the reason,' said he, 'that I am spitting blood, and I might by ill chance spit out something else.' He gave to this Abbe Gaultier, who asked him for it, a profession of faith, written entirely with his own hand, and by which he declared that he wished to die in the Catholic religion, in which he was born, hoping from the divine mercy that God would deign to pardon all his faults; and added that, if he had ever scandalized the church, he asked pardon from God and from it. He added this last article at the requisition of the priest, 'and,' said he, 'to hav peace.' He gave this profession of faith to the Abbe Gaultier in the presence of his family and of those of his friends who were in his chamber, two of whom signed as witnesses at the bottom of the profession.

"Wagnière, being a Protestant, and in extreme ill-humor with the persons surrounding his 'dear master,' regarded this transaction with such sorrow and indignation that, when Voltaire asked him what was the matter with him, he could not command his voice to reply. Four days before this ceremonial, at a moment when it appeared certain that the patient could not recover, and he felt sure himself that he was dying, Wagnière begged him to state precisely his 'way of thinking.' He asked for paper and ink; then wrote, signed, and gave to his secretary the following declaration:

"'I die, adoring God, loving my friends, not hating my enemies, and detesting superstition. February 28, 1778. VOLTAIRE.'"

"With this paper in his possession, and having Swiss ideas of the sanctity of the seriously spoken word of a dying man, poor Wagnière was aghast at the tone of the company on this occasion. 'When,' he says, 'the Abbé Gaultier invited us to reënter the room, he said to us, "M. de Voltaire has given me a little declaration, which does not signify much. I beg you will be so good as to sign it also." The Abbé Mignot and the Marquis de Villevielle signed it without hesitation, and without knowing its contents. The abbé then came to me, and asked me to do the same thing. I refused him. He insisted much. M. de Voltaire observed with surprise the vivacity with which I spoke to the Abbé Gaultier. I replied at last, tired of this persecution, that I neither would nor could sign, as I was a Protestant. He then let me alone. He next proposed to the sick man to giv him the communion. He replied, "Mr. Abbé, observe that I continually spit blood; I must beware of mingling that of the good God with mine." The confessor did not reply. He was asked to retire, and he went out.' Before leaving he received from his penitent a gift of twenty-five louis for 'the poor of the parish;' which also was according to polite usage.

"He said to the Abbé Duvernet, 'They will not throw me into the kennel, for I hav confessed to the Abbe Gaultier.'"

Voltaire, having thus prepared to die, got strong again and enjoyed many triumphs. Later when he was again upon the sickbed, and knew he must pass away, he wanted no religious ministrations. He had made his bargain and more hypocrisy than was necessary to accomplish his ends was distasteful to him. If necessary to get a decent burial he would hav kissed the pope's toe, but having fulfilled his share of the contract he wanted to hear no more about it. He knew, and the priest knew, why he did it, and it was no use to make sentiment out of a purely business transaction.

He lay dying for several days, getting weaker, and weaker, but suffering little pain. "He recognized," says Parton, "some of his old friends when they came near his bedside or spoke to him. 'I visited him when he was in this condition,' says D'Alembert, 'and he always knew me. He even used some expressions of friendship; but, immediately after, would fall again into his stupor, for he was in a continual slumber. He awoke only to complain, and to say that he had come to Paris to die.'

"Two days after the incident of the Count de Lally, the Abbé Mingot, who was a considerable personage, a member of the Grand Council, as well as the titular and beneficed head of an abbey, called upon the curé of Saint-Sulpice, and explained to him his uncle's condition. With regard to what followed the best authority is the narrativ drawn up by D'Alembert for the information of the king of Prussia—a narrativ which is confirmed by all the eye-witnesses who placed their observations on record.

"The cure of Saint-Sulpice replied to the Abbe Mingot that, since M. de Voltaire had lost his recollection, it was useless to visit him. The cure declared, however, that if M. de Voltaire did not make a public, solemn, and most circumstantial reparation of the scandal he had caused he could not in conscience bury him in holy ground. In vain the nephew replied that his uncle, while he still enjoyed the possession of all his faculties, had made a profession of faith, which the cure himself had recognized as authentic; that he had always disavowed the works imputed to him; that he had, nevertheless, carried his docility for the ministers of the church so far as to declare that, if he had caused any scandal, he asked pardon for it. The cure replied that that did not suffice; that M. de Voltaire was notoriously the declared enemy of religion; and that he could not, without compromising himself with the clergy and with the archbishop, accord to him ecclesiastical burial. The Abbe Mignot threatened to apply to the parliament for justice, which he hoped to obtain with the authentic documents he had in his possession. The cure, who felt that he was supported by authority, told him that he could do as he pleased.

. . . "On Saturday, May 30th, the day of his death, some hours before that fatal moment, the Abbe Gaultier again offered his services, in a letter which he wrote to the Abbe Mignot; who went at once in quest of the Abbe Gaultier and the cure of Saint-Sulpice. The cure approached the sick man, and pronounced in his hearing the words Jesus Christ. At these words M. de Voltaire, who was still in a stupor, opened his eyes, and made a gesture with his hand, as if to send the cure away, and said, 'Let me die in peace.' The cure, more moderate on this occasion and more reasonable than usual with him, turned toward those who were present, and said, 'You see plainly, gentlemen, that he has not his head.'

"At that moment, however, he had complete possession of his reason; but the persons present, as you may well believe, sire, took no pains to contradict the cure. That pitiful parson [capelan] then retired from the chamber, and in the conversation which he held with the family, he was so maladroit as to betray himself, and to prove clearly that all his conduct was an affair of vanity. He told them that they had done very ill to summon the Abbe Gaultier, who had spoiled everything; that they should hav addressed themselvs to him alone, the parish priest of the sick man; that he would hav seen him in private and without witnesses; and that he would hav arranged everything."

"The Abbé Gaultier's narrativ does not materially differ from that of D'Alembert.

"Belle-et-Bonne, who never left his bedside during these last days, said to Lady Morgan in Paris forty years afterwards, as she did to every one with whom she ever conversed on the subject, 'To his last moment everything he said and did breathed the benevolence and goodness of his character; all announced in him tranquility, peace, resignation, except a little movement of ill-humor which he showed to the curé of Saint-Sulpice, when he begged him to withdraw, and said, "Let me die in peace."'

"He lingered until late in the evening. Ten minutes before he breathed his last, he roused from his slumber, took the hand of his valet, pressed it, and said to him, 'Adieu, my dear Morand; I am dying.' These were his last words. He died peacefully and without pain, at a quarter past eleven, on Saturday evening, May 30, 1778, aged eighty-three years, six months, and nine days.

"The sentiment entertained by Voltaire for the useless rites he was obliged to submit to is shown in his letter to the king of Prussia, written seven years before his death:

"I do not fear death, which approaches apace; but I hav an unconquerable aversion for the manner in which we hav to die in our holy, Catholic, apostolic, and Roman religion. It seems to me extremely ridiculous to hav myself oiled to depart to the other world as we grease the axles of our wagons before a trip. This stupidity and all that follows is so repugnant to me that I am tempted to hav myself carried to Neufchâtel to hav the pleasure of dying within your dominions" (Voltaire in Exile, p. 49).

In the year 1777, but a little while before his death, he wrote to the same person, "I hav more aversion than ever for extreme unction and those who administer it."

Mr. Parton's work is almost without comment on Voltaire's motives in summoning a priest. All the way through the reader is left to form his own conclusions upon Voltaire. The truth, so far as ascertainable, is stated, and when the authority for anything is doubtful Mr. Parton has no hesitancy in saying so. An expression of opinion from him would be particularly valuable, as from his extensiv reading and study of Voltaire and his works he knows the motivs which actuated the great French heretic better than most people, however diligent students of history they may hav been.

One of the best proofs that Voltaire did not recant is that the ecclesiastical authorities who were over the "poor devil of a priest," Gaultier, denied him sepulture, and although his bones were laid in the Abbey of Scellières it was only because they arrived a little ahead of the prohibition of the Bishop of Troyes. The prior of the abbey was very nearly expelled because of his permitting Voltaire's body to be received. He was compelled to visit Paris, and it was only after much trouble that he overcame the persecution of his brother church officials.

For thirteen years the body of Voltaire remained in the vault of the village church in Champagne. Then by a grand triumphal procession it was removed to Paris, where it rested one night and part of the next day upon the ruins of the Bastile on the very spot where when living he had been confined. All Paris visited the spot and paid its tribute of love and respect to him. The body was then transported in magnificent procession to the Pantheon, where it remained until the return of the Bourbon king to Paris, after the departure of Bonaparte to Elba. In 1814 the royalists represented to the ministry that the presence of Voltaire's remains in the ancient church of Sainte-Geneviève was an outrage not to be borne by the church, and "one night in the month of May, 1814, the bones of Voltaire and of Rousseau were taken out of their coffins of lead, tumbled into a common sack, and placed in a hackney coach stationed in the rear of the church. The carriage moved away slowly, accompanied by five or six persons, and went out of town by unfrequented streets to the barrier De la Gare, opposit Bercy. Near that barrier there was then an extensiv piece of waste ground inclosed by a board fence, public property, not yet put to any use whatever. Near the middle of the inclosure a deep hole had been previously dug by persons who were then waiting for the arrival of this strange burial party. The sack of bones was emptied into a pit; a sack of lime was poured upon them. The hole was filled up with earth, all traces of the meeting were obliterated as far as possible, and the party then separated in silence.

"The secret was well kept. There was occasionally a rumor, difficult to trace, and not generally believed, that the sarcophagus was empty. In 1864, when the family of the Villettes became extinct, the heart of Voltaire (which had been removed from the body when it was embalmed, in 1778, inclosed in a silver vase and given by Madame Denis to the husband of Belle-et-Bonne) became the property of the nation, and it was a question with the usurper what should be done with it. He suggested that it be placed with the other remains of the poet in the church of Sainte-Geneviève. The Archbishop of Paris, who was probably acquainted with these facts, observed that it might be well to ascertain first whether the ashes of Voltaire were really in the place where they had been deposited. An examination of the sarcophagus was ordered. It was opened, and found to be empty. Thus the fate actually befell the remains which the poet had dreaded from the time when he saw the body of Adrienne Lecouvreur carried out, at dead of night, and placed in an unmarked grave in a vacant lot of the outskirts of Paris." (Parton's Life of Voltaire).

Thus the church wreaked her cowardly revenge upon the bones of her great enemy. Voltaire dreaded this fate, and to avoid it he made the "profession of faith" quoted above. He ought to hav known the church better. He might hav known that she has no heart, no conscience, no sense of honor. None knew better than he that her course for centuries had been deceit and treachery. As well might he hav suffered himself to be embraced by a serpent. But we cannot find it in our hearts to blame him for this. His life had been a stormy and tempestuous existence. He had been exiled, had been in the Bastile for his heresy. He had seen the body of poor Adrienne Lecouvreur thrown into the ground like a dog because she did not believe in the Christian religion. He had seen the unseemly strife of priests over corpses which had not received the sacrament and could not be buried in consecrated ground. The priests controled the bodies of the people living and dead, whoever controled their souls. Voltaire's whole being revolted at the thought of being treated like a brute. He wanted no wrangle over him when dying, and when dead he wanted decent sepulture. That he could not get outside of the church. All graveyards were consecrated, and the only place a heretic's bones could hav was the roadside or a waste field. And so he played the hypocrit, jesting while he did so, and ridiculing the sacrament he was receiving. Perhaps it would hav been better had Voltaire never acted the part he did, but after death, at least, he wanted peace. The horrid burial of the dead actress was ever before him, and he could see the lonely cortege going out to the "corner of a road" in the night to bury her who had died without absolution. He revolted at such an ending; and who can blame him for it? If by the simple writing of a few words he could, as he thought, secure decent burial, and an end to strife, small blame can attach to one who sought to "crush the monster" all his life. He calmly prepared for death, and in order not to be thrown into the kennel like poor Lecouvreur, he got a "poor devil of priest, a good-natured simpleton who would be content with the minimum of concession," to perform some rites which would let him into a decent graveyard. He drove a hard bargain with the church, getting what he wanted without giving an equivalent, and it is well he did, for the church repudiated her part of the contract after his death.

This is, as it appears to us, a true history of the death of Voltaire. Accounts differ in some minor degree, but in essentials all are a unit. Voltaire never "recanted," and those Christians who say he did speak without authority, and upon a subject about which they hav taken little pains to inform themselvs. Before they talk further as to what Mr. Parton says they will do well to possess themselvs of his work, and not take it second-hand from those who think that if the word of God has more abounded through the apostle's lie, they would also be held sinless for following his example.

The Bennett-Mair Discussion.

To those of our readers who hav perused the book as it was printed in these columns it is not necessary to say that this is a very valuable work for reference and interesting to peruse. It has been said by many that Mr. Mair was the ablest upholder of Christianity they ever read, and it is safe to say that whatever arguments could be adduced in favor of Christianity were brought forward by the gentleman. But falsehood, however ably upheld, cannot stand where the truth is known; and Mr. Bennett has shown this most clearly. Under his sledgehammer blows the theology of Mr. Mair crumbles to dust. He has a very effectiv way of putting his arguments, and he never leaves a point in doubt, but piles proof on proof, mountain high, until the enemy is completely overwhelmed in a mass of evidence.

Mr. Bennett affirms all the propositions—we had almost said truisms—and Mr. Mair denies with what power he can. He brings to the defense of Christianity the best arguments that can be adduced. His letters show painstaking care and a familiarity with authors unexcelled by any layman. Indeed, few professional theologians could draw from the arsenal of the church better weapons. But he is met at every point and disarmed with a promptness that shows Mr. Bennett to be more than his match, and no less familiar with authors. Mr. Mair knows only one side, while Mr. Bennett knows both, and he has not failed to show that Christianity is weak and indefensible, founded on assumptions, supplemented by deceit, and extremely weak in the essentials of proof.

This work will do a great amount of good wherever read. All who hav read it in the paper will want it in book form to preserve, while for the new subscriber it will possess the added charm of newness. It contains 969 pages; price. $7.50.

Mr. Mair's Rating.

BATAVIA, N. Y., Nov. 4, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Please say in your paper how you rate G. M. Mair in his profession, or whether you rate him at all in the book containing the Bennett-Mair discussion, as he may be rejected as authority. I want the book, but I want to know whether he is classed high or not classed at all. I think he should be rated high to make it interesting. L. M. WILSON.

Mr. Mair is not a minister, but as he has ministerial connections, he undoubtedly speaks ex cathedra on the subject of Christianity. He is a much abler man than many ministers, and we think that he made as good a defense of his religion as any one could, even with the whole alphabet tacked on to his name. He understands his subject, and did his best; and in overthrowing him Mr. Bennett overthrew the dogmas of the Christian theology. We rate him as one of the smartest young laymen in the church.

DURING Mr. Bennett's stay in London he purchased and had sent home a few copies of several English books, which will be of interest to our readers. Among them were "The Freethinkers' Text-Book," part I., by Bradlaugh, price, $1; and part II., by Mrs. Besant, price, $1.25; "Mind in Animals," by Büchner, price, $1.50; Bradlaugh's "Theological Debates," price, $1; Secular Almanac for 1882, price, 25 cents; and "Five Dead Men Whom I Knew When Living," by Bradlaugh, being sketches of the careers of Robert Owen, Joseph Mazzini, John Stuart Mill, Charles Sumner, and Ledru Rollin. We shall take pleasure in supplying these works; and as we hav but a limited number of copies, those who want them will do well to order early.

As the time slips by we are reminded that many subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER are getting in arrears. We hope they will not long remain so. The past few months are the dullest months with newspapers, and the receipts are the lighest, while the expenses are just as heavy as at any time. We hope those friends whose subscriptions hav expired will bear this fact in mind and renew at once without waiting for us to send them bills. It takes time and money to send out hundreds of bills, which would be unnecessary if all would watch their tab and remit promptly. We hope to hear from those in arrears right away.

The Harmony and Meaning of the Scientific Gospels.

TWO LECTURES DELIVERED BEFORE THE N. Y. LIBERAL CLUB BY T. B. WAKEMAN.

LECTURE I.

We are thus brought to the seventh Harmony of Science, viz.:

VII.—THAT ALL KNOWLEDGE IS NOT ONLY RELATIVE TO MAN, BUT IS IN ITS ORIGIN AND EXTENT THE RESULT OF EXPERIENCE.

To use the phrase of Mr. J. S. Mill, all human knowledge is "experiential." It has arisen wholly from the contact of mankind with their environment, that is, of the Ego with its non-Ego.

The long-continued discussion between the experience and the innate-idea schools of philosophy has been concluded by the solution brought to light in the Sciences of Sociology and Psychology. They have given a substantial victory to the experiential philosophy. That result was indeed implied in the change from the universe to the cosmos; from the absolute to the relative theory of knowledge.

The old maxim, "Nil in intellectu, quod non prius in sensu" (There is nothing in the intellect that has not been first in the senses), has received the necessary qualifications and explanations, which leave it invincible.

Few chapters in Philosophy are more interesting than the discussions on this subject. The reader with a taste for the inquiry may follow it from Hobbes and Locke to Hartley, then in James Mill's masterly Analysis of the human Mind, then in John Stuart Mill's Examination of the Philosophy of Sir Wm. Hamilton and Prof. Bain's works on "The Senses and Intellect," and "The Emotions and Will," and finally in Herbert Spencer and Prof. Fiske. These philosophers have left Kant and most of the speculations prior to him on these subjects so far behind, that they have now only a historical interest or value. In fact, the evolution biologists and phychologists have reached the solving word of all the difficulties that the experience school had hitherto been subjected to. That word is HEREDITY.

This word, added to their other potent laws of association and evolution, enables them to lay their foundation, not only upon Sociology but also upon Psychology as a true verifiable science.

For instance, to the Latin maxim above quoted, Liebnitz with great applause added the words, "Nisi intellectus ipse"—"Except the intellect itself." Thereafter in answer to Hume Kant wrote his great work, "The Critique of Pure or Transendental Reason," that is, of reason independent of sensation, and gave a list or category of laws and necessities of thought independent of sensation.

On all sides it was then claimed that certain ideas or conceptions were true, universal, necessary, and intuitive, and therefore independent of experience and innate. For instance:

That twice two are four,
That the whole is greater than a part,
That two lines cannot inclose space,
That every event had an antecedent,
That a thing cannot be where it is not,
And all of the axioms of mathematics.

Now Spencer and Fiske, and our Scientific Biologists, show that we have only to change the point of view from the individual to the race to discover that experience which by association has evolved these ideas so that they have become not only true but universal and necessary.

Their method is this, the race for countless thousands of years has had certain invariable experiences, e.g., that a whole is greater than a part, or negatively, "that a thing cannot be where it is not," or, "that two straight lines never meet."

The universality and invariability of this experience has made the opposite of these proposition unthinkable and inconceivable, because of total absence of any experience to make the conception of their opposite possible.

The contrary cannot be even thought, because there has never been any experience that could render them thinkable. Thus, constant tuition by heredity becomes intuition.

This is not a dry and barren inquiry, it bears important fruit, for it gives us,

(1.) The Test of Truth.

"What is Truth?" asked jesting Pilate, and would not stay for an answer, says Bacon. But the Roman governor seemed to have been serious enough and in no haste. The trouble was that he could get no answer. At that period of the world there was no answer to give. There was no Science or method by which to define truth or to know it when found. It has taken Psychology from Descartes to Spencer to work out the answer to Pilate's question. Had it been given to him in Prof. Fiske's words it would likely have fallen upon his Roman ear as stranger than Hebrew. For he says, "Truth, the end of all honest and successful research, is obtained when subjective relations are adjusted to objective relations." Or in short, it is the agreement of thoughts with things. Thoughts that thus agree we can "trow" or trust to, thence the word truth, says etymology, that which we can trow, i.e., trust and rest upon.

Now, what is the test of this agreement? Mill, following Hume, says it is "the uniformity of experience." Spencer says it is "the inconceivability of the opposite."

These philcsophical knights have had a spirited contest over these formulas, to which happily we will only need to refer. The whole controversy has fallen into the past since Lewes, Bain, and Fiske have shown that both were right, each disputing about a different side of the same shield. On the objective side it is, as Mill puts it, invariability of the experience that makes the test, while on the subjective side it is, as Spencer puts it, the inconceivability of the opposite, because there has been no experience to make it conceivable. So may such strifes ever end. Compare Bain's Logic, chap. v; Lewes' History of Philosophy; Fiske's Cosmic Philosophy.

Now if we turn to the subjective side of this test we find the effect of heredity has been to add to the word good the idea of right. The idea of right as the permanent good has become an unconscious and instinctive quality of great practical value morally, but the origin of it in experience is now clearly made out. We thus have a test of the good and the right.

That all of our knowledge is experiential in its origin brings us to a second conclusion of importance, viz.,

(2) The nature and extent and origin of our knowledge of existence.

This has been boasted as the question that makes an end of the Positive Philosophy, and turns it into an Irish bull, as the Duke of Argyle has said. Mr. Thornton, in his essay called "Huxleyism," to be found in the contemporary Review for 1872, and his book, "Modern Metaphysics and Old School Ethics," has presented the difficulty squarely, taking Prof. Huxley's lecture on Des Cartes as his text.

The point is this: How can mankind be the result of a world that exists only as a mode of its own experience; or, How can man, or mankind, have been born in the house he himself has built?

But this objection has no force against the Positive Scientist, nor even against the scientific Idealist.

1. The positive or phenomenal scientist does not deny, but rather admits, the existence of an external objective world, although he thinks he knows it and can know it only as a mode of human sensation. All that man can know are phenomena and their relations in succession and coëxistence, yet both Comte and Herbert Spencer assert that back of or under the phenomena lie the matter or substance—the thing in itself (Substrata) that we are compelled to infer and assume, but of which, for want of experience, we can have no knowledge whatever.

Thus Comte, in Conversation VII. of the Positive Catechism, says, "But the world could exist without man, as is perhaps the case with many stars, which are not fit for man to live in." The whole of the Positive Philosophy can stand readily enough upon the assumption that there is an external objective world that could and would exist were the human race to be wholly destroyed.

Herbert Spencer has most laboriously defended this assumption in his "Psychology." Let any who wish to see what can be said on this subject read his chapters in Part Seven of Volume II. of his "Psychology."

Philosophers who, like Comte and Spencer, assume an unknowable external world as the basis of the phenomenal world knowable to man, may be called Substantialists. That theory is that an unknowable objective stands under (Latin, Sub, under, and Sto, I stand) and supports the phenomena. The great mass of mankind, and even of scientists, seem to be satisfied with this hypothesis or assumption, and think it futile to seek for any other theory of the existence of the world or cause of phenomena.

These philosophers, one and all, admit that this substance is wholly unknowable and inscrutable to man. This unknowable world of substance is quite harmless in their view, and is a perfect defense against Mr. Thornton's Irish bull. For man is the product of an infinite, unknowable, objective world that exists independent of him.

2. On the other hand the Scientific Idealists, with a more subtle analysis, supported by the great names of Descartes, Berkeley, Hume, Kant, Fichte, Hegel, and of late also of Mill, Huxley, Sterling, and others, while it does not deny that the external world is phenomenally and practically what the Substantialists and all mankind practically say it is, are not satisfied with the assumption that "a substance" underlies and causes the phenomena or the sensations felt by mankind. They regard that hypothesis as wholly gratuitous and stupidly unscientific because there is and can be no proof of it. They ask how can there be any knowledge or proof of the existence of this "substance" when man can never get beyond his own sensations and phenomena. If knowledge is experiential in its whole nature and origin, how can man have any proof or knowledge of that of which man can never have any possible experience? If we fall back upon Herbert Spencer's test of truth and say that it is impossible not to think or conceive of this unknown substance, they answer by proceeding to conceive and think an opposite theory very readily, and after this manner:

According to the evolution theory, our animal existence, of which our human existence is the continuation, began low down in the organic world with that first consciousness by which the difference of objective and subjective (of Ego and non-Ego; i. e., the world) had its birth and beginning.

What there was before this human world thus began; what there is besides it; what there will be after it; whether matter, motion, space, or time have any existence except within it—to these and similar questions the scientific idealist has no answer except that the relativity of all human knowledge renders an answer by us impossible. The non-ego rests upon the ego and is not conceivable except by it. To use the words of Prof. Haeckel and Mr. Lewes, the known world is at bottom monistic and not dualistic. It is simply man's world. Would the immensity and the starry sky and the earth cease to be were the human race to cease?

The Idealist, the pure Humanist, replies, we have no possible way of knowing. Do not the remains of extinct animals and the whole science of astronomy and geology, indeed all of the sciences, show that the world existed forever before human or any consciousness began?

His answer is that the world as it exists is rereally one and always the present, which we extend backward or forward as past, or future, but that all the world and all time and all space are in ultimate analysis to us but a mode of human consciousness. That therein are included the remains of other animals, shows only that other organisms are conceived of by man as having had, as they now have, other worlds of their own.

If the next question should be, How does each Ego, then, know of the existence of its fellow-beings and other animals and their worlds? The answer is given by Mr. Mill in his "Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy," that each person has more knowledge of such existence than of the existence of his own eternal world. For by analogy he infers that organisms, appearing to him like his own in form and actions, should evolve a similar consciousness and thus have a world similar to his own.

This hypothesis he verifies and finds to be true by the most abundant experience, in which he finds that the consciousness of each constantly answers to and touches and interweaves itself with the others, so that the social organism results. Our consciousness includes that of others as a part and condition of itself, and thereby knows and annexes their worlds to us as a part of our own, and so the human race requires and has a world in common.

Thus the external world and its time and space is the consensus and agreement of the consolidated consciousness of organic beings, and especially of mankind. But no two persons see the same rainbow; neither, strictly speaking, do they see the same world. Yet both exist to them as they are seen, and there is a practical agreement because their eyes see alike. But let the eyes change, or the other senses change, and each observer would have and live in a different world. This truth is too often overlooked in judging of other people, and especially of savage peoples and of the lower animals. We should never forget that they cannot have, and that they do not live in, any such world as ours. Each consciousness, civilized, savage, and animal, is the center of its own world and the measure of it, and we agree only as our worlds agree, i. e., as our experiences agree.

Thus to the scientific Idealist his own consciousness is but a part of the consciousness of his race, and that is but the subjective counterpart of the objective world acquired by his race. To the Idealist both objective and subjective came into existence together, and both continue and end together.

This knowable world cannot be thought of as existing without the subjective half nor without the objective half. Nor can any other world be known to exist upon which any bull, Irish other, can stand to overthrow the purely human world of the Idealist. It has grown up as a part of the consciousness of human and even of animal life; and what is outside of it, who knows?

The scientific Idealist is thus invincible on his own ground. To the question how he could have been alive to build the house or world in which he was born, he replies, like the snail or the lobster, that his world is not a building but a growth, merely his own outer covering, and that it began with him, or with the line of conscious existences of which he is a part, and that for all that he can know it will end with him.

But is there no solution and reconciliation of these views of the objective substantialists, and the subjective Idealists? There is, as we have intimated, in taking Man as the center and solution of both. The whole difficulty is merely a confusion of the objective and subjective views, because each is taken by its exponents as complete and sufficient in itself, instead of being but one side of the arch of existence with Man as the keystone. Man can think and know because his consciousness divides into two sides of an equation subjective and objective. He stands between and balances the two, but neither has a knowable existence without the consciousness, the Ego, which stands between them. He can only correctly explain the external objective world by considering it as a part of his own subjective consciousness or sensation. Otherwise he must take up with the unscientific assumption of a substance or thing in itself. But reversely, he can only explain his own sensations and consciousness by considering them the part of an objectively conceived world. Neither can have an explaination without the other. But what is the cause, center, union, and reconciliation of the two? The answer is Man, that is, HUMANITY. That is the solving center of the world—of all that we know of existence. Nothing can be cleared up without that word.

AN EXTENSIV EXAMINATION OF LORD BOLINGBROKE'S DOCTRINS.

CHAPTER XI.

JESUS AND HIS DISCIPLES.

Jesus evidently, was a coarse peasant of Judea with more intelligence than most of his neighbors. Without knowing how to read or write, he attempted to organize a sect in opposition to the Rechabites, Therapeuts, Essenians, Pharisees, Sadducees, and Herodians. These sects originated among and were organized since the establishment of the Jews in Alexandria. I hav already compared Christ to Fox, who was an ignorant man and had his origin among the lowest classes of people. He preached at times very good morality and, above all, taught that which is so flattering to the people—Equality. Fox established a society which, in a short time, diverged from his original principles. The sect founded by Jesus did the same. Both Christ and Fox preached against the priesthood of their respectiv times. But the law was more lenient in England than in Judea. In England the priests had the power only to put Fox in the pillory, but in Judea the priests forced Pilate to have Jesus lashed and then hung on a cross like a thieving slave. This was barbarous, but each nation to its own tastes.* De justibus non disputandum. It is really a matter of no importance to know how the Jews nailed Jesus to the cross, but it seems to me quite a feat for an ignorant set of Jews in a country where there was little or no iron to get a nail long enough to pierce through two feet, one on top of the other, as it is said was done. The Jews, however, were quite capable of such an unworthy and atrocious action.

The disciples remained as faithfully attached to their crucified leader as the Quakers were to their pilloried patriarch. A few of the disciples were sharp enough to whisper it around that their master was resurrected. This tale was all the more credited by the friends of the apostles because the question whether resurrection was possible was very violently discussed about this time. The Platonic philosophy, very popular in Alexandria, among the Jews, may hav aided the growth of the Christian sect and the absurd mysteries connected with it.† But we will develop this in another chapter.

* In vol. v, p. 289 of Lord Bolingbroke's collected works we find the following: "Let us suppose a great prince governing a wicked and rebellious people. He has it in his power to punish, but thinks fit to pardon them. But he orders his only and well-beloved son to be put to death to expiate their sins and satisfy his royal vengeance. Would this proceeding appear to the eye of reason, and in the unprejudiced light of nature, wise, or just, or good? No man dares to say that it would except it be a divine."

† On page 51 of the same volume as above Bolingbroke says: "In general the Platonic and Christian systems hav a very near resemblance, qualis decet esse sororum, and several of the ancient fathers and modern divines hav endeavored to make it appear still greater. Plato must hav been the precursor of the Savior, and of more importance than St John." [Notes by Translator.]

League Notes from Illinois.

FRIENDS OF LIBERALISM IN ILLINOIS, Dear Friends: I hav just completed my year's missionary trip over Illinois, in the interest of the cause which should be dear to the heart of every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER. During the fourteen months and fifteen days that I was gone from Rockford on that trip I traveled between two and three thousand miles with my horse and buggy, and I believe I hav done some good and lasting work for our cause. But financially I am about one hundred dollars out of pocket by my trip. Yet, nothing daunted, I am preparing to sell my horse and buggy to raise the means wherewith to make another year's trip over this state by rail, and I hope to be able to accomplish more for our noble cause the coming year than I hav in the year past. For I hope to get the Liberal League movement thoroughly established in Illinois before the next session of the National Liberal League Congress next fall in St. Louis. But in order that I may make a success of my undertaking it is necessary that I should hav your help and coöperation. Now, my Liberal friends, please let me hear from you. Send for blank applications and instructions as to organizing local Leagues. And all who can who desire see our cause advance please send me one dollar each, as a life-membership fee to the State Liberal League of Illinois. This appeal is to sister as well as to brother Liberals, Spiritualists, and all Freethinkers. Address me at Rockford, Ill. Yours for universal mental liberty,

F. F. FOLLET,
Secretary State Liberal League of Illinois.

What I Don't Believe.

PART II.—NO. 5.

658. I cannot feel nor believe that the story of Jesus, his miraculous and divine conception, his being born of a virgin, or even his existence as a man, is confirmed by any contemporaneous historian or writer. Philo, a prominent writer of the time, and who lived at the same time that Jesus is said to have lived, has not a word to say about him. Josephus, who came immediately after, was familiar with all the events which transpired in Judea, and who wrote the minutiæ of the events of that country, described not Jesus nor the remarkable deeds he is said to have performed. The paragraph inserted in the text of Josephus, speaking of Jesus, recognizing him as the Messiah, the Son of God, is unquestionably an interpolation done in the fourth century, probably by Eusebius, and this is admitted to be the case by the best and fairest judges. It is extremely unlikely that an orthodox Jew like Josephus would recognize an obscure, unpopular person as Jesus to be the looked-for Messiah and the son of the ever-living God. It is far more likely that Eusebius incorporated those words into the text of Josephus, long after he was dead, than that the Jewish historian wrote them himself. None of the Grecian or Roman writers of the time had any mention to make of Jesus, though if he performed the wonderful deeds attributed to him his fame should have been spread abroad in the world, and many writers should have mentioned him. But inasmuch as none mentioned him but the spurious writers of spurious gospels, and that none others seemed to know anything of him or to have ever heard of him, I am greatly inclined to doubt that such a person had an existence. It is possible, as some suppose, that the story of Jesus was made up from the characters of two or more persons with a somewhat marked career, and that after a century or two had passed divine qualities and powers were attributed to the character so fixed up, and supernatural powers given him which neither he nor the characters of which he was the compound ever claimed. His story is too closely a copy of that of Christna of India for me to believe that his alleged life and exploits were real. At all events there is assuredly no corroborative proof that such a person lived. All we have to depend upon is the very apocryphal stories told by the four gospel-writers, and which were not known to have had an existence till a hundred and eighty years after the time when the life of Jesus is claimed to have begun.

660. I cannot believe that Matthew had any means of knowing what Joseph had dreamed sixty years before the time of writing, or that anybody is under the slightest obligation to accept his statement, even if we should admit that it was Matthew who undertook to tell the dream. This dream must have been had before the birth of Jesus if it was had at all, and it was thirty years after his birth before he began to preach, or before Matthew had any occasion to know anything of Jesus. No one has claimed that it was less than thirty years after the death of Jesus when Matthew wrote his gospel, or, at the very shortest time that can be claimed, it was over sixty years from the time that Joseph did the dreaming before Matthew undertook to tell what it was. As Joseph was an old man when he espoused Mary for his wife, and as he undoubtedly died thirty or forty years before Matthew vouchsafed to write about the dream, it must be obvious to the careful reader that Matthew could not positively know anything about Joseph's dream, and that what he had to say on the subject was no better than a falsehood. The awkwardness of the situation becomes still more perplexing when we find that Matthew did not write about the dream at all, and that the story attributed to Matthew was not written till more than a hundred years after the time when he is claimed to have written. Now, reader, is not that a most slim basis for the story of a young woman having a babe without the aid of one of the male persuasion? Was a more ridiculous story ever told, or ever told in a more ridiculous manner?

661. I cannot believe that Luke had any better means for knowing what kind of vision Mary had had thirty or forty years before than Matthew had for knowing what Joseph had dreamed. There is no possibility of Luke's knowing about the vision himself, for he was not present, and there is not the slightest intimation that Mary or Gabriel told him anything about the vision, and what he said was clearly without reliable authority. He was a writer, from his own story, who took it into his head to write a version of the gospel story, after many others had attempted to do the same thing, and simply upon the rumors and legends which he had heard and were floating loosely around the country where there was no printing-press; no means by which a correct account of events could be transmitted to the public. He does not once say nor claim that he had a particle of inspiration to aid or guide him, and there is not the slightest reason for believing the claim to be true, even had he made it. It is nowhere claimed that he knew from personal observation or personal hearing anything about Jesus or what he said or did, for he was not one of the disciples who followed him about, and what he did write was wholly upon the statements of others or was drawn from his imagination. It is claimed that at the very shortest period he did not write his story till some forty years after the events occurred, and it must be admitted that under such circumstances there were many ways in which mistakes could work in, and that he really had no means of knowing anything about Mary's vision or about her overshadowing experience at the time Jesus was begotten. He was simply a party who knew nothing about the matter at all, and when he attempts to make an explanation of the affair when he knew nothing about it, he did nothing better than to give utterance to the most arrant falsehoods. And then again when we learn that it was not Luke who wrote this gospel, that it was written by some person wholly unknown and the name of Luke placed to it without the slightest truth, that it had no existence as a story until Luke had been a hundred years in his grave, the utter frivolousness and falseness of the Luke story becomes most apparent. No person can give credence to such wholly unsustained statements unless he has a great share of gullability and can easily accept the most monstrous statements without the slightest proof or reason.

662. I cannot believe if the godly overshadowing of Mary was a true story, either as related by Matthew or Luke, that Mark and John would have known nothing about it. If they had any authority to write what they did of the Jesus story, and if what they wrote was the truth, they certainly should have given the world the facts of this wonderful business; and their saying nothing about such an important and remarkable event is pretty sure proof that they knew nothing about it. If it was true they knew nothing of it they were certainly very unfit to undertake to write the story up. It is most probable, however, that they knew nothing about it, and that what was said by those who wrote the stories attributed to Matthew and Luke stated what they knew nothing of, what nobody else knew anything about, and what was absolutely untrue.

663. Matthew and Luke were no more fortunate in giving the genealogy of Jesus than of his paternity. The claim, of course, is all along set up that he was the direct descendant from King David. This was necessary to his claim to be a ruler in the kingdom of Israel. But the most amusing part is to see what a singular way Matthew and Luke take to make it appear plausible, and also the utterly different statements they make. Both, however, by entirely different lines began with David, one by the way of Solomon, the other by Nathan, and an entirely different set of names, one giving some forty-two generations and the other twenty-eight (if I remember correctly), but both ending with Joseph, who, if their statements are true, had no more to do with the paternity of Jesus than with the Tycoon of Japan. What a way, indeed, to give the genealogy of a person, to give that of another who had not the slightest blood relation to him! Was a more dishonest attempt ever made? As they differ so entirely in their statements, it follows most conclusively that if Matthew told the truth Luke told a falsehood, or if Luke told the truth Matthew told the falsehood. But as they both undertook to give the genealogy of Jesus and they did not do it they both told a falsehood. The two serious discrepancies here pointed out show clearly enough how utterly unreliable and untrustworthy the gospel narrations are. It is plainly seen that the grounds upon which credulous believers place their faith in this extremely mythical story are exceedingly narrow and exceedingly untenable. Here are, to begin with, falsehoods of the most glaring character, and if the story begins with a falsehood, what can be expected but more falsehoods in the later details?

Letters from Friends.

RICHBURG, N. Y., Oct. 28, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed please find $5 for Round-the-World Journey. When the book is out please send it to O. J. LOVELL.

FILLMORE CITY, UTAH, Oct. 24, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: It was not lack of interest in the arduous task you are undertaking that prevented me pledging as well as sending in my V to swell the list and help you along, but it was the want of stamps. I did, however, hope all along that circumstances would enable me to be the happy possessor of a copy of your forthcoming book as soon as it was out, and seeing my way clear now I will send for fear that something else may come along and swallow the money. My friend, Mr. P. Selde, also hands in his five dollars for the Round-the-World Trip. Perhaps I will find a few more who will take a sail.

Our forces at this place are not large, and we hav had a hard fight of it so far, and it does not look much better for the future, but we are on the gain. That cherished ideas die hard is certainly true. We see it in every phase of human existence. I do not know that Liberalism receives harder blows from the Mormon church than it gets from other denominations, but they hav so large a majority here that an outside party stands no show. In fact, it makes no difference to them whether a man believes in a religion or not, if he does not belong to them he is an outsider or gentile, and they think that as such he ought to be shoved to the wall. We hav in them a people typical of the ancients of the church of God. They try to liv up to his written word from Genesis to Revelation. In that they are consistent. They are his best representativs so far as I know, but alas! change is written upon everything under the sun. They are not the people to-day that they were in the days of Enoch, seven years ago. Verily, verily, the day shall come when the Lord God of Israel, Bible in hand, shall hunt from the four corners of the earth for his own to call them to account, and find that they are not, for they hav found a world that is round and hav skipped to the other side. All he will find will be a note, saying: "It won't do, Jah. You will hav to alter your Bible and make your laws accord with the laws of the universe, and make your world into a globe before you try to catch us again. We are evoluting now. You hav kept us standing still long enough, w ile the world has revolved and is evolving a purer atmosphere and surroundings fitted for a higher intelligence to rule and subdue it." We are behind hand now and must hurry, or we will never be able to catch up.

Mr. Bennett's letter on the Druids and their temples was particularly interesting. We wish him a happy voyage, and also send our best regards to Mrs. Bennett. Respectfully, GEO. C. VEILE.

CLEAR WATER HARBOR, FLA., Oct. 20, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: There hav been several suggestions made lately concerning the establishment of an Orphan's home under Liberal auspices and management. The idea is a good one, and I hope will develop into a living, vital charity, an honor to Liberalism and a blessing to society. It is a subject on which I hav thought much and would like to say a few words. First, how to raise the funds. I suggest that all who call themselvs Liberalists, no matter by what distinctiv name their Liberalism is known, assess themselvs ten cents each. Of course larger donations would be to their credit if they were able to contribute more, but all can certainly do this much. Pay it to the treasurer of the Liberal organization most convenient to them, from whence it will be forwarded to the treasurer of the National Liberal League in trust for this object. Let those who are not convenient to any Liberal League organization send to the editor of their favorit Liberal paper their contributions, to be turned over to the treasurer of the N. L. L., he to acknowledge in the columns of such journals the receipt of all such sums. That simple little ten cents each, small as it looks, would aggregate sufficient to establish that noble charity, and, repeated once a year for ten years, if properly managed, would place it upon a self-sustaining basis, capable not only of providing for and educating all it is intended to reach, but, I believe, would also giv them a start financially, when of age to leave its sheltering arms. But to accomplish all this several things are important. First, that the funds thus devoted be not frittered away in salaries to any person, no matter how good or useful; but that those who serve this cause serve for love of humanity, and not for money. Any persons unwilling to do that are not worthy. Let the president, secretary, and treasurer of the National Liberal League be ex officio the trustees, and the superintendent, matron, and teachers hav a maintenance, their children, if any, entitled to the same care, keeping, and privileges as the orphan inmates, but no better. The education of the children should be industrial as well as literary, therefore duties and labors or the home, and its industries as far as possible be accomplished by the members of the home; and for work too heavy for them needy Liberalists should be employed on the same terms as the superintendent, matron, and teachers. Second, that a location be chosen where expensiv buildings, fuel, clothes, etc., will not be needed for comfort or health. The money thus saved could be so used as to be a source of income, and not outgo, and the members of the home be the gainers by it. Most of my life has been passed in traveling, and I am personally acquainted with the topography, soil, climate, and health conditions of nearly every state in the union, and am satisfied that south Florida more perfectly meets all the needed conditions than any other locality in the United States. Its climate, winter and summer, is unexcelled. Statistics show that in healthfulness it has no equal. Close, expensiv houses are not needed, in fact, little else than shelter from rain and dew; little fuel, except for cooking, and that needs only the labor of cutting. Very simple, cheap, and light clothing is most suitable and comfortable. First, clams, oysters, etc., abound, and are to be had for the taking. Cattle, sheep, goats, and hogs can be raised with little trouble and no expense. Vegetables can be raised all the year. Flowers and a great variety fruits of grow in profusion, and fruit culture is an industry which is not only a source of annual income, but of cumulativ value and profit, for our tropical fruits are very long lived, and increase in productivness for many years. As the inmates of the Home increase in numbers and age, more and more land should be put into fruit and be the special care of the older children, the income from which would in a few years, be far in excess of the expenses of the institution. Fifty per cent of the surplus could then be devoted to adding to the capacity and advantages of the home, and in proportion to the number of years spent in the Home after twelve years of age the remainder could be divided around among the members on leaving the Home to start in the world. These are not idle theories and speculations, but facts capable of demonstration. I would also suggest that THE TRUTH SEEKER request all Liberal papers of whatever name or object to unite in a call upon their readers to contribute as above proposed, the method of accomplishing the purpose to be decided as the trustees on thorough investigation think best. Hoping that these suggestions will draw out the thoughts of the people on this subject and awaken an interest in it which will result in action, I remain,

Fraternally yours, DWIGHT.

CATHLAMET, W. T., Oct. 20, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I hav been highly amused on reading in your issue of October 1st and last the lame attempt of the Oregon pastor to enlighten honest Liberals on the ark old Noah is said to hav built, which has led me naturally to the conclusion that the people of Hillsborough who wait from time to time on the reverend gentleman's ministrations are rightfully entitled to the united sympathy of Infidels at large. While I venture to express my humble convictions that the reverend shepherd has either at no very recent period dispensed with his tunic and inexpressibles, else he has not yet resided a winter in Webfoot, otherwise he has been uncommonly slow to observe the humidity of the climate, which at this season of the year comes down invariably for months together and wakes up about June following apparently without let or hindrance, yet while it continues to come displays nary a shadow of remorse for either man or beast, the latter of whom never fails to enlist my most heartfelt sympathy and, withal, how brother Smith should not ere now hav solved that wily conundrum before he had driven you—as he did—to the inevitable, and hav come to the same conclusion that Jack and the Bean Stalk was as sacredly worthy of a chapter or two in that mythical compilation for the further exercise of Christian faith as not. For notwithstanding the long-continued rains in this and our sister state, yet in relation to a flood at its worst times (though months here cause the days of Noah's time to blush) it reminds one of a mole to a mountain.

Respectfully, H. A. ELIOT.

TUSTIN, MICH., Oct. 10, 1881.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: The elements hav conspired to drive me from the cornfield, and I accept the circumstance as a special providence permitting me to pen a few lines to you. I write you for the purpose of setting you right as regards my subscription to the Round-the-World Fund. The asterisk in my case was omitted in your list of subscribers. The fault is my own, and grows out of the fact that in subscribing to said fund only the initials of my name were used, thus, D. R. Marvin, whereas, in remitting, I signed my name in full.

Now I am of the opinion that no true Liberal will permit his unpaid pledge to be placarded to the public beyond a reasonable period. Therefore, in justice to your obedient servant, I respectfully ask that this be given a place in the paper which I feel t both a duty and a pleasure to support. Of the inclosed, $1 is for the above-named purpose, and the other is for my neighbor, S. B. Root, who has long since twisted his neck from the theological noose, and wishes to be booked for a trial trip in the grand gondola of Freethought—the straight and trim TRUTH SEEKER. My creed: Truth is better than a lie Truth, though nude, is beautiful still;
But a lie is a lie, robed as you will.

I sign, as ever, ignorant, and therefore Agnostic,
Your humble servant, D. RUSSELL MARVIN.

CINCINNATI, O.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: What can be the matter that the great and noble army of Freethinkers do not unite and display their power? If such was done, how soon would superstition stagger and fall and the grand human temple of right, freedom, and moral force be planted in its stead! Then would spring up a power for this world's good and be a blessing to the people of every clime. The shackles of kingcraft and priestcraft would be snapped asunder and all their terrors would be suppressed, the mental freedom of humanity would bud and blossom in such beauty and glory that darkness of mind (which is the cause and curse of priestly power) would vanish, and a bright, effulgent light called reason would spring forth to guide the mind into honest paths and purposes, obliterating all mean and crooked ways and principles, and building up a fabric of just laws that no creature could bribe or corrupt or purchase the least favor, doing unto all men that which is impartial and right before the world. This is what is wanted to improve our present life. Let the people seek happiness right here and now, and no longer dream of happiness when life is extinct. Liv to enjoy and not abuse, and pleasure will surround our path and fill our minds with rational bliss, so that whether life be long or short it will afford you peace and contentment in the most humble walks of life. Seek to avoid all which degrades either body or mind. Let generosity and good will prevail and a fraternal brotherhood exist, that peace and plenty might rule and flourish on every hand and every land.

Yours for union and progress, T. WINTER.

BENWOOD, W. VA., Oct. 16, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1, which apply to my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I see some one has taken Josh Billings to task for his hits at Infidelity. The fact is, Josh has pumped himself dry and ought to be laid on the shelf, and a new Josh secured—one that would not constantly be rapping himself over the knuckles instead of hitting the nail on the head. Put this in your pipe, Josh, and smoke it. Yours, etc., C. BURSEE.

MANTUA STATION, OHIO, Oct. 16, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: As I am indebted for THE TRUTH SEEKER since April 1st, I hope you will excuse my neglect. Please find inclosed post-office order for $3. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER since Comstock arrested Mr. Bennett. I subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER because Mr. Bennett's cause was the cause of every Liberal in the land, and we Spiritualists claim an interest in the Liberal cause, and the largest number of your supporters in this section are Liberal Sp ritualists. Yours, R. O. HALSTEAD.

DEERVILLE, OHIO, Oct. 17, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: THE TRUTH SEEKER is at hand, and am much pleased with it, and will try to get a few subscribers for it. I hav belonged to three different churches, and am sorry to say I found them wanting, and want no more to do with them, for they are frauds under the garb of sanctity. I am sixty-five years old, and hav at last got my eyes opened. I hav been defrauded out of thousands of dollars by the Christians and reduced to poor circumstances. Were I able I should buy many books from you.

ALEXANDER AULD.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Oct. 17, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I am at present located in Pittsburgh, Pa., and every Sunday afternoon attend lectures at the rooms of the Pittsburgh Liberal League, No. 76. The lectures are good, and the hall is always crowded. The next day the discourse is reported in the Pittsburgh Despatch and read extensivly. Yesterday we were entertained by Mrs. Amelia Colby, of St. Louis, on "Who was Jesus Christ?" To say that the discourse was profound and eloquent would not meet the case; it was grand, startling, thrilling, and no doubt shocking to the meek-looking, smooth-faced clergymen present. To them it came like a clap of thunder from a clear sky. Ten minutes apiece were given them to reply, but they cut a sorry figure attempting to do so. "It still moves."

Yours fraternally, HARRY HOOVER.

MERIDIAN, MISS., Oct. 24, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: The columns of your excellent paper furnish me a delightful oasis of green pastures and cooling water in the midst or an arid desert of orthodox bigotry. Yesterday I heard one of the big guns of the Baptist church (which is now holding a state convention at Meridian) discourse on Romans, vi, 14 to a large, intelligent, and well-dressed audienee of gentlemen and ladies. He assumed that there is a personal God who hears and answers prayers, and who feels and sympathizes with his own elect children as a kind earthly father, that the Bible contains a genuin revelation of his will to man, that Jesus Christ was present, and that salvation as wrought out by God through his son was freely offered to the whole human race, that it was in the power of all human beings to accept or reject it, and that if accepted the recipient would certainly reach the climes of ultimate glory to sing hallelujah through countless ages to Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and that if rejected, the rejector would justly sink down to the regions of damnation, where he would writhe amid the flames of fire and brimstone as long as eternity shall endure. In the preacher's view heaven has a distinct locality, as much as New York. He taught that the spirits of just men (what about the women?) became angels wearing brilliant golden crowns and white flowing robes, that the Father sits on a lofty throne, with the Son on the right, and the Holy Ghost overhead, and that these angels spend all their time in loving, shouting, and praising a triune God, while the the poor sinners are roasting in a real material hell, where the devil is always shoveling in live coals of fire and brimstone. And the minister had the profound attention of nine-tenths of his hearers. Perhaps the writer was the only Liberal present. What a sad commentary on the virtue and intelligence of this people! They are as much priest-ridden as poor Spain during the reign of the Inquisition. Remember that the minister did not deign to offer a single argument in support of his absurd assumptions, and probably not one in ten of his hearers supposed any were needed. From this, the readers of your paper will readily perceive the unpleasantness of an outspoken Liberal, poor and dependent upon the public for food and raiment. J. D. RHODES.

BRENTWOOD, L. I. Oct. 32, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I herewith inclose payment on my subscription up to January next. I am old and short of means, but am resolved to do so much for the noble cause of Freethought as to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER, although to do so I must curtail in some degree the luxuries—nay, what most would call the comforts—of life, but the cause demands an equal to the widow's mite. I am glad that our noble chief is so far prosperous on his tour. Written from his standpoint his narrative will be invaluable to the cause of human progress. I am also rejoiced in view of the successful and harmonious terminatfon of the session of the fifth annual Congress of the National Liberal League, and that harmony is restored between it and its former worthy chairman, H. L. Green. I heartily coincide with him in his views of the necessity of organiz ation. In warfare the army best organized and disciplined is the victorious one, no matter how numerous or valiant its foes, and the conservativ ranks to-day are thoroughly organized. Hence, although Liberals hav heretofore been shy of organization, yet without it they may as well abandon their cause, for in that case their opponents will assuredly maintain their present ascendency. Allow me now to commend Susan H. Wixon's article, "The Social Status of Liberalism," in the last TRUTH SEEKER, Oct. 22d, to the careful perusal of all readers. It has the right ring. It contains—nay, it is made up of—words fitly spoken, which an old philosopher has likened to apples of gold in pictures of silver. Let me say to all, don't forget to reperuse it. It should stimulate to vigorous thought and labor.

Yours, for Freethought, free speech, free press, and social freedom, as soon as we can become prepared for it. B. H. LEWIS.

TURNBULL, ALA., Oct. 15, 1881.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Please let us hear something on the monopoly parties, especially the Liberal League and Socialistic Labor. Please answer these questiõns: What paper will giv the most information concerning land matters? Do you know of any enterprising business that an intelligent young man could engage in either east, west, or north. He is a good young man; no family. He has energy and pluck. Let me hear soon. MISS SALLIE GRAHAM.

NEWPORT, ME., Oct. 23, 1881.

TO JOHN W. TRUESDELL: Everything you hav written from time to time in THE TRUTH SEEKER on the financial question I hav read with great interest, and although I do not agree with you, I feel you are honest in your statements, and perhaps they are all correct, as I do not know to the contrary. But whether you or the Greenbackers hav the wisest plan for the good of humanity, will you be kind enough to answer me a few questions?

Hav those classes of people known as bankers, brokers, bond-holders, money-letters, and other similar characters grown richer or poorer in the last twenty-five years? Are there more or less poor men's homes under mortgage to-day than there were twenty-five years ago? And furthermore, is the wealth of this country going into the hands of a few, while the real wealth producers, the farmers, the mechanics, and the day laborers are growing poorer? To me these are important questions, and I very much wish to know the real facts. Yours, SEWARD MITCHELL.

ARENZVILLE, ILL., Oct. 24, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $3 for one year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I see that my time is up for another year. I cannot do without THE TRUTH SEEKER, for I think it is the best paper ever published in the world for truth and knowledge. I am glad to hear that Mr. Bennett is getting along so nicely in his tour round the world. I hope that he will arrive home safe without any sickness or accident. I love to read his letters that he sends back to us. I think that they are splendid indeed without any exception. Yours truly, THOS. CRAWFORD.

MY "EXPERIENCE" AGAIN. — POSTSCRIPT OF A LETTER TO AN OLD FRIEND.

BERRIEN SPRINGS, MICH., Oct. 10, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Second P. S., My Dear Judge: I am not satisfied yet. I hav written you the truth, but not all of it. I fear you may infer from my last postscript that all are my friends here. You may be assured they are not. I hav enemies who would burn me at the stake if they only had the sanction of law, as once was. They are only some of the children of God, the followers of the meek and lowly Jesus.

You read my "Experience" in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January last. That gave you a fair idea of the causus belli of the saints to put down and defame the Brotherhood of Humanity, using me as their target (as I was called the bishop of that order), all in the interest of the cause of Christ. The church said nothing at the time against the insult to me by those four dear sisters in the Lord over an open grave, and of a kind of insult that was never before known in the history of the world. I had the experience mailed to the thinking citizens of this section, to the clergy, and especially to those four dear sisters in Christ. This proved a squelcher all around, and it made those sisters so odious that they denied that they did any such thing for any such purpose. Church liars are not generally believed except by their praying companions. I hav beaten them beautifully on their little game of insult to me in public. But lying is cheap with those who conspire to defame or crush those who do not believe as they do. Now they say, "Putnam is a dangerous man; he does not believe in anything else." This they say to the elect, to strangers, and to the impressible. Our people read the inscription I had inscribed on my monument, which reads, "Love to Father God and Brother Man," and they exclaim at once, "How these Christians will lie!"

I see the footprints of this class of saints quite often, as the incidents to be mentioned will show. At Christmas time I sometimes hav a little stripe of benevolence and humanity come over me. I hav been tempted to donate a cow for the survival of a poor preacher's family, though that survival might not hav been the fittest; to dinner the prisoners at the jail; to oyster-dinner every poor family of the village; to distribute fruit on the street to children and others. Last Christmas I changed program by changing larger money into small pieces, sowing it around among the little ones to buy them goodies, or handing the larger pieces to the poorer children. Just here is a notable incident. I offered money to a very poor boy; he shook his head and refused to receive it. Another at the offer turned from me in scorn. I will explain. The first was a boy of a very poor and coarse woman, to whose family I had carried much to keep them from starving; but the mother had become a saint, the only soul saved at a revival here of four weeks' duration. The other was the son of the boss bigot of this town, who teaches the children that "a moral man is the worst one in the community." Those boys were not to blame in the least; they were true to parental teaching. A friend standing near, said, "Never mind, Putnam; nothing will cure those boys' parents of their bigotry but the application of a wooden cloak."

If the above is the way piety works, I want it not; I will hav none of it; away with it, I say; I dislike it, hate it, abhor it, detest it.

The bigots here hate me for my reading and reason. They dare not meet me openly, but play guerrilla. The priests treat me complacently or shun me. They well know I will not "down," and they do not attempt it. They ascribe my dreadful state to my "carnal nature." Thus I stand on my dignity in the bright blaze of truth.

Well, my dear Judge, I hav lived a pretty long life. The clock of time is now striking seventy years to my name. I am both sad and glad. The past recedes like a dream, and the future rises like a vision before me.

I look back through the years and see myself a farmer boy, a mechanic, a teacher, a superintendent of schools, a professor in a law college, a lecturer, an author, having read theology, medicin, and law, practicing the legal profession in my later years, and finally honored with a seat on the bench. I do not wonder that I made no more fame, but I do marvel that I have not more and worse enemies. "Receding now, the dying numbers of the harp of life ring fainter down the rugged dell of time."

I now reluctantly close my letter of seventeen pager, "would it were worthier" and shorter. You may read this to any true and confidential friends of yours and ours, "provided always" that your life should be graciously prolonged to enable you to wade through it. Dear old friend, I shall retain for you ever sweet memories of the long ago. And now may great peace, etc., Yours ever,

WORTHY PUTNAM.

MR. EDITOR: The following is the religious status of the members of the House of Representativs at Washington Territory, now in session here: Mr. Alexander, Liberal; Allen, Liberal; Catlin, Liberal; Clark, Universalist; Cornwall, Orthodox; Dillon, Liberal; Freeman, Universalist; Holcomb, Liberal; Judson, Catholic; Karr, Methodist; Kuhn, Infidel; Kincade, Liberal; O'Neal, Catholic; Preston, Infidel; Raymond, Liberal; Rees, Infidel; Smith (of King), Liberal: Smith (of Kletetat), Christian; Smith (of Whitman), Infidel; Steen, Liberal; Taylor, Congregationalist, Van Eaton, Presbyterian; Worman, Liberal; Comegys (speaker), Infidel; making the same as follows: Liberals, 10; Christians, 9; Infidels, 5.

Yours truly, GEO. G. SWAN.

Anti-Catholicism in France.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times, after remarking that Paul Bert's recent speech at the Winter Circus on "Moral and Religious Teaching" was in part a repetition of his famous speech in the Chambers on Clause 7 goes on to say:

"To-day he had armed himself with a collection of Catholic school books, catechisms, tracts, and pictures, on which he commented in a sarcastic style. Thus he made liberal citations from a pamphlet in which the medals of a particular saint were represented as charms whereby the phylloxera could be cured, sorcery counteracted, school examinations passed, and stubborn horses induced to gallop. He quoted another book in which St. Joseph insured a ready sale for lottery or concert tickets—'We did not need St. Joseph's services,' interjected M. Bert, 'to get rid of the tickets for this meeting'—and drew good numbers in the conscription. He held up to ridicule, moreover, tracts and pictures in which the journey to the next world was depicted as a train with first-class carriages labeled 'Generosity,' second class 'Confidence,' and third-class 'Resignation.' He denounced as a tissue of absurdities a pamphlet promising all sorts of cures and blessings for a subscription of twenty-five francs to the Sainte Enfance. He quoted passages from casuists describing the cases in which theft was venial and restitution was not obligatory. He produced, but declined to read, passages from a schoolbook relating to Joseph, Sodom, and Susannah. He cited other passages applauding the massacre of the Albigenses and the Huguenots. He summed up these extracts by defining religious teaching as imbecility, fanaticism, anti-patriotism, and immorality, and he insisted that morality was not interwoven with religion, for all societies had prohibited theft, murder, and so forth, so that for such enactments 'ce n'était pas la peine de déranger Dieu le Pere.'

"He concluded by contrasting the school which taught fixed natural laws, industry, self-reliance, and family ties with the church which taught constant and capricious suspensions of law, self-distrust, the efficacy of rites and ceremonies, and the sacredness of celibacy—the one producing an honest, industrious citizen, the other an ignorant, lazy monk. Modern societies, he said, were advancing toward morality and proportionately receding from religion. M. Bert, it will be seen, disdains to distinguish between Clericalism and Catholicism, nor does he inquire how far the bulk of Catholics are responsible for historical and casuistical monstrosities, in some cases heedlessly approved by bishops. If English Protestantism came in his way he would evidently form a collection of tracts in which a Sunday walk is represented as the first step to the gallows, and triumphantly adduce them as typical of Protestant teaching. Catholic writers would do well to keep M. Bert before their eyes and to remember that any ineptitudes which they indite or indorse are sure to get into his anti-Catholic museum. To-day's meeting, moreover, is in more than one respect significant. This is certainly the first time that Catholic literature and teaching hav been held up to ridicule and opprobrium by a future Minister of Education in the presence of and with the approval of a future Premier and President. The laughter and plaudits of the audience, comprising many family groups, stand for little, for, with the inconsistency of the French character, these people will continue being baptized, confirmed, married and buried by the church which to-day they derided; but M. Gambetta and M. Bert must be presumed to hav the courage of their opinions, and they are on the threshold of office. They ought to hav already asked themselvs, and outsiders will certainly ask, whether they contemplate a war to the knife with Catholicism. M. Gambetta to-day not only joined in the merriment and cheering, but he highly eulogized M. Bert."

MOSES HULL is speaking for the Spiritualists at Frobisher's Hall, this city, during the present month. Next Sunday (the 13th) he will giv two Liberal lectures, which none should fail to hear.

J. M. HAGAMAN, of the Concordia (Kansas) Blade, has opened a Liberal circulating library. He also keeps for sale Liberal and scientific books. For a very small sum per week good solid reading can be obtained. Mr. Hagaman should be liberally patronized.

IF any one would like to send THE TRUTH SEEKER three months to a friend who has never taken it, it will only cost them fifty cents to do so.

Yorktown.

BY E. D. P.

Twice, in a pillar of cloud by day,
A pillar of fire by night,
Has freedom's Jove his children led away
From kingly bondage to the might of right.
Twice—more it must hav been,
Much more it needs to be—
From tyrant-serving sin
Hav men arisen free.

Marvelous morn that from an Indian idol
Grows to a Grecian god is not so strange,
So great of transformation,
As were the little colonies in their change
To sovereign states leagued as earth's mightiest nation.
But nations hav been, may be, suicidal,
Drawing the usurper's sword across their throat;
Like Rome, grown rich and base,
Like Cromwell's canting land;
Like France, too, bright of race
For brigands to command.
In other eyes if we see such a mote.
Let us beware that in our own may seem
No like, no larger beam.

From glory-burning Gaul
Thy light was caught, thy lamp was fed,
O country, now made up of Europe's all,
Great land of little sons of mighty sires long dead!
France gave our life and liberty divine—
Worth more than slavish being.
But vain all gifts, all generous suns that shine
On ingrates with no moral sense of seeing!
The hound will follow still the brutal master,
The natural flunkey serve his insolent lord,
And dark-age serfdom's clans cling all the faster
To those who've robbed and made them feel the sword.

'Twas but a little yesterday
That Arnold burnt and Tarleton shot,
And proud Cornwallis laughed as gay
As endless victory were his lot,
Then suddenly a rat in trap
Squealing for mercy. 'Twas too mean.
No lord since Yorktown's cannon-clap
In war has on our shore been seen.
De Grasse and Rochambeau, and, better yet,
The saint of liberty, holy Lafayette,
With Washington were joined to turn the tide
When strategy and courage could decide
A nation's fate while a small fire might burn
And blackest shame to brightest glory turn.
That Washington was more than a mere name—
A thing of notoriety—a thief of fame;
And Lafayette, best friend in need that ever
A people had on high, herculean endeavor!
Vast is our nation, but what man of all
Has helped a people's rise—a tyrant's fall?

How dare you praise your venerable fathers?
Their deed should strike you dumb.
The soldier of Valley Forge his blanket gathers
Around his half-starved body, chill and numb,
Through the long winter. You in luxury loll,
Hundreds of thousands, and talk pretty Poll
Wants office-crackers—million crackers more,
And literate fames to match a titmouse score.
Who hav you helped? what Irish, Cuban braves?
What Boers that hold their own
'Gainst villain-lords and throne?
What hav you done to show you are not slaves—
To prove that you are men?
Up and down ever differs now and then.
These are the dog-days of late loyalists—
Quite other days than those
When Tories, driven to Nova Scotian mists,
Left all their wealth to patriot foes.
Justice, to shoddy swindlers bring such close,
And with their stolen billions feed
Those they hav made and kept in need.
Good Lord Cornwallis, we salute your flag
With deep respect that loyal Yankees feel
For that Goth-vandal, Norman robbers' rag
To which weak savages and flunkies kneel.
We who got office by pretense of hate
Of Southern brothers, whom you helped to arm,
Send from Yorktown bulletins of state
To say that old wound need breed no alarm.

But evil days will come to an evil horde,
And heaven's vials of wrath are not all poured.
Civilization yet is a small show,
But 'tis great Nature's tree that's bound to grow
In spite of asses and of selfish cattle
That eat the buds which with high storms would battle.
It means the organizing of mankind.
In true republics, with no poor or rich,
It means the social union, broad and kind,
Of all save Nature's lowest in jungle and ditch.
Czar-snakes and tiger-lords and flunkey jackals, they Must soon surrender
On wide earth's Yorktown day.
After the star the sun of splendor.

CENTENARY OF VOLTAIRE.

VOLTAIRE IN EXILE:

His Life and Works in France and Abroad.

(England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, Switzerland), with unpublished letters of Voltaire and Mme. Du Chatelet.

BY BENJAMIN GASTINEAU.

Translated with the author's approval by Messrs. F. Vogell and Edmond Dubourg.

This work is an epitome of the life of the great Infidel, and for those who cannot afford the higher priced life, by James Parton, and yet want to know all about Voltaire, it is just the work. It was written by Benjamin Gastineau, of Paris, and translated for us with his approval by F. Vogell and Edmond Dubourg. It contains an account of Voltaire's youth, his exile in England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, and Switzerland; his relations with Jean Jacques Rousseau, Frederick the Great, Catherine II., and Pope Benedict XIV.; what he did at Ferney, how he improved the town, built a church, fought the Jesuits, and defended the victims of religious hatred and persecution. It describes his triumphant return to Paris after his years of exile, and ends with chapters on his work, his philosophical system, his enemies, and some hitherto unpublished letters.

Many volumes hav been written upon Voltaire, but none of its size contains so much information as this. From it a clear idea can be obtained of the immense influence he exerted upon Europe and the world, of his brilliant genius, and how the church has ever fought the men who dared to step out of the orthodox paths of thought.

WHAT OBJECTIONS TO

CHRISTIANITY

THE

Bennett-Mair Discussion.

BETWEEN

D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.

(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founded upon the doctrin and authority of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progress and improvement.

8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which mankind are capable of receiving.

Sixteen Saviors or None.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

Being a reply to John T. Perry's "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examins all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other, and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and themselvs, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimouy against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. Price, 75 cents, pamphlet; $1, bound.

SCHOOL OF STENOGRAPHY.

THE PHONOGRAPH

Is a machine for writing shorthand. It is simplicity itself. Is very easily learned. Easily operated with all the fingers. Its writing is more legible and accurate than any other system of shorthand. The writing of one operator can be readily read by another. Ordinary shorthand requires the verbatim reporter to commit to memory hundreds of contractions and word-signs. Operators of the Stenograph use less than one hundred contractions. The letters are represented by dots and spaces—nothing else. To fit persons for shorthand clerks only half the time required to learn the best phonography. Six hundred letters per minute can easily be made, which is more than sufficient to equal the speed of the most rapid reporters.

Lessons can be given by mail. Teaching will not interfere with my lecturing. Let Liberals put their children to the front in practical, secular education. Address

IMPORTANT TO INVALIDS WHO HAV BEEN TREATED BY MEDICAL MEN AND STILL CONTINUE TO BE DISEASED.

I am happy to say there is a lasting hope for you. The system of which I am the inventor will do more for you than all the drugs in America. It cannot be gainsayed that more die of drugs than from disease. The present system of medicin is a mistake and must soon giv way to more rational means. Thousands of persons in Brooklyn and New York are ready to testify that my "WILSONIA GARMENTS" cured them after the most skilful drug treatment had failed. Medicin in acute forms of disease of recent origin, may be of benefit, and in case of accident it is quite right to use every possible palliativ; even poison, that in large doses would kill, may in suchcases of sudden disease, if used with proper caution, be found of great value; but in all chronic diseases such as paralysis, rheumatism, anchylosis, asthma, bronchitis, heart disease, gout, varicose veins, catarrh, spinal disease, locomotor ataxia, and many other forms of a chronic character must forever defy the power of drugs.

The history of medicin is one that, if read with care would strike terror into the minds of every thoughtful reader. The most scientific writers of the past and present hav all denounced the practice of medicin as mere experiment, and the thousands who die under medical treatment only too truly tell the melancholy fact. The infant is wrested from its mother's breast; the bride of yesterday the corpse of to-morrow; the laughing boy, the romping girl, the loved and noble husband, the aged parents, all and each in turn are daily hurried to their end by the errors of drug treatment; and yet the people go on from decade to decade without ever making inquiry as to the cause of such a state of things.

I hav now, after sixteen months' residence in Brooklyn, proved that medicin is not only not needed, but that every form of chronic disease hav one common source or cause, and that the same means that will cure gout will cure cancer; the same that will cure paralysis will cure catarrh; the same that will stay bleeding of the lung will cure anchylosis. This very astounding statement must must strike terror into the minds of our regulars, who pride themselvs so much on their acumen and pretenses of diagnosis. These men only too frequeutly declare a lung to be diseased when that lung is in perfect condition. Then how often is it declared that the heart is enlarged or fat, or its valves indurated, or some other such wild statement, only to frighten the poor victim into an ever-changing course of medicin—mercury to-day, chloral hydrate to-morrow, belladonna next day, and so on, week by week, year by year, until the poor patient becomes a walking drug store, and then dropping into an early grave.

Now, to obviate all this diagnostic nonsense, I hav come to the rescue of these poor invalids, and tell them plainly that there is but one cause for disease, and consequently one means of cure.

ONE DISEASE! ONE CURE!

The fact being that there is but one disease, no matter what form it may take, and it is only by and through the quackery of the schools of medicin that diseases and their cure hav been so multiplied, we now know the want of nervous force precedes a languid circulation or the want or equilibrium in the circulatory system; in a word, the blood is the life, and electricity the equalizer of all our forces, so that if we can by any means infuse magnetism into the human organism soothingly and gently we shall thereby attain to a natural state of existence and death shall only be the result of nature's inevitable law, instead of the early deaths amid racking pains, superinduced by the introduction of poisonous drugs and quack nostrums dispensed indiscriminately by empirics and the schoolmen of our colleges, but amid all this there is a hope for every invalid, and that hope is centered on nature's universal remedy—magnetism.

Before window glass was invented the only lighting media for our houses in the daytime were holes in the structure for the poor, or frame work of horn for the rich. The man who invented glass did not inveut light, but only a medium by which it might be transferred. Just so with the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC BELT. WM. WILSON did not inveut magnetism, but only a means whereby it may be accumulated and transfused through the animal economy of man.

WM. WILSON pretends to no secret as in quack nostrums, but freely and proudly discloses to every one the principles of his invention, so that all ingenius persons may for themselvs construct their own Magnetic Belts, the only question being whether they would waste their time and money instead of purchasing the appliances made by the aid of valuable machinery and constructed on scientific principles. I know only too well that the doctors will try to crush me for having dared to teach them their business. This some of them hav already done, first by inducing the internal revenue officers to place a tax on my garments; failing in this, I hav fought the government and won my case (although at the cost of three thousand dollars), yet I won in opposition to these doctors. But another move must be made thought they. A happy thought. Let us go to Anthony Comstock, get him to write a letter to a large number of persons given as reference; pretend the certincates of WILSON are false, malign him in a circular letter, break the people's confidence in his goods, and thus we can close him up. Well done, says doctor number two, and the thing was done. Comstock was imposed upon, as I hav now every reason to believe, in fact from the first I thought such was the case, and so wrote to Comstock the following letter asking for the names of the persons who had thus given him the information, but those persons being doctors Anthony Comstock dare not disclose their names; it was left to me to ferret that out, which I hav done, and confronted several of them, two of them who went to the fore, and others who acted as stool pigeons in the matter.

Here is the letter I wrote to Anthouy Comstock:

WILLIAM WILSON'S LETTER TO COMSTOCK.

465 FULTON ST., BROOKLYN, Sept. 13, 1881.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:

DEAR SIR—I was surprised this morning to find in my consulting rooms many of my former patients, each bringing me a circular letter received from you, a copy of which is inclosed herewith. With this each handed me a copy of their replies to you. You hav evidently been imposed upon. I would take it as a favor if you would giv me the names of the informants to whom you refer. They are amenable to prosecution, and it may become my duty to institute proceedings against them. It will giv me pleasure to afford you convincing proof of my position, and of the nature and benefit of my appliances as a curativ agent. I believe my services in this reepect will be found to be such as to commend me to universal approval as a public benefactor. Mention is made in your letter in reference to my name. Allow me to refer you to the Brooklyn directory, where you will find an advertisment of mine and my name and address in full.

I hav inclosed one of my blank checks (not for use). You will see my name printed on the end. As to my having been a cabinetmaker, upon that fact I build my glory, in not only having earned an honest livelihood, but to hav won the respect of all honest men with whom I hav come in contact, until to-day I stand in the proud position as the inventor of a system destined to overthrow the pernicious practice of drugging humanity. I understand fully the penalties I hav to bear for having dared to teach medical men their business. Do you not know that all great inventions and improvements ever emanate from persons whose walks in life hav been totally distinct from that in which such inventions were likely to spring? My discovery of the real nature of nerve fluid and blood composition must revolutionize the practice of medicin. That being the case, hav I not cause to be proud of once having been a cabinetmaker? If a rail splitter may become a President, and our now President not being ashamed of having once conducted a barge, why should William Wilson be ashamed of having been a cabinetmaker?

Hoping that you may pay a visit to my establishment, and there see for yourself the result of my labor, I remain,

Respectfully yours, WILLIAM WILSON.

P. S.—I intend to publish all letters sent to me, being copies of those sent to you, and will take it a favor if you will forward all letters sent you FOR OR AGAINST me. The following paragraph, cut from one of my advertisments, may be of interest to you:

My difficulty is that many persons will become rotten with disease, will swallow medicin enough to float a steamship, and rub in liniments and ointments enough to tan the skin till it becomes like the sail of a ship; and then, hearing of my marvelous cures, will expect, on putting on my goods, to jump into new life in two or three months. This, in most cases, is an impossibility, and persons governed by such expectations had better not waste their time or my own in calling upon me.

With respect to the names given below, a few words of explanation should be given. I hav not studied cases to suit my purpose, but hav taken each one seriatim, not knowing or caring what report may be supplied on application to the persons therein named, knowing full well that to wear the WILSONIA is to obtain perfect health, although in some cases it may take as many weeks to effect a change as it does hours in other cases. But it never has failed, and never can, when the instructions given are followed out.

Now, citizens, read the letters sent to Anthony Comstock in answer to the libelous letter; say, then, am I not cruelly injured by Anthony Comstock? Why did he not make inquiry before he wrote such a letter? I will giv to any one $5,000 for one case where I hav ever deceived a single person. I always, in my pamphlets, tell persons what are my proportions of cures, and giv the names of persons who wear my goods, not caring what the persons say whom others may apply to.

READ THE FOLLOWING DESCRIPTION OF THE "WILSONIA" GARMENTS.

Electricity as a curativ agent has long been recognized by the faculty. In fact, from the time of Galen, through every decade, this marvelous agent has attracted the attention of all thinking men; but thinking and acting are distinct characteristics; therefore, while thousands of medical men hav decided that electricity was the one thing needed as a direct means of cure, yet the bigotry of the schools of medicin has ever prevented the introduction of anything that did not correspond with the preconceived notions of those who gloried in the names of professors, but in such pride of position dared not relinquish their glory. And thus it is that thousands hav been compelled to swallow the abominations of our drug stores through hundreds of years, and hav as a result, gone to an early grave. The methods by which electricity has been applied are numbered by the thousand—batteries of various kinds, electric machines, electric belts, electric disks, electric garters, electric rings, electric medals. Then we hav had magnetic belts in dozens of dcsigns, all intended to produce and maintain a current of magnetism in the blood, by which process alone can the blood be continued in a perfect state of circulation. All these appliances do possess valuable properties, but the great trouble over present was the want of continuity on the one hand, and an absence of perfect ventilation on the other. Not only so, but yet another want in all these was a means to keep back the electricity of the body so that by a conservation of forces we could use over and over again the waste nerve force which would be otherwise thrown out into the atmosphere. This I hav succeeded in doing by encasing my garments with an impervious tissue such as oil silk, gutta percha, or any other non-conductor of electricity, but by preference I use gutta percha as the best non-conductor known; also that any two pieces of metal of different molecular construction must of necessity, when brought in contact where heat and moisture can ramify between them, such impact of metals must produce an electro-galvanic actiou. This I hav done in a variety of ways. By my first patent I used disks of copper and zinc attached to the magnets, and next I placed ribbons of copper and zinc with chemical calico between them to absorb the moisture of the body, but after many trials I hav proved my present method the most effectual means ever adopted by mankind in any part of the world for the production of continuous magnetic action.

Therefore, I am in a position to say that never in the history of the world has such a perfect magnetic garment been produced, embracing the following requisits:

First—Non-contact with the skin.
Second—Constancy of current unimpeded.
Third—Capability of being washed and cleansed.
Fourth—Perfect ventilation, whereby the moist vapors of the body are ever eliminated.

This is a most important point, and upon which I feel the greatest possible pride, it being the desideratum in all magnetic body wear, and the methods by which these effects are produced are simplicity itself, at the same time evolving a galvanic current, by the impact of dissimilar metals forming the ventilating openings.

NOTE.—The above points should be studied by every physician, and then, compared with all that has gone before, it will be found to be the most perfect arrangement in the world, as the following testimonials will prove, and be it remembered that these testimonials were sent to the government spy, ANTHONY COMSTOCK, who was stupid enough to doubt the value of my invention.

2 ST. FELIX ST., BROOKLYN, Sept. 13, 1881.

A. COMSTOCK,
DEAR SIR: Yours just received, contents noted. In reply will say I know nothing of Mr. Wilson's antecedents, hav never inquired about them. His garments were spoken of to me last winter, when my adopted daughter was suffering from a complication of diseases, who had been sick two years and more, Had been under the care of Dr. Smith, of Brooklyn, who said, after attending her for months, that it was a very bad case, and she constantly grew worse. I called on Mr. Wilson, saw his goods, heard his testimony, took the garments home with me, and my daughter put them on. She has experienced great relief. Has just returned from the country, where she has spent several weeks. She still wears the garments, and would not be willing to leave them off for a day. She is not cured yet. Don't know as she ever will be, but that she is greatly benefited I am sure. No one would hesitate to say, who saw her then and now, it must be the garments that did her good. for she took no medicin after putting them on. I hav a set of the garments myself. I would not part with them if I could not replace them, My little granddaughter, who was always troubled with a cough in winter. and had catarrh very bad more than ever last winter,, bas had no cough or catarrh since. I do not believe Mr. Wilson an impostor, but believe his invention has been a blessing to hundreds of suffering people. Yours respectfully, MARTHA MOXSON.

No. 7 BOND STREET, BROOKLYN, Sept, 13, 1881.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:
SIR—Yours of latc date received. I furnished Mr. William Wilson with a certificate of my case. After wearing his Magnetic Clothing for five months, and being nearly cured of a loathsome catarrh of lifetime standing, with its wretched train of consequences, dyspepsia, heartburn, etc. Numbers of my friends, people of intelligence, hav been equally benefited, and, if called upon, will bear testimony to the "WILSONIA." As to the antecedents of William C. Wilson, I know from Mr. Wilson that he has been in New York heretofore. I hav repeatedly heard him refuse to be called professor or doctor, but insists upon "William Wilson, House Carpenter." Your most direct means of information would be to call at Mr. Wilson's place of business. His rooms and factory are always open to the public for inspection, and the most critical scrutiny is invited. E. S. CHAPMAN.

BROOKLYN, September 13, 1881.

MR. COMSTOCK:
DEAR SIR—Your note came at hand in reference to the "WILSONIA." In answer to you I may state I hav been suffering for years with bleeding to the nose and other troubles, such as weakness and general debility, etc. I called on Mr. Wilson last summer, and stated my case to him. He put some of his belts on, and, contrary to my expectation, I began to feel relief, and am now a well man, which was a great surprise to me, after having tried every remedy that I could get hold of. As far as being swindled by him, I consider he has been my benefactor, as far as restoring me to health.

I cheerfully gave him my name, hoping that it would do some poor mortal placed in the same condition I was some good. Respectfully, E. NILSON,
413 Bridge street.

September 13, 1881.

MR. A. COMSTOCK:
DEAR SIR—Your letter addressed to my wife has been handed to me by her for answer. I would inform you that Mr. Wilson has had the full and free consent of myself and wife to use her name as reference.

Mrs. Robb has suffered for a great many years from neuralgia (eighteen years). On April last, when very low, I obtained the "WILSONIA," and from the first moment of putting them on she experienced great benefit, and every day gains strength; so much so is this the case, she is now able to go out and enjoy life, something she has been unable to do for years previous. Hoping this will satisfy your scruples regarding the "WILSONIA,"
I remain yours respectfully, R. ROBB.

BROOKLYN, Sept. 13, 1881.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:
SIR—Your letter, datcd the 10th inst., received. In reply I would say that I hav received all the benefit claimed by the "WILSONIA." Mr. Wilson has used my name with my knowledge and consent, and he has not exaggerated any statement made by me. I know nothing in regard to Mr. Wilson's pedigree, but I know this much, that the "WILSONIA" Magnetic Clothing has done for me what medicin could not do. I am now enjoying better health than I hav been since the war, and I owe it all to the wearing of the "WILSONIA" Magnetic Clothing.
Respectfully yours, etc., JOEL E. CANNON.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:
DEAR SIR: In answer to your communication respecting the "WILSONIA," I hav to state that I know that my name appeared in the different papers, that I hav been a sufferer from nervous prostration for years, and I hav worn the garments prescribed by Mr. Wilson with great benefit without the use of a particle of medicin. I was confined to my room with my eyes for three months, suffering from Ophthalmic Catarrh. I am now able to be out in the open air. They are getting stronger every day.

BROOKLYN, Sept. 13, 1881.

MR. A. COMSTOCK:
SIR—In answer to your communication of yesterday I take pleasure in informing you that the certificate which I gave to Mr William Wilson was true in every particular, and from my present knowledge I can fully recommend his WILSONIA to any person suffering from the complaint with which I was afflicted, namely, hemorrhage of the lungs. Yours, etc., MICHAEL MARRION,

MR. COMSTOCK:
Yours received to-day at hand about Wilson Garments. There was a time when I had no faith in them, but when I came to put them on the Goods did me so much good I can't but speak well of them. They hav been a great blessing to many others I know. A great many of my friends hav been greatly blessed by having these Garments, and to-day they thank God there are such Garments. I suppose I hav had two hundred persons call to see me about these things.

I can't say too much about them. I am doing business on Fulton street, and hav been for twenty-eight years.

I was troubled with dyspepsia for a long time, but I hav never had it since.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., September 13, 1881.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:
DEAR SIR—In answer to your favor of September 10th relativ to Mr. Wilson, I beg leave to state that Mr. Wilson was introduced to me by a Mr. Berwin a year ago last April, Mr. Berwin informing me that Mr. Wilson was the inventor of certain Magnetic Clothing which he (Berwin) knew to be all that Mr. Wilson represented them to be. Having suffered very much from a rheumatic and nervous affection in my left foot, I was induced, through the persuasion of Mr. Berwin, to wear the WILSONIA SOLES. After putting them on I experienced immediate relief, and consider myself entirely well from wearing them, and gave Mr. Wilson permission to use my name as reference. Regarding Mr. Wilson's antecedents I know nothing, and care less, so long as poor humanity is benefited through him. Many of my acquaintances hav worn the WILSONIA, and speak in the most flattering terms about them. I hav always found Mr. Wilson a gentleman of sterling integrity, and hav known him to assist the poor and afflicte d in goods and money.
Yours very respectfully, BENJAMIN LEWIS.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:
DEAR SIR—Yours of 10th received. In reply will merely state that, as regards W. C. Wilson and his Garments, I will say that I used them and found them to be a great benefit—in fact a cure. I was afflicted with rheumatism so badly that I could not move. After applying his goods I found relief immediately. My name was used by my consent, and I will gladly indorse his Garments as a great benefit to all that are afflicted.
Yours respectfully, EDWARD W. FEW.

September 13, 1881.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK:
DEAR SIR—I received a letter from you to-day about the WILSONIA, which you condemn wrongly. I hav been sick for more than two years, and I had fifty-six doctors trying to cure me, without success, and they did not give me any relief until I put on the WILSONIA, which helped me to work at my trade, and now I am as well as ever. PETER LEHLBACH.

BROOKLYN, September 13, 1881.

DEAR SIR—Yours of September 10th making inquiries concerning the WILSONIA Garments at hand. In reply I hav to say that Mr. Wilson has my consent to refer to me. I still wear a portion of a suit of the WILSONIA Garments, and I believe with good results, having been troubled with dyspepsia and indigestion for many years. In my business relations with Mr. Wilson I hav found him satisfactory. Very respectfully,
J. H. LITTLEFIELD, Artist.
ANTHONY COMSTOCK, New York.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., September 15, 1881.

MR. A. COMSTOCK:
I received a letter of inquiry and abuse combined concerning a gentleman of this city (Mr. William Wilson), purporting to hav emanated from you, or at least bearing your signature.

My testimony (to which you allude to and as published in the papers) was given unsolicited by Mr. Wilson, and I hereby reiterate the facts as published over my wife's and own signature. Further. I consider the WILSONIA appliances the marvel of the world as a curative agency.

As regards the genealogy of Mr. Wilson I am not informed, neither do I care. Suffice to say, I know him to be a gentleman even though four years ago he stood knee deep in shavings behind a carpenter's bench, which, in my opinion, was and is far more preferable and honorable than striving to gain notoricty by defaming the character and ability of a superior, even though he be a poor cabinetmaker. Respectfully, T. DET. TRUAX.

NEW YORK, September 15, 1881.

MR. A. COMSTOCK:
I received your letter of inquiry on the WILSONIA Garments yesterday. As to the merit of the goods, I hav found them to be entirely as represented, and I take great pleasure in recommending them to all my friends and acquaintances who are sick and afflicted, knowing, as I do, their real worth. When I bought the goods of Mr. Wilson I did not question who his father or mother were, or what his business was some years ago, but I did ask about the goods, and that proving satisfactory, I bought them. However, I hav heard Mr. Wilson refer with pride to his being a mechanic working at the bench a few years ago. His name you will find to your satisfaction. William Cotter Wilson, in the directory. I am very truly yours.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK:
DEAR SIR—Your note of inqury of the 10th duly received. Contents noted. In reply, most respectfully say, I hav no knowedge of Mr. Wilson's antecedents whatever, nor do I think it matters so far as I am concerned. But of the appliance known as the WILSONIA I do know something about it from personal and happy experience. For more than nineteen years I had been a sufferer from partial paralysis of my entire left side, and hearing of the WILSONIA I wrote Mr. Wilson to send some one to measure me for a suit. He did so, and in less than ten minutes from the time I had them on my body they produced a feeling that alarmed me. I called Mrs. Mansfield, told her I was feeling strangely, telling her at the same timr I had on one of the WILSONIA garments. Mrs. Mansfield insisted I should take it off. But in that we differed in opinion. She assisted me to the putting on of my top coat, and I made an attempt to get out into the park opposit my office. I walked two and a half times rouud the reservoir park without stopping, which for years before I had not walked more than one-fourth that distance without resting several times. In the evening I walked seven times around the park without resting, and from that time to this I hav beeu able to walk from two and a half to four miles each day. I am an old man of nearly 70 years, and so supple ou my limbs I can jump over my office table or auy chair in my house. I know nothing of Mr. Wilson's antecedents, as before stated. I only know he has beeu the instrument of making me a well man, and for that he has my thanks and blessing. Sincerely,
JAS. V. MANSFIELD.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., September 14, 1881.

MR. COMSTOCK:
DEAR SIR—In reading one of the morning papers I read your letter addressed to Mr. Wm. Wilson, also a large number from people I am personally acquainted with, in reference to the benefit derived by them from wearing the WILSONIA appliances, and would say I know them to be true statements of their cases. I myself am clothed in the goods, as also my wife. We hav both been greatly benefited by wearing them, and do not by any means consider either Mr. Wilson or his garments the fraud that you say in your letter as people having represented to you. You hav evidently been imposed upon.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:
SIR—I hold in my hand a note, epistolary, of which the following is a copy:

"607 WARREN ST., BROOKLYN, 9, 15, 1881.

"Professor C. HATCH SMITH:

"MY DEAR FRIEND—I inclose letter from Anthony Comstock, Esq. Please answer the same as you are acquainted with all the facts. Yours truly, CLARIBEL STEVENS."

The facts are as follows:

Mrs. Stevens, to whom your letter is addressed, wears a suit of WILSONIA. Her two living daughters is in heaven), one son, Mr. Theodore Stevens, and a grandson, Mr. E. G. Vail, Jr., each possesses and constantly wears a suit of WILSONIA.

All of these goods hav been purchased upon intimate knowledge of their curativ properties. Perhaps my wonderful cure of paralysis (hemiphlegia) by wearing a suit of WILSONIA may hav influenced these purchases. These parties have received great benefit from wearing the WILSONIA, and they regard Mr. Wm. Wilson, "the carpenter," as a gentleman, a genius, and a man whose simple word is as good as a bond duly executed.

For evidence of my sickness I refer to my esteemed friends, Hon. James Watt, M.D., Doctors Bedell and Hamilton of Brooklyn, and Professor James L. Little, M.D., of New York.

For evident proof of my cure please call and see me. I will show you the dumb doctor WILSONIA that gave me freedom from disease of the heart, softening of the brain, rheumatism in the right hand and forearm, paralysis, and a pulse that intermitted one beat in five or seven or ten or three, etc.

Further, I will explain to your perception just how Doctor WILSONIA effects this magical cure. To wear WILSONIA is to get well of every form that disease may take. If I fail to prove this, notwithstanding your uncharitable epistle to Mrs. Stevens, I will obtain from William Wilson a handsome gratuity for your society. If you will become a WILSONIA missionary to the poor of New York you may stay the evils of vice and test WILSONIA in a Christlike frame of mind. They who evoke the law perish by the law. You will be no exception—or should be—to this fiat of Holy Writ.

SEPTEMBER 17, 1881.

MRS. SHAW, 325 EAST EIGHTY-FOURTH ST., N. Y.,
DEAR MADAME: I received your note yesterday, wishing to know as to my experience of the "WILSONIA" garments.

I hav had weakness in my back and loins upward of thirty years, often confined to bed for six and eight weeks at a time. I then used Davis & Kidder's Electric Machine, which partly relieved me, so that I could follow my occupation, but always felt the pain and weakness.

In 1876 I got paralyzed in my left side, when I was compelled to leave off work altogether.

In about a year my limbs commenced gaining strength. I could then open and close my left eye, but my back and loins never gathered strength. My feet and legs swelled almost to bursting. I was altogether confined to the house.

Having noticed the cures of the "WILSONIA" garments, I got a set at $103. I hav been now using them thirteen weeks and hav found great benefit. My limbs and back are greatly strengthened. I sleep and rest better than I ever did. My sight and hearing are greatly improved, and I think ultimately I will be cured as much as I can expect at my age.

I am 69 years of age, and weighed, when I commenced wearing the garments, 245 pounds. My weight is considerable less at present; my feet and legs do not pain me now, the swelling is reduced nearly to their former size.

My wife has rheumatism in her loin and leg, which prevent her from sleeping. I let her hav one of my pieces to lay on the place effected, which gives her great relief.

Such, dear madam, is my experience of "WILSONIA" garments. Yours respectfully,
HENRY SCULLY,
223 East 120th street, Harlem, N. Y.

CLEARFIELD, PA., Sept. 22, 1881.

MR. ANTHONY COMSTOCK,
DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 10th instant came duly to hand, and at the first convenient opportunity I reply to the interrogations contained therein.

First. As to the merits of the "WILSONIA," I can only speak from my own experience. I was afflicted with varicose veins so that I had been confined to my bed for five weeks. I concluded to try Mr. Wilson's magnetic goods. The first appliance gave me great relief, and in three weeks I was able to attend to my business. I was also afflicted with astima, and greatly to my surprise I was also entirely cured of that. In addition to the foregoing my general health is much improved, so that I am now ten pounds heavier than I hav been for years through the summer season.

The "WILSONIA" may be a "swindle,"but, if so, I hav not discovered it. Swindles, in my opinion, are as likely to originate in Nassau as Eighth street.

Second. Has Dr. Wilson my "permission" to publish? Certainly, if the use of my name will do him or any one else any good, he is welcome to it. Hoping that the above may be satisfactory, I remain yours, frankly,
GEORGE THORN.

A. COMSTOCK, ESQ.,
DEAR SIR: Having seen your letter denouncing WM. WILSON as a swindler and seen considerable in the papers relativ thereto I would say that I, too, am wearing the WILSONIA, having had a paralytic stroke six years ago. When I first had the stroke I was helpless as an infant, could not speak for eight days. I hav been wearing them since the 25th of June. My friend advised me to get them, but, really, I must confess I had but little faith in them. Had I known then what I know now, I would hav signed a bond for five thousand dollars if I could not receive the benefits from other sources, but what I would hav had them. I fully indorse Mr. WILSON, and do not believe him to be the fraud you represent him to be. It seems to me strange that you should hint at anything as to hi antecedents. What has that to do with his invention? I hav several friends that look upon Mr. WILSON as their friend and benefactor, having restored them to health appiness. Yours respectfully,
F. C. LILLIBRIDGE.

BROOKLYN, Sept. 27, 1881.

MR. COMSTOCK,
DEAR SIR: I received a number of days since a letter from you, asking concerning the WILSONIA garments—if I had tried them, and if I had given permission to publish my name in their connection, and other matter which I cannot now recall. I wore them for six months with most marvelous effect. I do not care to write the details, but will giv them to you in person at any time, as I hav gladly done to all applicants, though my permission as reference was never asked. Respectfully,
J. H. BARNEY.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.,
DEAR SIR: Miss Claribel Stevens hands me your letter of the 19th inst. for reply. I learned that you had addressed to William Wilson's patients a letter of apology and explanation, so that I ventured to request Mr. Wilson to let the whole subject drop. But, in your letter, you so utterly fail to rise to the importance of the issue, and so belittle the "noble cause," of which you are a recognized exponent, the first, knowing Mr. Wm. Wilson's high character for integrity and earnest love of truth; and, second, being alive to the necessity that a "public censor of vice" should stand before the people sans reproche, the question becomes hyper important; is it wise to pigeon hole the papers and relegate the issue to oblivion, as your letter, prima facie implies a desire ou your part to accomplish?

Your will scarcely controvert that great men suffer wrong rather than do wrong, and that a Christian frankly acknowledges his fault. In the issue Wilson vs. Comstock as you hav seen fit to act upon neither of these, in marking out your policy in re, I respectfully ask you earnestly to consider the following propositions?

First. Is WILSONIA the greatest marvel of the nineteenth century?

Second. So far has WILSONIA cured ninety per centum of those who hav been the pioneers to invest money in it?

Third. Are the patients of William Wilson deserters from the great army of chronics, of which such men as Drs. Frank H. Hamilton, Agnew, Bliss, and their like are the officers? Deserters from "Ye men of high degree" to enlist under the banner of WILSONIA, the standard of ye "poor cabinet makers?"

Fourth. Has WILSONIA cured epilepsy, progressiv locomotory ataxia, mitral regurgitation of the heart, paralysis, varicose veins. prolapsus uteri, suppressed scarlet fever, consumption, rheumatism, pyæmia, and all other forms of disease?

Fifth. Is the great army of medical men at fault as to what causes blood circulation, and must their wiseacre idealism vanish as a mirage before the wand of a "Poor Cabinet Maker?"

Such, dear sir, are a few of the salient points in the issue raised, and I am certain the cause of trne science will be conserved by a legal jurist in presence of the "Ermine" and

"GOD SAVE THE RIGHT."

If you are a true knight errant you will find WM. WILSON a foeman worthy of your steel.

And now, Mr. Comstock. please note the following; I put it on record here:

The life of James A. Garfield, autopsy facts and all taken into consideration, would, not might, hav been preserved, had Dr. Frank H. Hamilton granted my request conveyed to him by letter in New York, and telegraphed to Washington. Had I the right to address the worthy doctor, knowing that WILSONIA would save Garfield's life? Let the facts say whether the doctor's silence was courteous. I hav known Hamilton from boyhood. My father, the late I. H. Smith, M.D. of Auburn, N. Y., was the friend of his youth. My grandfather, the late Dr. Goodwin, of Geneva, was one of the founders of the Geneva Medical College, which was moved to Buffalo. Dr. Hamilton has now on his sheives the cream of my late father's medical library, which I presented to him.

Dr. Hamilton's first step to fame was his call to the professorship of surgery at Buffalo. But WILSONIA was not to save Garfield. Hamilton will yet learn that it would hav saved his illustrious patient. It was not to be. God's purpose is declared Your obedient servant,
C. HATCH SMITH.

No. 330 CLERMONT AV., BROOKLYN, Sept. 27, 1881.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK:
In answer to your communication permit me to say, that, whether William Wilson be a cabinet maker or not he has helped me and my wife and daughter. I hav seen what the WILSONIA garments hav done outside of my family, and I can testify that there stands not to-day a man on earth who is doing more good for suffering humanity than this same William Wilson.

You hav not got marble white enough on which to carve his name, and to lay your hand on him in the glorious work he is now performing is to lay the hand of the vandal on the ark of the covenant of common sense in the temple of human health.

I am his friend, for he has been mine, and I only wish, if it should be your misfortune to suffer some of the ills that poor human flesh is liable to, that obeying injunction of the great Master, he may return good for evil by clothing you with the garments you say are a swindle, and that you like St. Paul may drop persecution and become an apostle of the new dispensation of health inaugurated by the man who was poor enough to work at the bench for his bread. I am respectfully,
THOMAS DUGAN, Undertaker,
330 Clermont av., Brooklyn.

DEAR DOCTOR: My friend Jones, of Atlanta, certainly improved after wearing your WILSONIA. I left the city with him and remained several days. A patient of mine a Mr. Ostrander, may call on you any day for a suit. I hav advised him to do so. Yours, etc., Dr. WILDER.

TOMBSTONE, I. T., Sept. 24, 1881.

TO THE AGENT OF THE WILSONIA GARMENTS, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.,
DEAR SIR: I hav been wearing your garments for the past two months, am still wearing them, and I firmly believe they hav saved my life. Previous to wearing the garments I was suffering constant pain from fibroid tumor on the womb. Since using the garments I only hav pains once in a while, and the tumor is greatly reduced. I BELIEVE THEY WILL CURE ME, IF A CURE IS POSSIBLE. Please send me a number of circulars.
Yours truly. Mrs. LEE RUTAN.

REMARKABLE CURE OF RHEUMATISM.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.,
DEAR SIR: A few days ago I received a letter from you, and, owing to a little trouble in my family, I did not answer it, and now I take the first opportunity of doing so and reply to your inquiries. I may tell you that Mr. Wilson has my consent to use my name. I had been lying helpless to myself and family for three months, then I got the WILSONIA garments. I could not put them on myself; they were put on by a friend of mine, and, strange to say, after wearing them only ten days I was up and walking about, able to care for myself and family, and attend to my household duties. Therefore, I must say when all else failed the WILSONIA CURED. This is all I know about Mr. Wilson; he has been my best friend, and has my thanks and blessing; may good luck attend him and his. Good work will always prosper. I remain yours, etc.,
Mrs. MARY PLUMSEY, 161 Tillary street.

REMARKABLE RELIEF IN CASE OF LOCOMOTOR ATAXIA IN ONE WEEK.

325 HERKIMER ST., BROOKLYN, Oct. 10, 1881.

Prof. JAMES A. CARMICHAEL.
DEAR FRIEND: I did not see you last week when I called for those garments Mr. Wm. Wilson was so generous in presenting to me, through your kind influence. I hav had the garments on one week, and I experience quite a perceptible benefit. This to me is very encouraging. In one month I believe others will notice my improvement. I am not able to jump over a table yet, but I hav no doubt but that I will in less than a year. I must acknowledge here that I hav received more permanent benefit in the past one week than I hav in all former experience with physicians. If these garments restore me to activity, which I hav no doubt of, I shall feel it my duty to proclaim to the public, personally or otherwise, what I know about the virtues of WILSONIA, in gratitude to Mr. Wm. Wilson. Very respectfully yours,
PHILIP H. O'NEILL.

SUPERSTITION IN ALL AGES.

BY JOHN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., Sept. 28, 1878.

To MISS ANNA KNOOP, Dear Madam:
The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

Gems of Thought.

EMERSON says to us, "Do you each of you be true in your place," but it appears to me he has left out of sight that none of us can be true in our places unless others are true in their places. That is, as no single star could keep its orbit in the heavens and be true to its place unless all the stars and all the satellites around about it were true to their orbits, so no human soul can pass between time and eternity without being deflected and pulled out of place by the desires and repulsions of other bodies around it unless an effort is made to cause all to be true to their orbits.—Felix Adler.

TAKE away the false teachings of the church—that which is based on ancient fiction—and nearly all the Christian ministers hav said for two hundred years is worthless. It is time that we said to the pulpit: "No more fables, if you please. Tell us the truth, if you dare to do so; if not, keep silent." The reverence for the Bible is simply respect for certain men's opinions. We hav not yet got over hero-worship. The world still looks up to the priest as though he stood a little nearer God than common men. We must get rid of our reverence for steeples and pious cravats. The holiest things inside the church are the men and women, and the minister is only like the rest. Let the false teaching of the church no longer be respected, but us demand of ministers that they talk common sense.—L. K. Washburn.

BISHOP BUTLER, with all deference to his great name be it said, imparts into questions of conscience and into the spiritual domain a principle—when he asserts probability to be the very guide of life—applicable only to worldly concerns. A man will invest his money or take any other step in relation to his worldly affairs if he thinks the chances are in his favor; but he cannot be satisfied with a mere preponderance of chances that he has vital truth and that he will escape everlasting condemnation.—Goldwin Smith's Essays and Lectures.

IN the present state of knowledge the majority of people are so ill-informed as not to be aware of the true nature of belief; they are no. aware that all belief is involuntary and is entirely governed by the circumstances which produce it. They who nav paid attention to these subjects know that what we call the will has no power over belief, and that consequently a man is nowise responsible for his creed, except in so far as he is responsible for the events which gave him his creed. Whether, for instance, he is a Mohammedan or a Christian, will usually resolve itself into a simple question of his geographical antecedents. He who is born in Constantinople will hold one set of opinions; he who is born in London will hold another set. Both act according to their light and their circumstances, and if both are sincere both are guileless. —Buckle's Essays.

No man ever sets himself about anything but upon some view or other which serves him for a reason for what he does; and whatever faculties he employs, the understanding, with such light as it has, well or ill-informed, constantly leads; by that light, true or false, all his operativ powers are directed. The will itself, how absolute and uncontrolable soever it may be thought, never fails in its obedience to the dictates of the understanding.—Locke's Conduct of the Understanding.

I DO not understand how a power which is salutary when exercised virtually can be noxious when exercised directly.—Macaulay.

BECAUSE Christians believe the majority should rule is no reason that they should force those who think minorities hav rights to do as they choose to make them do. They got into power and then made laws to suit themselvs, and now the progressiv minority must bow and submit till they in turn become strong and powerful. Once Christ and his few humble followers were greatly in the minority (as the story reads), and they had to bow to the popular demands and wear the yoke of the civil law, just as we now do. At last the leader of these humble followers was imprisoned, condemned, and crucified, just as they would now crucify us if you could do it—but as they can only falsify and misrepresent (for simple belief) that is what they now aim at.—Elmina Drake Slenker.

I HOLD Christianity to be pernicious to the intellect; it demands that the reason shall be sacrificed upon the altar; it orders civilized men to believe in the legends of a savage race. It places a hideous image, covered with dirt and blood, in the holy of holies; it rends the sacred veil of truth in twain. It teaches that the creator of the universe, that sublime, that inscrutable power, exhibited his back to Moses, and ordered Hosea to commit adultery and Ezekiel to eat dung. There is no need to say anything more. Such a religion is blasphemous and foul. Let those admire it who are able. I, for my part, feel it my duty to set free from its chains as many as I can.—Winwood Reade.

THE improvement of natural knowledge, whatever direction it has taken, and however low the aims of those who may hav commenced it, has not only conferred practical benefits on men, but, in so doing, has effected a revolution in their conceptions of the universe and of themselvs, and has profoundly altered their modes of thinking and their views of right and wrong. I say that natural knowledge, seeking to satisfy natural wants, has found the ideas which can alone still spiritual cravings. I say that natural knowledge, in desiring to aseertain the laws of comfort, has been driven to discover those of conduct, and to lay the foundations of a new morality.—Huxley's Lay Sermons.

A GOVERNMENT which, not content with requiring decency, requires sanctity, oversteps the bounds which mark its proper functions. It may be laid as a universal rule that a government which attempts more than it ought, will perform less. . . . A government which, not content with repressing scandalous excesses, demands from its subjects fervent and austere piety, will soon discover that while attempting to render an impossible service to the cause of virtue, it has in truth only promoted vice.—Macaulay.

Odds and Ends.

THE acme of politeness was reached by the Nevada mining superintendent who posted a placard reading, "Please do not tumble down the shaft."

"I HAV come to the conclusion," said Brown, "that the less a man knows the happier he is." "Allow me to congratulate you, Brown," said Fogg."

"IF Jones undertakes to pull my ears," said a loud-spoken young man, "he'll just hav his hands full." Those who heard him looked at his ears and smiled.

A DYING Irishman was asked by his priest if he was willing to renounce the devil and all his works. "Oh, yer honor," says Pat, "don't ask me that; I'm not sure which road I shall take, an don't want to make myself inemies."

THE Illinois county fair committee made a report for a newspaper "the best display was made by Mrs. ——." There was a lively rattling in the office when the journal issued with the startling announcement that "the bust display," etc.

GOD made at the time of creation

Eve swallowed a chunk
Of this orthodox junk,
And upset universal salvation.—Ren.

AN old gentleman, finding a couple of his nieces fencing with broomsticks, said, "Come, come, my girls, that kind of accomplishment will not aid you in getting husbands." "I know it, uncle," responded one of the girls, as she gave a lunge, "but it will help to keep our husbands in order when we get 'em."

"I LOVE my wife," young Mr. Osculus, who has been married only six weeks, was saying, "I love my wife as no other man does." And then the rippling smile of approbation went around the company and died away in whispering giggles in shadowed window-seats and dimly-lighted corners, and the young man felt that he had failed to make himself understood just as he wished to be.

'TWAS a terrible moment. The man was evidently drowning, while the crowd on shore stood helpless and horrified. At this juncture some one yelled, "Get a boat!" But there was no boat within ten miles. The suspense became awful, and the sun sank into the misty bosom of the west like a bloody pumpkin. All at once a female voice was heard above the roar of the breakers, "Never mind the boat; take one of my shoes." It was the voice of a heroic Chicago woman, and the applause that greeted it was heard three hundred miles at sea.

EVERY year, at Christmas, the San Antonio Mexicans celebrate a kind of imitation of the "Passion Play," called "Pastores." The Virgin Mary, the apostles, including Judas Iscariot, all appear and act their parts. On the last occasion of the play Judas was missing.

"What has become of Judas?" asked one of the spectators of St. Peter, with whom he was well acquainted.

"Judas be ——," was the reply; "last year we had to choke him to make him giv back the thirty pieces of silver that we gave him in the play, so this year we apostles won't let him stick his nose inside of the circus tent."

A SCHOLAR who had "been over to the map of Asia," was reviewed by his teacher, with the following result:

Teacher—"What is geography?"
Scholar—"A big book."
Teacher—"What is the earth composed of?"
Scholar—"Mud."
Teacher—"No; land and water."
Scholar—"Well, that makes mud, don't it?"
Teacher—"What is the shape of the earth?"
Scholar—"Flat."
Teacher—"You know better; if I should dig a hole through the earth, where would I come out?"
Scholar—"Out of the hole"

A STRAIGHT MAN.

It used to be all the fashion with lecturers to hav the mayor of the town or some other prominent citizen introduce them to the audience as a send-off, and upon one occasion in the years gone by when the temperance lecturer struck a certain town in Michigan, not over fifty miles from Detroit, the mayor stood up before the audience and began:

"Ladies and—and—ladies and—and——"

"Gentlemen," whispered the lecturer.

"Yes, of course—ladies and gentlemen, I hav the honor to—to- I hav the honor to—to——"

"Introduce," again whispered the lecturer.

"That's the checker—I hav the honor to introduce you to the notorious—'m, the honorable—the honorable Mister—Mister——"

Here occurred another painful pause, during which the mayor walked over and asked the lecturer his name.

"I hav the honor to introduce," he repeated, as he walked back, "the honorable Mister—Mister—hang it! I never could remember a name two minutes. It's of no account, however. He and I hav been playing poker all the afternoon at the hotel, and I giv you my word that he is as straight as a ten-foot pole. Get up, judge, and shoot off your lecture!"

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 27 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Failing Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and turpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

IN his work on worms, Mr. Darwin points out that Stonehenge has not been brought to its decadence by time alone. The earth worm has undermined it stone by stone, and the very monolith lately propped up by Sir E. Antrobus has probably been put out of the perpendicular by the action of the worm.

IT is said that a Birmingham curate the other day stated from the pulpit that the Lord fed five hundred persons with five loaves. The clerk whispered from below, "Sir, the reading is five thousand." "Hold your tongue, you fool," was the reply, "it's just as much as they can do to believe the five hundred."

IT IS announced that Messrs. D. Appleton & Co., hav determined not to be any longer the publishers of the North American Review. The reason is that that periodical, in a recent article by Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, gave a conspicuous place to sentiments and expressions which the Messrs. Appleton regard as blasphemous! Yet they continue to print and sell the works of Prof. Ernst Haeckel.

THE sermon that the Rev. James L. Hill delivered at Lynn, several days ago, was not remarkable in quality; yet the preacher became so affected that he had to lean on the desk for support, the sexton fell flat in the aisle, the choir could not sing the doxology, and a number of women were carried out in a fainting condition. It was coal gas from the heater, and not eloquence from the pulpit, that produced this commotion.

WHAT may not happen in 1881 it is hard to say. Among the most unlikely happenings, viewed from the outlook of a year ago, was the present importation of cabbages from Germany and potatoes from Ireland. The drouth and consequent high prices for vegetables are responsible for the fact that real Irish potatoes, genuin Champions and Skerries, are in the market. They come from a land to whose starving peasants America last years sent ship loads of supplies.

ITALY at the commencement of the present year possessed 1,454 newspapers and periodicals, of which 149 were dailies. Milan headed the list with 210 journals; then came Rome, with 147; Naples, 114; Florence, 101; Turin, 87; Palermo, 59; Genoa, 56; Bologna, 61; Alexandria, 39, and Venice, 32. Of the daily papers 18 appear at Rome, 10 at Naples, 13 at Palermo, 12 Milan, 9 at Florence, 6 at Turin, and 5 at Venice. On an average there is one journal to 19,281 of the population, and 8,000 readers to each journal. The oldest Italian journal dates from 1797. In 1836 there were only 185 periodicals in Italy, of which 110 were published in Rome.

THE Quarterly Review contains a powerful article on the "Revised Version of the New Testament." Of the revisers themselvs the writer says: "These accomplished scholars hav succeeded in producing a text vastly more remote from the inspired autographs of the evangelists than any which has appeared since the invention of printing." Discussions of this sort will do great good. They will lessen the popular reverence for the Bible, and go far to destroy the Protestant fetich. We had a New Testament, we hav now a New New Testament, and by and by we shall hav a New New New Testament. By that time the "infallible Bible" will hav become a dead superstition.—London Freethinker.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER, late Secretary for Ireland, piques himself on his power of imitating his late chief, Lord Beaconsfield's, tone and manner, as do many others, his strong peculiarities having invited imitation. One of his "Dizzy" stories is that when the premier come into office, in 1874, Lord Rosslyn was named for Master of the Buckhounds, being a good sportsman and good-looking, the only objection being that "he swore like nobody since the army of Flanders." "Swears, does he?" said Dizzy, "then we will make him Lord High Commissioner to the Church of Scotland." And he did.

A TRAIN on the Northern Pacific was twice obstructed by buffaloes some days ago near the border line between Montana and Dakota, and was forced to come almost to a standstill. There were a number of soldiers aboard armed with repeating rifles, and nearly every passenger had one or more revolvers. They all joined in a brisk fire at the buffaloes, which numbered sixteen the first time and twenty to thirty the second; but the animals seemed wholly indifferent to the bullets. None of them fell or even showed signs of being wounded, and the train was unable to proceed until they saw fit to turn tail and scamper off.

THE reports of the Foreign Missions show it costs six millions of dollars for each heathen that is converted to Christianity! How do the starving Christian poor relish this idea? Every pagan who promises to believe in Jesus Christ takes enough from charity to feed, clothe, and provide a home for every poor man in this city. What does a poor white man get for believing? He gets nothing, but has to take from his hard earnings what little he has got to support this stupendous fraud on suffering humanity. If the people would only stop and think, 'twould be a long time before they put their hands in their pockets again for any such put-up job as this.—Mayflower.

MR. CHARLES DARWIN'S most recent book treats of the formation of vegetable mold through the action of worms: "We hav seen," he says, discussing their mental qualities, "that worms are timid. It may be doubted whether they suffer as much pain when injured as they seem to express by their contortions. Judging by their eagerness for certain kinds of food they must enjoy the pleasure of eating. Their sexual passion is strong enough to overcome for a time their dread of light. They perhaps hav a trace of social feeling, for they are not disturbed by crawling over each other's bodies." The intelligence of worms has been made the subject of prolonged and profound study by Mr. Darwin. The great philosopher has occupied whole days and nights in observing "mere worms," which to non-naturalists are regarded as supremely unimportant.

A GENTLEMAN of much intelligence and trustworthiness, who has just arrived from Panama, givs a very gloomy account of the state of the state of things at the Lesseps canal. The death rate is alarming, especially among foreigners. Of two hundred Frenchmen sent out within the last few weeks, and who arrived ruddy and vigorous, eighty-five had died when he left, and nearly all the others were in hospital. The Gallic immigrants all take brandy and absinthe to excess, under the mistaken impression that it will enable them to withstand the climate, while it has precisely the opposit effect, and hastens the coming of their certain doom. Americans will not be tempted by any wages to remain. The only workmen who can withstand the horrors of the heat and rains are the West Indian negroes and those from around Carthagena. Of course, these men will not work like English or French navvies, and can command, nevertheless, their own price. The consequence is that work estimated to cost three cents a foot has cost $1.25. If under these circumtances M. de Lesseps can accomplish his task, she will justly win a conspicuous renown.

THE Sydney Bulletin says: "The most popular preacher told his hearers on Sunday that according to Babbage's theory of sound, not only every thought that man has shaped, but every whisper that woman has uttered, will be printed in everlasting characters in the air and read out on the day of judgment. If this is so, it will be a long job, and space will be pretty scarce when that important occasion arrives. In fact, we've noticed a closeness in the air this last week, even.

"If all the women's talk we hear,
In endless waves of sound,
Be written in the atmosphere
Till judgment day comes round—

"Oh, then, when old time's phonograph
Is carefully unrolled,
Won't resurrected spirits laugh
To hear the secrets told!

"What tales that tinfoil will outpour,
Such spicy bits of scandal;
But—what a long, long contract for
The man that turns the handle!"

THE war over the affairs of the American Bible Society has begun in good earnest. The Connecticut brethren who hav attacked the old society say that they mean business, and that they can prove all they charge. The managers denounce the charges as unjustifiable and proceeding from malice. A pleasant joke is afloat in regard to the examination of the condition of the Bible Society. This examination was made at the instance of the Connecticut brethren, who sent a gentleman whom they call an "expert" to explore the books and accounts and make a report. The joke is that the Bible Society officials say that this "expert" did not know the difference between "assets" and "liabilities." If the statement of these officials be correct, it shows a strange state of opinion in Connecticut as to what constitutes an "expert" in religious bookkeeping. The Connecticut brethren complain that they and their "expert" were not treated with distinguished courtesy.

AN Italian professor has just issued a ghastly volume on suicide. In all this world it seems Calabria stands lowest on the scale of those who are weary of breath. Norway stands third, and Ireland fouth. England and America are very high, and the recklessness and misery which make life insupportable reach the maximum in the center of Europe, from Geneva to Paris, and through Saxony, Baden, Prussia, and the Austro-Hungarian provinces. The small German states are the very highest. Suicide has increased everywhere for the last forty years, even in Ireland, where the figure is so low, from ten in the million to eighteen in the million of population, while England and America hav mounted from sixty-two to sixty-eight, Prussia from seventy-four to one hundred and forty-two, France from fifty-four to one hundred and fifty, and Saxony rushes on with an average of two hundred and sixty-four. Childless widowers are by far the largest number on the sorrowful list.

HINDOO girls, says the St. James's Gazette, are taught to think of marriage almost as soon as they can talk; indeed, they are often contracted in marriage at six years of age, and go to liv with their husbands at twelve or thirteen. Before this, at the age of five, they are taught to propitiate the gods in order to secure a good husband and their little minds are distracted by the idea of what a model husband ought to be. The orthodox conception is a husband like the god Siva, who was holy, austere, advanced in years, and faithful and devoted to one wife, the goddess Doorga. Good little girls revolt at the idea of a husband marrying a second wife while the first is alive, and will consequently confess their anxiety to marry a faithful spouse like Siva; and they learn from their elders to utter the most vindictiv curses against a rival wife. But for all that, Christna is the idol of Hindoo woman, and he was anything but faithful to one wife. He not only kicked over milk pans, and ran away with the clothes of milkmaids when they went to bathe, but he danced and flirted with other men's wives, eloped with royal damsels, and married an infinit number of beautiful women.

A RECENT comparison of the amount of work done and the amount of money expended by the American Bible Society shows that it costs twenty dollars to distribute a one-dollar Bible, and about fifteen hundred dollars to convert a one-cent heathen. Financial crookedness is charged.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

THE SUBJECT OF VACCINATION.

In view of these momentous facts, it is not strange that learned and thinking men have expressed themselves as follows: "Doctors are paid to vaccinate, paid again a bonus for doing it well, and paid again for attending to the sickness produced by this blood-poisoning. When will people see that vaccination is unnatural, sinful, filthy, and dangerous, and that doctors are blinded by self-interest and professional pride from admitting themselves to be wrong so long as it pays to do wrong?"—George Dawson, M. A.

"I have no hesitation in asserting the confident opinion, as the result of much study of the question, historically and statistically, that vaccination is a ridiculous delusion; that there is no evidence that it has the slightest effect as a preventive of smallpox; that indeed the negative evidence is all the other way, while the positive evidence of the mischief it has done is incontrovertible."—P. A. Taylor, M.P.

"The venom of vaccination gathers as it goes. Vaccination is worse to-day than it was ten years since, for it has traversed more impure bodies of man and beast, and derives a fresh lineage and inheritance of pollution from each transmission. That is the physiological side of the case. It has also produced and intensified venom in the minds of the medical pro-vaccinators; and in their rage at our educated light, given to the people, made them scout truth and decency in their opposition to our homes. Their fresh assault is on the weakest—on miserably poor women confined in parish houses, whose new-born babes are violated by vaccination within a day or week after birth."—J. J. Garth Wilkinson, M. R. C. S.

"I have never doubted vaccination until I saw instances of parents prosecuted remorselessly and fined thirty and even forty times, and others who could not pay fines repeatedly imprisoned because, having lost one darling child or more by the effects of vaccination, they most naturally refused to imperil the existence of their other little ones. Such persecutions shocked me and led me to inquire. I now believe that vaccinnation kills more children than smallpox does. It conveys from arm to arm festering impurity, and too often disgusting disease. When will the noble profession of medicine free itself from the temptation of pecuniary emolument or the influence of authority, too long obeyed with unreasononing and uninquiring docility."—C. H. Hopwood, M. P., Q. C.

"When the law comes into conflict with the consciences of men, it is the law that should be altered and not conscience that should be forced."—John Morley.

"I should not have thought it advisable to enforce vaccination by compulsory legislation, because it is a principle of common law that no man should be compelled to submit himself or family to a medical or surgical operation without his own consent.—John McLaren, M.P., Lord Advocate of Scotland.

"It is my firm belief that vaccination has been a curse instead of a blessing."—B. F. Cornell, M.D., New York.

"No state can be called free when a man has not perfect control over his own health, bodily, mental, and spiritual."—John Stuart Mill.

"I wish I had known some time since that the vaccination persecution had in any case been carried so far as you describe, as I might have made use of the fact. It would have served farther to enforce the parallel between this medical popery, which men think so defensible, and the religious popery, which they think so indefensible."—Herbert Spencer.

"So long as our bodies are healthy, Parliament has no right to command assault upon them under the pretext of public health. To punish parents for trying so keep their children's blood inviolate is a form of tyranny unheard of until modern times, and emphatically disgraceful as it is impious. Our greatest achievements are the repeal of pernicious laws."—Prof. F. W. Newman.

"Priestly despotism is bad, but medical despotism is intolerable."—Right Hon. J. W. Henley.

"The law which inflicts penalty after penalty on a parent who is unwilling so have his child vaccinated is monstrous and ought to be repealed."—John Bright.

"When men suffer imprisonment over and over again rather than comply with a law which they assert has caused the deaths of their children, it is high time something should be done either to disabuse their minds, if they are in error, or to alter the action of the law if they are right. I cannot be indifferent to a question which affects the happiness of families so materially."—Arthur J. Otway, M. P.

"You know how heartily I sympathize with your views, believing vaccination to be utterly useless, and, what is far worse, positively dangerous to health, life, as now proved officially by the recent parliamentary return."—W. J. Collins, M. D., L.R.C.P.

The testimony of many more could be adduced, but it is hardly necessary. The proofs of the great injury of vaccination are too patent for them to be longer doubted. The only marvel is that men who profess to be intelligent, human, and justice-loving, still not only advocate this murderous practice, but still are in favor of parents being compelled to submit to their loved babes being inoculated with the most virulent poison known to our race or be fined heavily and sent to prison for refusing to comply. Mr. Tebb informed me that he had several times been brought before the civil authorities for opposing the vaccination of his child, and that the defense of the cases and the fines imposed have amounted to more than a thousand dollars, and that a poor man of his acquaintance who was unable to pay fines, but who was determined that his child's blood should not be poisoned by deadly virus, had several times been sent to prison.

I wished to know why it is when the most pernicious results follow vaccination, and when men of such intelligence as those above quoted so positively condemn it, that the practice is still continued and forced upon unwilling but helpless people. He said the medical fraternity were responsible for it; they get very handsome fees and perquisites for perpetuating the wrong. The Boards of Guardians in England and Wales are the local vaccination authorities of the kingdom. They have at work under them first, for the performance of the vaccinations, more than three thousand medical practicioners acting as public vaccinators; and secondly, for the non-medical part of the business about fourteen hundred so-called vaccination officers. For the years 1840-1880 $10,222,276 have been paid to the English medical men for vaccinating children. The bonuses and awards that have been paid for thirteen years have amounted to $643,205. The inspectors are paid the sum of $41,500 for the same period, making a grand total almost frightful to contemplate, and all for the disseminating blood poisons of the very worst kind. Here is the whole secret—as long as doctors can receive from government the most munificent sums of money they will continue to be in favor of vaccination though twenty-five per cent of the children so vaccinated die of syphilis or some other frightful disease. It is saddening to think that men who ought to have the welfare of their fellow-beings at heart should continue to sacrifice the health and lives of the little ones for the sake of the profit they derive from it.

The regular schools of medicine are just about as orthodox, bigoted, and intolerant as theological schools; and having once accepted a certain set of ideas as truth, they are just about as slow to relinquish them; and insist with just about the same tenacity that those views shall be accepted by the people as gospel truths, or as settled facts. It has for so many years been the received opinion among physicians and others that vaccination prevents small-pox, that it seems as though a great portion of the regular orthodox physicians still maintain its truth, whatever the consequences may be. But all old-fogy ideas and superstitions must in time yield to the growing intelligence of the people; and it is only to be regretted that so much time is required for the true light of truth to be seen and understood by the masses. But with such men as are interested in this good work in England, and with the energy they display, it is only a question of time when the subject shall be regarded as it should be, and when the law-making powers in England and in other countries will be so governed by correct principles as to no longer force parents, under penalties of fines and imprisonments, to have the blood of their little ones poisoned for life.

We have as much to accomplish in this direction in America as has to be done in Europe. True, parents are not sent to prison in America for not suffering their babes to be poisoned, but it amounts to nearly the same thing. In some of our states such children as are not vaccinated are deprived of all emoluments of public moneys for common school purposes. Such parents as object to their children being poisoned by vaccination are compelled so see them grow up in ignorance, or incur the expense of private tuition. They are thus compelled to choose between poison and ignorance. This is the state of things in the good old state of Massachusetts, which has shown such readiness in the cause of free schools alike for rich and poor. She should not long occupy the disgraceful position which she now holds to compel blood-poisoning, or a deprivation of common school facilities. It stands her sons and daughters in hand to see that this state of things does not continue. Many parents are now forced to deprive their children of the benefit of the common public schools of the state or submit to the poisoning and death from vaccination. This should not long continue to be the rule in such an intelligent country.

In our own state and city of New York it is not much better; there the tens of thousands of emigrants which monthly reach our shores are compelled by our laws to submit to this blood poisoning, which means nothing less than death or living wretchedness to a considerable percentage of them. It is a disgrace to New York that such a law should be continued. No man, whether native or foreign born, should be compelled to have his blood thus poisoned or that of his beloved child. Let it be hoped that the law and rule in this respect may meet with a radical and speedy change.

I will state in this connection that the people of America are not wholly inactive in this direction. There is in New York an Anti-Vaccination League, of which Prof. Alexander Wilder is President; Executive Committee, J. E. Briggs, M.D., Thomas A. Granger, M.D., and Robert A. Gunn, M.D.; Secretary, J. R. Nichols; Treasurer, M. L. Holbrook, M.D. I do hope this league may grow and exert such as influence in New York and in America that poisoning the blood of helpless little children may no longer be compelled by law. It is my desire that every one in America would coöperate in this good work. Prof. Alexander Wilder has spoken out words of truth on this great subject. These words of his are worthy to be inscribed in letters of gold: "Vaccination is physiologically and morally wrong, and its advocates are inherently conscious of it, or else they would trust to argument and conviction." The man who can speak in that bold manner is a president of a worthy cause, and all in favor of the movement should rally around him.

Jenner himself admitted that kine pox alone was not a sure preventative of smallpox, and that to make kine virus certain the matter should be taken from the filthy disease in horses called greasy heel which is engendered by horses standing for days and weeks in a filthy stable, thus producing a most virulent poison. This the great apostle of vaccination held should be inoculated into the kine and from the kine into the the human race, and thus going from arm to arm, accumulating poison as it goes. Now common sense insists that all this is wrong. Vaccination by the introduction of that poison into the human system does not prevent smallpox, but does engender other diseases which prove fatal in thousands of cases.

Though the major part of physicians are scientific men in object and modes of procedure, they show a liability to get in deep ruts hard to emerge from; much the same as with theologians, they wish to make public sentiment to bend to their views. Besides, some of the means they employ are reprehensible. I particularly have in view the processes of vivisection or cutting and torturing poor dumb animals in the interest of so-called science. To some extent it may be admissible, but to keep dogs and other animals with their sensitive nerves exposed for days and weeks together, to apply to them combustible materials like petroleum and then set it on fire to note how long they may suffer, or how long life may endure under the most conceivable torture, seems unnecessary. It is not generally known to what extent this business has been carried in some of the medical institutions of Europe. Some of the first surgeons and physicians of the age have proved themselves heartless butchers and torturers. One German professor, I am informed, boasted that he had tortured in various ways seven thousand dogs! I am very sorry if science requires such cruelty as this.

I have had some melancholy experience in this matter of vaccination, and have good reason to be opposed to it. Some thirty years ago I was induced to think I should be re-vaccinated, as it might be possible that the vaccination in my childhood had lost its effects. I accordingly took some vaccine matter from the arm of a person whom I supposed had good blood, and the result was a most fearful state of things. My arm and shoulder became greatly swelled, and fully one hundred and fifty angry sores broke out upon my arm and shoulder which were a long time in getting well; and this was followed by a serious attack of inflammatory rheumatism, which made me helpless for many months and was by far the worst sickness I ever had in my life. I subsequently learned that the person from whose arm I had taken the vaccine matter had had rheumatism, and there is no question in my mind but that I contracted a very painful disease, which caused my joints so to swell that they have never fully recovered from it by putting in my own arm the most virulent poison from the arm of another. If this were to be the last word I have to say to you it would be: "Do not suffer your children to be vaccinated. Depend upon cleanliness and good habits in the prevention of smallpox, and do not inoculate your dear offspring with a poison far worse than smallpox."

Some of my letters have been too long, and I will now bring this one to an abrupt termination.

May health, peace of mind, and prosperity abide with you now and for many years in the future.

D. M. B.

To Berlin and Vienna.

VIENNA, Oct. 13, 1881.

DEAR READERS: You accompanied me in my last letter as far as the small town in Germany where baggage is examined after leaving Holland. The train I was on being a slow one, I stopped over at Salsburg for three hours for the express train, which makes good speed. I traveled all night, for it is a long way to Berlin from the western border of the country; I judge fully two hundred miles. The land is not very good after leaving Holland. It is very level, but sandy and light, and in places wet and swampy. All northern Germany from the Baltic to a long way south of Berlin was once doubtless covered by the ocean. How many thousand years ago this was it is not possible to tell now, but it was probably before the last glacial period, or over 100,000 years ago.

The night was rainy and dark, and I could not see the country so well as I might have done under other circumstances, but could see enough to tell me the land is not rich, and that residences are not very numerous. About three o'clock we passed through Hanover, a brick business town of over 100,000 inhabitants. It was a poor time of the day in which to make calls, and I decided to see it at another time, if ever.

As daylight gradually appeared we had outrode the rain and found ourselves in a sharp, clear air. The ground was white with frost and the air decidedly chilly. This was the first frost I had seen, and I had noticed that the most tender plants had not been frost-bitten. But notwithstanding the coolness of the morning, I saw men and women out in the fields before the sun had risen, commencing the labors of the day. The men were plowing and the women digging potatoes and other roots. The country continues very level, the soil is sandy and easy to work, but it must be poor in quality. The stubble of the gathered grain is light, indicating that the growth was feeble. But few stacks of grain are seen, the gathered products of the farms are very scarce, and even the farmers themselves are not as frequent as one would expect. The country has much the appearance of a sandy waste. As we near Berlin however, there is more indications of a productive soil, and larger numbers of people are working in the fields and gardens. Very few fences are seen, the whole country presenting the appearance, especially in the early morning, of a large, level, uncultivated prairie. The trees do not reach a large growth, and are not numerous.

We reached the Berlin station soon after seven, and as the Central Hotel had been recommended to me, I entered the omnibus bearing that name, and we were soon rolling down through the stately suburbs to the center of the city. One is soon impressed with the fact that Berlin is a fine city. In all the newer parts of the town, which are more than half the area, the streets are wide and straight, the buildings tall, stately, and beautiful, exhibiting the modern and improved styles of architecture. Shade trees are seen on many of the streets, extensive grounds, are connected with many of the better residences, and flowers and shrubbery are met with on every hand.

The Central Hotel is the largest I have seen in Europe. Its front on Frederick strasse is 450 feet; it incloses a court perhaps 150 by 75 feet, with a width of perhaps 300 feet. The entrance to the hotel is from the court, and to the court by two capacious passages leading to the two streets upon which it fronts. The hotel is five stories in hight, and has five hundred rooms for guests, independent of the dining-rooms, parlors, etc. I was consigned to room No. 390 in the third story, to which I was taken by elevator. The floors of the halls are fine, polished composite or mosaic, the stairs are very wide, and of stone. Large mirrors are at the landings, and profusely located throughout the establishment. The dining-room is very capacious, about 250 feet in length by 80 in width. Adjoining it on the right is a very extensive winter garden, inclosed under an iron and glass roof, profusely filled with exotic plants and flowers, numerous hanging baskets of luxuriant climbers and decorative plants, with trailing vines and growths leading in all directions high above the head. The windows between the dining room and the winter garden are ten feet by five, and all one piece of plate glass. Concerts are held in the garden every evening. The house is well furnished in every particular. The beds are of excellent quality, with spring mattresses and sacks of down on the top. It is peculiarly a German custom to have in cold weather a tick full of the softest, lightest down, in a white case, on the top of the bed-clothes, to keep the sleeper warm. Although they are nearly as large as the bed below, they are very light, and not oppressive unless from the uncomfortable heat they impart. On several occasions I found them too warm and had to roll them down to the foot. I have found them everywhere since arriving in Holland. In right cold weather they must be rather welcome, but still good blankets would be preferable. Of course this Central (accent on the second syllable) Hotel is a good deal more expensive than were my quarters in London, but when a person is traveling around the world at other people's expense he ought at least to put on some style a part of the time.

After partaking of a good beefsteak with fried potatoes and a cup of coffee, with a "brode" or two, I was ready to see the town. It is fortunate for me that in every city in Europe the word beefsteak is understood, and if that is the viand desired, the name only has to be spoken and it will be forthcoming in about half an hour. I walked first out to the Linden, a magnificent street about two hundred feet wide, with a roadway on each side next to the wide sidewalk, then two rows of trees, between which is a wide promenade for pedestrians. It runs from the old imperial palace on the east, where are also many magnificent public buildings, to the Brandenburg gate on the west, a distance of about a mile. The name "Linden" comes from the linden trees which once ornamented the thoroughfare, but have given way to trees of other growth. But it is very beautiful. The Berliners think much of their Unter de Linden. The Brandenburg gate is a stately affair, the massive caption, ten feet in depth, twenty feet in width, and one hundred or more in length, resting on some forty heavy Doric columns, thirty or forty feet in hight. In the top is a large bronze figure of the goddess of victory in her war chariot drawn by four prancing steeds. When Napoleon wielded his power over Berlin he took those bronze figures of the goddess, chariot, and horses to Paris, and when the Germans returned the compliment some twelve years ago by bringing the gay French capital under subjection they took Victory & Co. back with them and placed them on the same gate where they formerly were, but placing the heads of the goddess and the horses as coming from the west, which was the direction the soldiers marched from upon their triumphant return. Within the Brandenburg gate and where the broad street is still more broadened out are the residences of the ministers of other nations, and a delightful residence place they have. Many of the buildings thus occupied are truly palatial in style.

Immediately adjoining the western portion of the city are some thousands of acres of what was once deer forest, in which deer and other animals were hunted by the German nobility. But it is now laid off in streets, drives, and walks, interspersed with magnificent statues; the grounds are cleaned up, the underbrush removed, so that it is a most beautiful natural park of great extent. I thought it superior to parks with artificial growths only. It will be remembered that Berlin and all the surrounding country is nearly as level as the sea. There is one swell or hill twenty or thirty feet high, probably an old sand-bank left by the ocean in former ages, and this is the mountain of the Berliners. Here various shows and displays are made, being the most conspicuous position.

Within a few hundred yards of the Brandenberg gate, within the deer garden, are beautifully laid off grounds, with fountains, paved walks, ornamentation of shrubbery and flowers, and in the midst stands a beautiful monument nearly two hundred feet in hight. It stands on an elevated dressed stone plateau. The first story rests upon sixteen polished red granite columns fifteen or twenty feet in hight. Around the base of the monument and within the granite columns are extensive bronze bas-reliefs, representing the various victorious wars in which Germany has been, and around the entire base are battle scenes portrayed in rich mosaic work with brilliant colors. The column, extending one hundred and fifty feet from the lower portion, is some ten or twelve feet in diameter, and is fluted, corresponding with the sixteen granite columns below. At equal distance are three circles or bands of gilt cannon, one in each flute, making forty-eight of the gilt cannons in all. Being of large size, they give the monument a very rich appearance. But the masterpiece is on the top, a standing figure of the winged goddess of victory, twenty feet in hight and of size in proportion, holding the emblems of victory in her hands. The entire figure is richly gilt and presents a magnificent appearance. If it commemorated something besides war and bloodshed it would be more pleasing to contemplate. I paid the mark demanded, and climbed the two hundred and sixty steps to the goddess and had a fair view of the city below me. It is really a finely-built town, especially the newer portion. A large share of the buildings are very extensiv and five stories in hight, and are constructed of a light gray freestone. There are no stone quarries of building stone near Berlin, but they abound in great quantities in various districts within a hundred miles away. Canal transportation being very cheap, the conveying of the building stone to where it is desired is not dear. Berlin, with a population of a million, has eighteen thousand houses, averaging fifty-five persons to each house. It will be seen, then, that the houses must necessarily be large. The major part of the buildings are five stories in hight, and nearly all of the freestone mentioned, while a few are of brick with stone trimmings, and some again of rough stone and plastered over.

From the Monument of Victory I made my way to the National Panorama, in which a triumphal battle over the French at Saint Privat is vividly portrayed. The building is octagon in form, with walls some twenty-five feet high. The inside is a circle, smoothly plastered, and all around is painted the terrible facts of a bloody battle. It is in the vicinity of a village, and the brick houses have holes blown through them with conical shells, out of which orifices thus made the inmates are firing upon the aggressors without. Of course the French are getting the worst of it; the Germans are crowding them at every point; men are falling here and there; hand-to-hand conflicts are taking place; dead Frenchmen and dead Germans are lying in plentiful numbers, with others not dead, but badly wounded and writhing in agony. Dead and wounded horses and cattle are also in abundance, and blood and carnage depicted on all sides. The center, where the beholders stand, is a raised mound, and close without the railing are fragments of burnt buildings, soldiers' clothing, camp utensils, the remains of soldiers' meals, and much that is real, including parts of gardens, door-yards, shrubbery, vegetables, etc. These run down to where the painting begins, but the connection is so perfect that it is almost impossible for the beholder to tell where the real stops and the painting begins. The entire scene looks like a continuation of two or three miles in all directions of the raised position where the viewer stands. The effect is excellent, but it is hard to appreciate such scenes of blood and slaughter; they are justly abhorrent to the finer feelings of mankind.

From this point I called upon my friend, Dr. Edward Schläger, whom I met at the Congress in Brussels last year, and again at London this year. At the latter place we extended the acquaintance so fortunately begun a year ago. He lives in very fine style on Bellevue street, and a few hours passed away very pleasantly in conversation about the recent Congress, affairs in the United States, in Berlin, etc. Dr. Schläger resided for some twenty-five years in America, first editing the New England Zeitung in Boston, and later being connected with the Staats Zeitung of Chicago, consequently he speaks English well, and is well acquainted with American affairs. Between matters connected with the two countries there was ample field for conversation. After partaking of some refreshments, both fluid and solid, we walked out, first into the Deer Garden before mentioned, and visited the fine marble statues of the immortal Goethe, the mother of the present emperor, and others. The two named are of unusual artistic quality, and do much credit to the people of Berlin, who erected them. Around the pedestal of Goethe's colossal figure are four of his impersonations, or the characters which his genius created. The earth has produced few greater minds than the German philosopher and poet, Goethe. He will continue to be appreciated more and more as the centuries pass away.

With respect to the extensive natural grounds called the Deer Garden, I will further remark that the roads and walks are laid off through them, running in all directions, diverging from common centers like the spokes of a wheel, and at the junctions, as well as at the centers, are erected statues of those whom the people of Berlin delight to honor, and they are generally military characters—butchers, who have been successful in slaughtering their fellow-beings. Some of the roads which traverse the beautiful woods of the Deer Garden are for carriages, some for equestrians only, and others for pedestrians alone. Along the borders of many of them trees have been planted in straight rows, and their smooth, erect forms add much to the beauty of the grounds. Thousands of people resort here when the weather is suitable, and a better retreat for children, invalids, and all who need pure air, with such measure of the sun's rays as desired, can scarcely be imagined. The grass among the trees is lovely, and the whole seems more natural than any artificial park can be. The grounds virtually belong to the Emperor William, but he gives them up for the use of the people, though he retains the ownership of them, and will not relinquish a foot nor a tree for any private use.

We next walked around some in the city; and after the doctor returned to his home I visited the Aquarium, where is a full collection of all the rarer inhabitants of the briny deep, from corals, sponges, and anemones, crabs, lobsters, octopuses, turtles, fishes of nearly all kinds, to alligators and crocodiles. In the same establishment were also many birds and numerous members of the monkey, chimpanzee, and ape tribes. Nature, in her multiforms, is here well represented.

The next thing on the programme was to take the tramway and ride around the circuit of the city and see all the newer parts of it. The city is twelve miles in circuit, but the tramway does not go to the extreme limits, often being half a mile or more from the outer borders. It took an hour and a half to swing the circle, and the ride gives one a splendid opportunity to see the parts of the city built within the last few years, which must be pronounced very fine. The buildings are of excellent quality and stately in proportions. On one side one sees many public buildings of large size and costly structure, many monuments commemorating the emperors, dukes, and generals who have flourished in the times that have gone by. Many buildings are now being constructed, which bespeaks a period of prosperity, notwithstanding the heavy burthen borne by the nation in consequence of the wars she has prosecuted.

Some twenty-five or thirty thousand soldiers are stationed at the German Capital. Imperialism seems to float in the air, and the heavy hand of Bismarck is felt by every person in the empire. There can be but little freedom where so strong a government exists, and where the very sweat and blood of the people are required to perpetuate it. The barracks for the soldiers are strong and imposing buildings of great size. Bismarck has succeeded in becoming one of the chief ruling spirits of the world in making united Germany powerful and greatly to be dreaded, but he has not made the people free and happy. They groan under a load of debt and taxation which they will long, long be unable to throw off. It is to be hoped, however, that Germany will some day have a prouder mission than to uphold an iron government little better than a despotism.

The ride around the city being over, and the shades of evening having come on, the Central Hotel was repaired to and supper dispatched, when I essayed to visit the opera and listen to German music, vocal and instrumental. But I had hardly calculated on the difficulties I had undertaken. I had not learned where the opera was, but supposed I could easily learn; but the learning was not extremely easy. I was not fortunate enough to meet any one who could speak or understand English, while I as persistently would not and could not speak or understand Deutsch. I said to a good-looking man, "Will you please tell me where the Opera House is?" He looked as vacant and blank as though he had just landed from the moon. I repeated the word, "Opera, opera," both slow and fast, but as plainly as I could speak it. It then occurred to me that I should make the o long, as in rope, and then I repeated, "Opera, opera," with the o as long as I could make it, but it was all of no use; there was so much of the English taint to my pronunciation of the word that the bewildered Dutchman could not comprehend what was the matter with me. I left him in despair and tried with several others, speaking the word "Opera" in all the ways I could think of, and I added the word music also, but my gibberish was unintelligible. At length I think I met one man more intelligible than the others, who partially comprehended my meaning, and had a glimmering of my desire. He pointed down the Unter den Linden and muttered something to me, of which I could not comprehend a word. As the operas and theaters here begin at seven o'clock, I knew I was late and hastened on. With my usual good luck I came to a building, stately in exterior, which I inherently felt was the Opera House. I put the question to a man at the door, "Is this the Opera House?" And he said, "Yah." I rushed in and planked down a two-mark piece of silver, and told the man in a little office, and in as good English as I could command, "I want to buy that much of what you have to sell here." He took my money and gave me a small piece of pasteboard with Dutch words on it. Some three other men at the same time obtained pieces of board somewhat like mine, and they at once entered a passage-way and led off, and thinking it would be better for me to go with them than to inquire of those who could not understand me, I followed them, as a matter of course, up, up one flight of stone stairs after another until I thought they must be going onto the house-top; but still I followed. At length we reached the gallery, which seemed to be crammed with music-loving Deutschlanders; but the man at the entrance, glancing at my pasteboard, cried out, "Parterre," and pointed down-stairs. With a shrewdness not usual to me I comprehended in a trice that I was in the wrong pew, and that I must retrace my steps down all those stone staircases and betake myself to the parterre, where my bit of pasteboard designated me. There was no time to lose, for the play had already begun, and upon reaching the ground floor I prudently showed my pasteboard to a party in attendance, as much as to say, "Please tell me where is the parterre." With my usual good luck the German comprehended me and I comprehended him; he pointed at a door; I entered and was in the parterre, but with my usual bad luck I found no empty seat awaiting me. Every seat was filled, and many who arrived there before me were standing. I saw no help for me but just to "stand and take it" the best way I could. The opera was going on, and my attention of course was occupied with it. A very sad young man whom I took for an artist—a painter—seemed to be in love with a very pretty young girl who had a cross papa. The sad young man sang in a tenor voice with all his might and threw his arms around in a most wo-begone manner. He sang to the damsel most beautifully, and she sang back at him just as beautifully in the fullest soprano, and I thought more beautifully, and then they approached each other and joined hands and both sang just as hard as they could. Then they put their arms around each other and I thought I knew what that meant, if it was Dutch. Upon this the cross old parient came and drove the sweet damsel off the stage and in very grum, harsh bass sung to the poor, unhappy-looking young man, just as much as to say: "You worthless scapegrace! You leave this place without delay, and if I catch you hanging around here any more, or if you ever speak to my daughter again, I will cut your feet off close below your ears." The poor, unhappy young man seemed to be in despair, and hung his head and sung in a mournful minor key, as much as to say, "I would as soon live as die, this very minute." He threw his arms around again in the most unhappy manner, and finally went off, and others came on, singing and talking, and acting, but all in Dutch of course. I could not get head or tail to a good deal of it, wondered what could be the matter that they should make so much fuss about it. But I think the fortunes of the unhappy young man improved; he must have "struck oil" in some way, for he seemed to get in better spirits; he sung more cheerfully, and everybody seemed to think well of him, even the cross old man, the father of the young damsel; and he allowed the young man to see his daughter again, and it is my opinion that he finally became father-in-law to the despised artist, for they all seemed in good humor, as it a wedding was about to take place, and the way they sung was a caution to Ira D. Sankey.

It was perhaps just as well that I had not a seat, for sleeping none the night before, and being weary withal, I fear I should have gone to sleep, and did not lack much of it as it was. I must bear testimony that the singing was the best Dutch music I ever heard; but I was not sorry when it was over; and while I was on my way to the hotel, seeking my virtuous couch, I was met by two fair damsels, but, I fear, frail, who clearly had some evil designs upon me; they spoke to me in a language which I could not understand, except as I guessed at it; but they were too familiar on short acquaintance, and invited me to go mit them down some "strasse," the name of which I do not remember. I said, firmly, "Nicht fer stey" When they talked about "gelt" I said, "Nein, nein," and think I would have made it a dozen had they insisted. I think they concluded I was an unprofitable customer, for they turned from me and allowed me to pursue my way to my hotel in peace. I have these many long years proved that "virtue is its own reward."

The next morning I fulfilled an engagement made the day before—to call upon Dr. Schläger and accompany him out to a village in the suburbs and visit a German author, thinker, and philosopher, Mr. Bruno Bauer. The doctor had talked with me in London about Mr. Bauer, and of a work he had written upon the origin of Christianity. I had become interested in the work, and wished to see the author. The doctor said Mr. Bauer is one of the trinity—Hegel, Fuerbach, and Bauer—and inasmuch as the three graces are faith, hope, and charity, the greatest of which is charity, so with the great German trinity of deep thinkers—Hegel, Fuerbach, and Bauer, the greatest of which is Bauer. We had but a few miles' ride to the unpretending village of Brixdorf, which has a somewhat elevated position on the vast sunny plain of that locality, surrounded by cultivated fields and a few vineyards. I noticed several wind-mills at work grinding grain, as many as four turning their huge wings within sight at once. We found the old sage in his study with his books and papers before him. He has a first-class mental organization, and one has but to look at him to become convinced that he is a man who has done deep and continued thinking. He is now seventy years of age, and is the author of several works. The one I have alluded to is "Cæsarism and Christianity," in which he clearly shows that Christianity is of Grecian and Roman origin, and not of Hebrew. He shows, too, that in the moral writings of Seneca is found the basis of the four New Testament gospels, and that the original moral teachings attributed to Jesus are in the writings of this same Seneca. He has the works of Seneca—father and son—published in Latin, in three volumes, containing, in the aggregate, nearly two thousand pages. I could form but little idea myself how strong a case Mr. Bauer has made out as to the Roman origin of Christianity, and smiled inwardly that another origin has been found for it. Many of us have been wont to find the origin of it in the early religions of the East—the teachings and story of Christna, of Buddha, of Rama, and others. The origin has been pretty clearly traced, too, to Egpptian sources, while others again find the Hebrew as the fruitful source; but here now is a Roman origin more positive than all the others put together. It reminds me of the cause of the death of the venerable old darkey who was many years ago found dead floating in Boston harbor. As it was a negro's body, it was conceded that a negro jury should examine into the cause of the death. Accordingly, six citizens of African descent were constituted, and a sage one of the number was appointed foreman of the jury. After sitting over the corpse a due length of time the aged foreman broke the silence with these words: "Gemmen, I s'pose you all agree dat dis man ben murdered. Fus, he hab his brains smashed out and was trone overboard and drownded; the tide coming in, he floated over on de Charlestown side, and, de wedder being cold, he froze to deth." Christianity appears to me like the negro corpse—it has about as many origins as that had reasons to be dead. But I am well satisfied that Mr. Bauer is a deep scholar and thinker; and from the testimony of Dr. Schläger, conclude that the work is unanswerable. Some Christian critics attempted to reply to it, but Mr. Bauer easily refuted them.

I have made arrangements with Dr. Schläger to translate the work into English, and I will publish it and lay it before my readers and allow them to judge of its merits. The work has attracted much attention in Germany, and I trust it may do no less in America. The work, with the addition of Mr. Bauer's reply and a concluding chapter which he will write for this translated edition, will make, I think, about 600 pages, and will be furnished for $1.50, and probably will be issued before I get back home again. I hope it will suit many of you, my readers, to secure a copy. It contains extended quotations from the writings of Seneca, giving the reader the opportunity to judge whether his morals and those attributed to Jesus bear any analogy to each other.

Mr Bauer has also written a work on the history of Quakerism in Germany, England, and America. Also another in two volumes, on Bismarck and Imperialism. Dr. Schälger will give the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER a sketch of Mr. Bauer's life, together with some extracts from his works, allowing them the opportunity to judge the quality of the author's style.

Mr. Bauer spent some time in London several years ago, and speaks English tolerably well. The interview with him was a pleasant one, and after emptying a bottle of wine between us, and partaking of some cakes to match, he walked over with us for some distance on our return to the city. He calls himself "the Hermit of Rixdorf," but his fame has spread over Germany, and I feel disposed to help extend it even to the New World. He has given something new to his race, and with your assistance I will give you the benefit of it.

It was a pleasant trip out to Rixdorf, and I felt that I had held communion with one of the great thinkers of our time. On our return we visited some of the pleasant places of the city; among the first was the Place Belle Alliance, a large square, or more properly a circle, with a beautiful monument in the center commemorative of the valor and patriotism of the German people, around which are walks, carriage ways, and numerous statues, the whole embellished with beautiful shrubbery and flowers, giving a very pleasing effect, and is a place of great resort for the proud Berliners.

The doctor accompanied me and pointed out many of the stately public buildings, palaces, etc., where the business of the state is transacted, where the emperors have lived, and public affairs are attended to. When he returned to his home I took a long stroll through the central or old part of the city, seeking out the dwellings of the poorer classes, looking at the shops, etc. I found everything tolerably cleanly, and saw no signs of wretched poverty. Some of the old streets are narrow, it is true, but many are wide and commodious.

I have not mentioned that Berlin is on the river Spree, but such is the fact; but it is not a mighty river, and does not have the appearance that the sprees it gets on to are of a very wild character. I think it is about two hundred feet in width. The city is also supplied with with canals, in which I saw numerous boats laden with produce and merchandise of various kinds. The prows of the boats are peculiar, running out long to a sharp point in the shape of a gondola, and both ends are alike. The capital of Prussia and of the German empire is one hundred and twenty-seven feet above the level of the sea, and is in latitute 52° 31'. Its mean temperature is 28° in January, and 66° in July. It has 500 good wide streets and 37 short bridges, 58 squares, 60 churches, 25 theaters, over a hundred learned societies and associations, and more than a hundred public schools. Its principal manufactures are locomotives, cotton, silk, ribbons, porcelain, stone-ware, bronze, gold and silver ware and ornaments, type, iron, jewelry, straw hats, artificial flowers, etc. Its numerous and showy squares are well supplied with statues of bronze and stone, and on many of the public buildings statues of heroes, princes, gods, and goddesses are to be seen in generous profusion. The east end of Unter den Linden is a fine bronze equestrian statue of Frederick the Great, and other imposing bronze statues are in other localities. Berlin was founded in the twelfth century, and for over six centuries has been a place of much importance. At the present time it is one of the mistresses of the world. An elevated railway is being constructed in the city, but on a plan entirely different from that used in New York. It is built on a series of viaducts which span the streets in arches of stone and brick-work like a huge bridge, and will be far less noisy and dangerous than our system. It undoubtedly costs ten times as much to construct, but is unquestionably very much better when done and will be immensely more permanent.

I was pretty well fatigued when I reached my hotel, and enjoyed my supper with much relish. By a failure to connect with the doctor, who was to accompany me to one of the musical entertainments of the city, I missed going to a place of amusement for this Saturday evening and indulged in an hour's walk about the streets, noticing the stores, the show in the windows, the habits of the people, etc.

On Sunday morning, after an hour or two spent in writing, I took the tramway some two miles southwest or the city, through a portion of the deer garden, to the zoological gardens, where, in extensive grounds for the purpose, are a very fine collection of animals, including elephants, rhinoceroses (one of them with two huge horns on his nose), camels, buffalo, bisons, Asiatic cattle, lions, tigers, leopards, bears, wolves, hyenas, deer, antelopes, goats, monkeys, ostriches, vultures, condors, eagles, cranes, storks, flamingoes, pelicans, magpies, parrots, pheasants, fowls, and hundreds of smaller varieties of birds, many very rare, with all that goes to make up a splendid zoological collection. Some of the houses for the larger animals are large and expensive. The elephant house is especially so. It contains over two hundred thousand pieces of colored tile, and presents an attractive appearance. It is ornamented in front and on the sides over the entrances with representations of huge elephant heads. The area of the gardens must embrace over fifty acres of ground, and are well laid off. Tho concert place for music, with a thousand chairs for listeners, where beer is served, of course is not wanting. Thousands flock here in warm weather and manage to find much amusement and recreation. The Germans are a very practical people, and their plans seem governed with a view of utility and rational enjoyment.

Dr. Schläger informs me that but one per cent of the people of Berlin attend church, though there are plenty of churches, and more than half the people are Protestants. This is an extremely small portion to attend upon "divine worship," and is sufficient to arouse the zeal of Christians even in America. Of what use is it to send missionaries to the Fiji Islands, to Timbuctoo, and to the interior of Thibet, when ninety-nine per cent of the intelligent people of Berlin refuse to avail themselves of the privilege of going to church and falling asleep over a dull, prosy sermon?

I recommend the pious people of America to look after the indifferent souls of Berlin and to take such measures as will induce them to more frequently attend the ministration of those who are commissioned by heaven to dispense the bread of life for money and for price. The museum, the galleries of art, etc., are all open on Sundays the same as other days, and it is quite likely that the people find them and the attractions in the out-door places of resort greater than those of the churches, and they doubtless betake themselves where they enjoy themselves the best. This is certainly a sensible way of doing; people should always be allowed to exercise their choice as to where they should spend their leisure time. With all this want of religious zeal on the part of Berliners to attend church, it cannot be charged against them that they are more immoral than the people of other cities; that more intemperance exists among them, or that they are less honest, less industrious, and less observant of the rights of their fellow-beings than are the denizens of other towns. There are doubtless more unbelievers, more Freethinkers, here than in many other parts of the world, but this does not result in a decrease of morality. I have not seen an intoxicated person in Berlin, nor one who appeared to have drank enough to produce a visible effect. The citizens of the place appear to have useful employment to pursue, and no appearance of idleness and vagabondism is to be seen. Take the matter in all its aspects, there is nothing to be seen to show that the people of Berlin are not as moral, as prosperous, and as happy as though the ninety-nine per cent who do not attend church conformed to the example of the one per cent and listened to the talk of the clergy and yielded observance to the rites of ecclesiasticism. There is also no visible sign that deity is any more displeased with the ninety-nine per cent than with the meager one per cent who keep up a show of being pious.

After seeing all that was desirable of animated nature I returned to the city and visited the Museum of Art, which contains an extensive collection of paintings and statuary. On the walls of the front portico or porch are extensive frescoes one hundred feet in length by twenty in hight, on which are a great number of figures of gods, goddesses, Titans, etc., as given in classic story. Hercules and his twelve labors are given in large size. Several statues also adorn the outer porch, and at the entrance, at the huge steps which lead up to the edifice, are two colossal bronze equestrian statues, the one a tiger attacking a horse, and an Amazonian female rider is about dispatching the tiger with a spear. The mate to this is a male rider killing a wild beast with a spear. The statues in the museum are large plaster copies of Grecian, Roman, Egyptian, Assyrian and other gods, with heroes, warriors, statesmen, graces, nymphs, and all that belongs to classic statuary, including bas-reliefs of battle scenes copied from the ruins of ancient Greece, Egypt, and Assyria, etc. There are some thousands of pieces altogether. A few are monstrous in size. Among the antiquities are the sarcophaguses and mummies of Egypt, with records on papyrus, obelisks in miniature, representations of the Rosetta stone, and other inscriptions. There are also numerous articles of antique German manufacture, including watches, carved wood-work, ornaments, etc. The galleries of paintings by the old masters are splendid. Here are many fine works by Rubens, Van Dyke, and others equally distinguished. A feature of Berlin art is faithfulness to nature. This is noticeable not only with the paintings but the statuary in the museum, on the streets, and in the public squares—quite enough to make Comstock very unhappy, not because he looked upon them, but that others could do so. He likes to appreciate all pictures that show a certain phase of nature and to keep them for his own use and those special clerical friends who call on him to look through his museum. The choicer specimens are also very convenient to take to religious meetings, legislatures, and Congress to induce pure-minded members to pass laws to help him imprison a few more unfortunates. In addition to pictures he has also shown a great fondness for living specimens of loveliness unadorned.

There are other galleries and places of art and industry in Berlin, but I did not visit them; neither did I call on William I. or Bismark at their places. I would rather visit one such man as Bruno Bauer than both of them. I honor the man who strives to educate and elevate his fellows far more highly than the man who endeavors with all his ability to fasten on them the chains of slavery and the fetters of servitude. I would have been glad to visit Potsdam, some sixteen miles from Berlin, a place of 45,000 inhabitants, where Voltaire resided with Frederick the Great, but I could not take the time.

From the Museum I returned to my hotel and devoted a short space of time to writing. Soon Dr. Schläger called upon me, knowing I proposed to leave for Dresden late in the afternoon. We spent an hour in conversation, when supper and settling my bill had to be attended to. The doctor then rode with me to the station, but the preparation of the beefsteak had taken so long, and the distance to the station so great, we were two minutes too late for the 5:30 train, and I had to wait an hour for another train. In this there was one gain and one loss—the gain, I had another hour for conversation with the doctor; the loss, I missed a fast train and caught a slow one, which was an hour or two longer in making the run, bringing me to the capital of Saxony a little after 11 o'clock—a distance of 109 miles.

The country south of Berlin seems a continuation of the great sandy plain which once formed the bed of the ocean. I could see by the moonlight but few evidences of a rich farming country—but few farmhouses and barns; but few herds feeding in the fields, but stacks of grain or fields of crops yet to harvest. We came every four or five miles to a station, and generally they stood alone, with occasionally a small village adjoining. The stations here are most unlike what they are in England, where they are double, and standing close to the track, one side for passengers going one way, and the opposite side for the passengers the other way, no crossing over from side to side being allowed, save by bridgeway or subterraneous passage. Here the station stands back a few rods from the railway, with no platform, and looking like a private residence, or possibly like a country inn. The country south of Berlin seems much like a prairie country imperfectly settled.

At Dresden I put up at the Grand Union (accent on the second syllable, and pronounced as though spelt un-yone), and I found it an excellent hotel. Dresden contains nearly two hundred thousand inhabitants, and is finely situated on the river Elbe, the larger portion of the city being on the left, or south bank, and the two parts being connected by three fine bridges over fifteen hundred feet in length. The city is often called the German Florence, and is much resorted to by English and American people, who wish to pursue the study of art and music, as well as to find a delightful place of abode. Dresden is justly noted for its picture gallery, containing a greater number of the productions of celebrated painters than many cities having a larger population.

After dispatching a very good breakfast on Monday morning I started down the street to see the town. I found the city well built, and the stores well filled with attractive merchandise, with the show-windows very neatly arranged. The stores in the German cities are not so profusely covered with signs as in London and in American cities. It seems to be deemed enough here to have the name of the occupant and the business once plainly given. I met the sign here, as in Paris and Berlin, "Damen Confection," and they are always neat-looking establishments. They have no connection with damning peppermints and sugar-plums, as one might be led to suppose, but it means that within are made robes and dresses for dames or ladies. Confection, I think, is the French for robes and dresses, and damen, in German, is the plural for dame.

When I came to the market square I walked through it to see the vegetables, fruits, etc., for sale there. As usual in this country, the market place is simply an open, paved square, without roof or tables, save such as the marketers provide themselves with. The business of selling and buying is attended to almost exclusively by women, and there are old men having something to sell. The display of cabbages, cauliflowers, sprouts, kohl-rabbi, onions, garlics, celery, parsley, with apples, pears, peaches, grapes, etc., was very good. Eggs, butter, and cheese were for sale. But oh, rotten eggs and polecats, how loudly that cheese smelt to heaven! I wondered if any of the gods or goddesses could be pleased with that odor. I certainly was not, and did not even ask for a taste.

The picture galleries were the principal point of attraction, and there I bent my steps. The building, containing three galleries and the statuary, is a splendid stone edifice some three or four hundred feet long, with extensive grounds in front and a beautiful court in the rear, with other stately buildings on either side containing other collections of antiquities and works of art. The picture galleries of Dresden have not been over-estimated; they struck me as being quite equal to anything I have ever seen anywhere. The paintings at the Louvre and at Versailles are more numerous, but they are not finer. The museum building contains thirteen halls, or galleries, in which are displayed nearly three thousand magnificent paintings, upon which any lover of art must delight to gaze and to study by the hour. Here are Raphael's "Madonna di San Sisto," Titian's "Tribute Money," Correggi's "Notte" (adoration of the Shepherds), Veronese's "Moses in the Bulrushes," Rembrandt's "Ganymede," and fifty pieces by Canaletti, and others by distinguished artists, early and modern. Not an undue proportion are religious subjects, and the wretched-looking saints do not predominate in excess. There are many rich bathing scenes, hunting scenes, Venuses, etc., which would require days of study to appreciate all their beauties.

The department for engravings contains 350,000, old and new. It could hardly be expected that I could make a very thorough examination of all these at one short visit. The department for statuary is fine, and seems much like a duplicate of what I saw the day before at Berlin. The library contains 500,000 volumes, 4,000 manuscripts, and 30,000 maps, which I did not stop to examine. Neither did I visit the Schloss, or king's palace, where are displayed the crown jewels and much ancient armor. I was willing to leave those for others.

At 1 P. M. I was in the train for Prague, the capital of Bohemia, lying south a hundred miles or more. Much of the country along the way is picturesque and beautiful. Along the valley of the Elbe are many attractive villages and homes. First we passed beautiful cultivated plains and saw the farmers engaged in securing the crops of potatoes, beets, cabbages, etc. The field hands are largely momen. When every young man has to give three pears as a soldier it devolves upon the women to cultivate the farms. I saw women digging potatoes and beets, raking hay—it seems to be not too late to make hay—loading hay, and nearly all sorts of work. Woman is here not only a laborer but a packhorse as well. I often see them with large baskets strapped to their shoulders, loaded down with truck like cabbage, etc., enough to load a horse. After passing through a section of pretty plains we enter a defile or narrow valley or ravine with high walls of rocks on either side. Here are worked numerous quarries of building-stones, which are hewn into shape on the spot and slid down the steep chutes for loading on cars or in canal boats. I presume the same are taken to Dresden and perhaps to Berlin. The country along is quite diversified between hill and plain, wide valleys and narrow ones. We passed a goodly number of villages with hard, unpronouncable names which I had never heard before.

"VOLTAIRE IN EXILE."—Whatever relates to the famous Voltaire is read with interest by Liberals, and this book will be, as it describes his life and work in France, England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, and Switzerland, with unpublished letters of Voltaire, what his enemies say of him, his philosophical system, his merits as a poet and tragic author, etc., the whole forming a very interesting volume. Published and for sale by D. M. Bennett. Price, 75 cents in paper, and $1 in cloth.—Investigator.

"WHAT OBJECTIONS TO CHRISTIANITY?" This is a large book of 969 pages, being a debate between D. M. Bennett, a Liberal, and G. M. Mair, a Christian. Mr. Mair appears to hav invited or challenged Mr. Bennett to a debate, and the latter accepting, the usual arguments were gone over on both sides. The debate is an able one, and conducted throughout in a pleasant and friendly manner, each of the disputants doing his best for his cause, and each no doubt in pursuit of truth. Price, $1.50; Published by D. M. Bennett.—Investigator.

AN EXTENSIV EXAMINATION OF LORD BOLINGBROKE'S DOCTRINS.

CHAPTER XII.

CONCERNING THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE CHRISTIAN SECT, AND MORE PARTICULARLY CONCERNING PAUL.

When the first Galileans traveled among the Greeks and Romans they found them permeated with all the absurd traditions which could possibly enter in the heads of an ignorant people who were inclined to fables; their gods were disguised under the form of bulls, horses, swans, and serpents, in order to seduce wives and maidens. The magistrates and principal citizens did not acknowledge or believe such extravagant tales, but the masses lived upon them. It was the Jewish rabble that spoke to the pagan rabble. It would be in the present day as if the disciples of Fox disputed with the disciples of Brown. It was not difficult for the Jews possessed of devils to make the fools believing the pagan dreams accept their dreams, none the less improbable. Attracted by the novelty surrounding such spirited fables as those of the Jews, and, wearied by their worn-out absurdities, the Greeks and Romans ran after the new error, just as the people at the fair of Bartholomew,* disgusted with the old farces which they hav too often heard, demand a new one.

If we may believe the books written by the adherents of Christ, Peter, the son of Jonas, remained at Joppa with Simon the currier, where he revived Dorcas the tailor in a garret.

See that chapter of Lucian entitled Philopratris in which he speaks of the "Galilean † with a bald front, and enlarged nose, who was lifted to the third heaven." See how he treated an assembly of Christians with whom he happened to be. The Presbyterians of Scotland and the beggars of Saint-Medard in Paris are precisely the same.

The ragged beggars, almost naked, to all appearances intractable, acting as if possessed by devils, heaving great sighs, contorting themselvs, swearing by the son who has descended from the father, predicting a thousand evils to the empire, and cursing the emperor. Such were the first Christians.

He who made the sect most fashionable was Paul, with a large nose and bald front, whom Lucian ridiculed. It is sufficient to look over the writings of Paul to see that Lucian had good reason for his wit. What stuff it was that Paul wrote to the society of Christians in Rome! "Circumcision is profitable if you observe the law; but if you break the law thy circumcision is made uncircumcision, etc. . . . Do we not then make void the law through faith? God forbid! Yea, we establish the law. . . . For if Abraham were justified by works, he hath whereof he may glory, but not before God" (Romans, chapters ii, iii, and iv). Paul, in so expressing himself, speaks as a Jew, and not as a Christian; but he speaks more like one possessed by a senseless devil, who could not put two consecutiv ideas together.

What a discourse to the Corinthians! "All our fathers were baptized unto Moses in the cloud and sea" (1 Cor. x, 2). Cardinal Bembo had good reason for calling these epistles epistolaccie, and to consider them not worth reading.

What must we think of a man who says to the Thessalonians, "I will not permit women to speak in church," and in the same letter announces that they might preach and pray when veiled?

Does his quarrel with the other apostles mark a wise and forbearing man? Is he not a man of his party from all that is discovered? He pretends to be a Christian, and teaches Christianity, but he sacrifices seven consecutiv days in the temple of Jerusalem, according to the orders of Jacob, which is not exactly after the manner of Christians. He wrote to the Galatians: "Behold, I, Paul, say unto you, that if ye be circumcised Christ shall profit you nothing" (Gal. v, 2). After this he circumcised his disciple Timotheus, whom the Jews said was the son of a Greek by a prostitute. He intruded himself among the apostles, and then boasts to the Corinthians in his first epistle, chapter ix, that he was an apostle as well as the others. "Am I not an apostle? Am I not free? Hav I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord? Are not ye my work in the Lord? If I be not an apostle unto others, yet doubtless I am to you. Hav we not power to eat and drink at your expense? Hav we not power to lead about a sister, a wife, as well as other apostles and as the brethren of the Lord, who goeth to the warfare any time at his own charges?" etc. What astonishing things are contained in this passage! The right to liv at the expense of those whom he had subjugated, the right to make them pay the expenses of his wife or his sister, on account of the fact that Jesus had brothers, and Mary, or Mirja, had labored more than one time.

I would like to know of whom Paul speaks in his second letter to the Corinthians, chapter xi, 13: "For such are false apostles. . . . Whereinsoever any one is bold I am bold also. Are they Hebrews? I am also a Hebrew. Are they Israelites? So am I. Are they ministers of Christ? When they accuse me of foolishness I am more than they, in labors more abundant, in prisons more frequent. I hav received thirty-nine stripes; I was beaten with rods three times; once was I stoned; I hav been a day and night in the sea."

Here Paul says that he has been twenty-four hours in the deep without being drowned. This equals the adventure of Jonah. But still it is not clear why he manifested such mean jealousy against Peter and the other apostles, or why he was angry with them because he suffered in the hands of justice and was beaten more than they.

For what fools and degraded people did he picture his tyrannical master? We laugh at Mohammed when his commentators pretend that he visited seven heavens in one night. But Mohammed speaks less of such follies in the Koran than are attributed to Paul, yet Paul ventures to say that he accomplished almost the half of that journey.

Who was that man Paul, who still excites so much attention and is cited every day, much to the injury of every one? He says that he was a Roman citizen. I venture to say that he impudently lied. No Jew was a Roman citizen except under Decius and Phillip. If he came from Tarsus he was no Roman, for Tarsus was not a colony or city of Rome for more than a hundred years after Paul. If he was from Giscala, as Jerome says, the case is not altered, for that village was in Galilee, and surely the Galileans never had the honor or being Roman citizens.

He was a student at the feet of Gamaliel, it is said; some say that he was a domestic servant of Gamaliel. In fact, it is said that he watched the clothes of those who stoned Etienne and that he was employed as a valet of an executioner. The Jews pretended that he wished to marry the daughter of Gamaliel. We can see some traces of that adventure in an ancient book which is supposed to be the history of Thecla. It is not at all astonishing that the daughter of Gamaliel did not wish to marry a little bald-headed valet whose brow hung down upon his deformed nose and who had bow-legs. It was thus that the Acts of Thecla pictured him. Cast off by Gamaliel and his daughter as he deserved to be, he joined the sect controled by Cephas, James, Matthew, and Barnabas, in order to stir up trouble among the Jews. Judging from the little we do know about him, the cause of the apostasy of this unfortunate Jew is better than the cause generally thought. How could a person persuade himself that a star from the heavens fell down upon a horse in mid-day and that a heavenly voice like that of a god said, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" Such foolishness surprises me.

If God had wished to prevent the disciples of Jesus from being persecuted, could he not hav spoken to the princes of the nations rather than to a valet of Gamaliel? Were they any the less chastised since Saul fell from his horse? Did not Saint Paul chastise them himself? What is the purpose, then, of that miracle?* I call upon heaven and earth to testify (if it is permitted me to use these words) that never was a legend more foolish, more fanatical, more disgusting, and more worthy of horror and contempt, than this one.†

*Bartholomew fair is where charlatans and astrologers still meet.

†It is very doubtful whether Lucian could hav seen Paul and be at the same time the author of "Philopratris." But it might perhaps be said that Paul, who lived in the time of Nero, could still exist up to the time of Trajan, when, it is said, Lucian commenced to write.

Some people ask how Paul could succeed in forming a sect by means of his balderdash, for which the Cardinal Bembo had a profound contempt. We answer that without that balderdash he would never hav mastered the devils which he governed. Can any one believe that Fox, who founded a primitiv sect called the Quakers, had more sense than Paul? It has been a long time since any one has said that fools founded the sects, and that wise people governed them. [1771.]

* Lord Bolingbroke says in vol. iii, p. 301, that "God might hav prevented man's fall by a little less indulgence in what is called free will," and thereby saved his son from cruel persecution.

† It is necessary, for me to particularly remark that this Jew Paul never said that Jesus was God. He bestows upon him all possible honors but that of God. He had predicted in his epistle to to the Romans (chap. i) that he would make his peace with God, through Jesus. He counts upon the grace of God, through one man—Jesus. He called his disciples inheritors of God and co-inheritors of Jesus (1 Rom. chap. i). There is not a single verse or line in all the writings of Paul where the word God is bestowed upon Jesus, unless it is in 1 Rom., chap. ix. But Erasmus and Grotius hav proved that this passage was falsified and evilly interpreted. In fact, it would be strange, if Paul recognized Jesus as God, that he only gave him that name and title once. At that time that would hav been blasphemy.

And as for the word trinity, it is not found in Paul. But apart from these discrepancies Paul is considered the founder of Christianity. [1771.]

Lord Bolingbroke called St. Paul "a true cabalistic architect, a loose paraphraser and commentator, as false at least as any ancient or modern rabbi" (vol. iii, p. 288, of his collected works.)

Then and Now.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: There is a certain amount and kind of pleasure in taking a retrospectiv glance at the past and comparing the conditions of the then with the actual ones of the now. I see very clearly how matters stood forty-three or forty-four years ago. Abolitionism and Infidelity, in the eyes of the masses, were not only twin-sisters, but twin-monsters. "Tom Paine" was the "scapegoat" for all that was low, vulgar, brutal, and irreverent in the estimation of the ignorant and bigoted for what he had written, while Garrison was the synonym for anarchy and fanaticism for what he weekly wrote and printed in the Boston Liberator. Those were the days when church and state were solidly united in the interests of chattel slavery and the preservation of Christian morals, Christian liberty, and Christian aristocracy of color, race, and sex. Kneeland was imprisoned, Garrison and others were mobbed, Pennsylvania Hall was burned, Lovejoy was shot and his press consigned to the Mississippi, and people and priests were happy.

What of the radical element then? Simply this: they had put their hands to the plough of practical reform and they cut their furrows deep into the sins and shams of their age. They were conscious that in the long run better ideas of right and truth would prevail, and that all and every influence of the political and church alliance would hav to yield. How well I remember the social ostracism that confronted us everywhere; the threats that were made to do us bodily injury; the offer of $50 and a barrel of whisky by a banker's son to any person or persons that would shoot my brother or myself or both! Did these things deter us? Not the least. We kept up our little society with our Irish Quaker president, and held our regular meetings. Night after night, with lanterns in hand, we went through the woods to some neighboring mining settlement to hold our more important lectures when our missionaries were among us; and very many nights (some very dark and wet) did we go silently through the timber and over the hills to meet a consignment on the "underground railroad." "These were the times that tried men's souls," aye, and women's too. How gloriously the brave women did their part! The wife of our president was a Hicksite Friend, and pardon if I say she was an angel. Her quiet self-devotion and abnegation were at once an inspiration and benediction, and, boy as I then was, her love more than repaid me for the loss of social caste and the constant sources of danger and irritation to all who entertained our opinions and acted as we did.

The "old line" radicals will understand just what it cost in those days to advocate and practice the largest liberty. Political and theological priests were absolute dictators, fashioning the opinions of the people to suit themselvs, and commanding these same people to persecute, maltreat, and misrepresent in all conceivable ways the "come-outers" from their fold and authority.

Then as now the good in heart but timid in mind shrank from the supposed terror of the long and unequal contest. Not so, however, with the grand army of the new dispensation. Through evil as well as through good report they worked on, and while they sowed the seeds of enduring justice and truth, they reaped a continual harvest of satisfaction in perceiving the steady growth of their principles in the gradual education of the people.

'Tis ever thus, and therefore the Liberals of to-day may take courage. The skies of reform are not as dark to-day as they were then. Every step gained makes the ascent more easy. Science is with us, and the best minds in the church trim their sails to catch part of our breeze. A few of the more conceited, and in some measure popular, theologians will array themselvs against us for notoriety's sake. Even these, however, will do us good by their agitation, such as it is. Others will come the "shrug-your-shoulder" dodge, saying little but meaning much. Others will be found that are honest; these will want to hear. This latter class are the waiting and prepared soil for the good seeds of advanced truth and the principles of the Liberal League. Let every honest Liberal be activ in word and deed, and I would say not in word if actions do not assure their honesty. Could we of the now but arm ourselvs with the courage and persistency that characterized the radicals of the unpopular cause then, and utilize all our efforts and devotion to principle through well-perfected organization, our power for good would be immeasurably augmented. Can we not? May not Leagues grow largely in number and usefulness? Is it not possible, friends, to lay aside all the little differences that irritate without doing any good? Do not misunderstand me on this point. I am a Spiritualist, and what I do not want you to lay aside is your right to pitch into my ghostly folly, as some of you deem it. Now, my good friends, giv it "Hail Columbia;" whenever a head of that kind pops up rap it. We do not wish to lessen your pleasure in the least in that respect. What I do want you to lay aside is simply this: all those peppery feelings of prejudice (if you hav them) that might prevent you from uniting with us to establish a purely secular government. Not to destroy or injure the church, not to take away any one's rights, not to interfere with the many forms of religious opinions, but simply to relegate all to their proper place and to establish justice and liberty throughout the land. Are not these things worth working for? And shall we rest quietly while the despotism of creeds and sex holds "high carnival?" GEO. LYNN.

Lockport, Ill., Oct. 16, 1881.

The Prayer Question Settled

If there ever was a determined effort to get God to do a two-minute job, it was in the case of our lamented President Garfield. It was a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together. For eighty days there were both public and private, deep and earnest, prayers ascending to the throne of grace, governors appointed special days for the people to assemble in their churches, to unite in one great, grand effort in trying the get God to do for the President just what a reasonable God ought to hav done without being asked.

Millions of prayers were offered, begging that God would take an interest in the case of our poor sick President and save him. But the petitions of sorrowful men were of no use, and the President was permitted to die, for the want of about two minute's work wouldn't hav cost God one cent. Of course God could hav set the sick man on his feet and made him well in less than two minutes; we know this to be true, for the priests hav told us so, and if he couldn't hav done it, he ain't much of a God nohow.

Governor Jerome of Michigan issued a proclamation requesting the people to assemble in their churches on a certain day and unite in a petition to Almighty God in behalf of the President. And as soon as the President died he issued another proclamation, asking the people to assemble in the same place and "to place themselvs anew under the divine protection, and implore God's continued kindness toward this nation."

I may be mistaken, but it looks as if the governor was a little tough on President Arthur. For we must admit that under similar circumstances the same kind of kindness to Arthur as was shown to Garfield would permit him to die. I don't like that kind of kindness. Of course God saw Guiteau when he leveled the pistol to fire, and if God in his "kindness" had felt like taking an interest in the case, this was the the time and the chance for him to hav lent a helping hand in a good cause. We are told that God sent hornets to drive out the Canaanites. And if in his kindness he had sent about four bushels of hornets after Guiteau and inspired them to attend strictly to business, the chances are that, owning to the great press of business on hand, Guiteau would not hav shot the President. And if I could hav been God for just one minute, just at that time, I would hav taken that particular friend of the Young Men's Christian Association by the hair of his head and yanked him so high that he would not hav lit in a thousand years.

It is possible that after the shooting, and after God had listened to the prayers and heard all there was to be said upon the subject, he refused to answer them for the reason that he was mad, because they had not treated the case according to his directions for such cases made and provided.

He says, "Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing with oil in the name of the Lord. And the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he hav committed sins they shall be forgiven him" (James v, 14, 15). But how was the case managed? Why, instead of sending for the elders they sent for the doctors. Now, this was unjust to the Lord, and, as I understand, not a priest nor a minister, not even one, was permitted to see the sick President. But the great pope of Infidelity, Ingersoll, was admitted, and, as with sympathy he looked at the patient, tears ran down his cheeks. But "Bob" neither prayed nor made use of holy oil. And 'tis said that "Bob" had no faith in ointment. And I don't wonder that it made God feel bad to see his ointment, which had been so long before the people, rejected. Now, if prayer and promises are to be relied upon, it's best to be honest with God and giv him a fair chance to perform the cure in such a manner as to prevent the fussy doctors from stealing the credit which of right should be given to Almighty God.

Then, again, it's possible that God is a Democrat. When Jackson was President a would-be assassin made the attempt to shoot him, but the pistol only snapped; another pistol was substituted, and that also refused to shoot. There were a great many good people who thought that the President for the preservation of his life was indebted to the interposition of a kind providence. But why should God protect a Democrat and then permit two Republican presidents to be shot, unless he is a friend of the Democracy?

And there is yet another view to be taken of the case. President Arthur, in his proclamation of Sept. 22d, says, "In his inscrutable wisdom it has pleased God to remove from us the illustrious head of the nation, James A. Garfield, late President of the United States." And he also said that we should "submit to the will of Almighty God." Then, according to this theory, Guiteau must stand acquitted.

Guiteau has always said that he was only carrying out the will of God. And that is just what the President says. Guiteau says that he is a Christian and that God told or inspired him to kill the President. And Arthur says that it pleased God to remove the President. And if Arthur is correct, all is for the best. God did the killing by making use of Guiteau as his instrument. Then why should poor Guiteau be held responsible? *

We will conclude by saying that great is the mystery of godliness, and, in our judgment, the perfect failure of prayer to help our lamented President will tend to shake the faith of thousands of good men and women as to the existence of a prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God. M. BABCOCK.

St. Johns, Mich.

*But what kind of kindness and wisdom is it that would require eighty long days and nights of continual suffering and pain to remove a man who, if he was to be killed, had better died within a minute after being shot? And I don't wonder that the widow, as she says, "fails to see any providence in connection with the case."

The New Star of Liberty and Nebular Signs of its Mate.

No light shines in vain. Wherever and whenever redeeming effort has lit a beacon kindred natures hav increased its luster and sent its rays around the world. The best ideas of sun adorers, image worshipers, and human saviors speak still and are deathless. So Buddha's and Plato's lights beam ever and enliven modern flames. Every struggle for national justice suffered by oriental bravery reacted in occidental patriotism. Results are resounding and flashing again in the peals of reason, the clash of argument, the scintillations of sentiment of the present rising star of liberty which shines for all lands. Liberal Leagues, with their keynote of free thought, their clarion call of international brotherhood, their pacific anthem of just institutions, their humane benediction of equable administration, create a star of larger magnitude than has before appeared on the skies of mundane life. Let all the good labor for its rapid rising and meridian dispensations. Hitherto it has glimmered just on the horizon, a cool, lone, masculin star, but partially perceiving that it must set in gloom if it does not blend with vitalizing energy from a feminin counterpart. I'll name it Leon while it glows a celebate and warms the wrong side of its prospectiv bride. Along through the eras, mid masculin lights, occasional auroral gleams, as of the dawning of a missing feminin orb, hav silvered the gray clouds with prophetic radiance. The generous hailed the signs with gladness; the tyrannous vowed vengeance upon them. Sheba outshone David; Aspasia was peer of Pericles; Hypatia emblazoned proof of equality of power and crowned it with character and example. Wollstonecroft raised spires of principle and gilded them with methods. Fuller and Farnham set up guiding columns and left them glinting against the clouds, countless literary coruscations and oracles from pen and voice relieved the long darkness and still resound on the tuneful air. Echoes of their music are anon renewed, and golden signs of freedom glance from farther sides of leaden clouds. Hygeia is being crowned goddess of success, and Heredity is becoming the watchward of progress. Thirty years of preparation for empowering the elements of the feminin star hav been operating among nebulous material to purify dust and fire, rock and fluid, gas and vainglory for the rounded star, and Leonia may ere long rise in strength and brightness, her crudeness and encumbrance cast off, her powers alert for noble action, ready for the union that givs and perpetuates light and happiness.

When the two stars embrace and coalesce in council and reciprocal justice, we'll name them League, Liberty. What an array of L's involved! The fortunate liquid spells all the sentinel rays keeping watch around the burning heart of the great star of justice. Life, labor and learning, light, law, and love, leagued for liberty. Now Tee Cee will shout it spells "Le" too, and "land" also. Lo, me! Well, it spells "let" too. Now let him let his pen be the central pivot of the central wheel of operations, while the cohering, consolidating forces of the fight hiss, seethe, and smelt, till they fuse, roll, and glitter, and he may hav two "L's" in the sacred circle of guarding satellites.

The first sign of formativ affinity in woman's accumulativ regions was the advocacy of physiological science for their knowledge of their own structures and their proper uses. The next sign was the plea for practicalizing that knowledge for self-sustaining ability and protection. This aimed at the root of life's blessings and the eradication of its evils. This terrified tyrants, lest their slaves escape on the car of culture. They hav plotted the destruction of freedom and the arrest of science ever since, and violated law and honor in showing cells and grates to teachers laboring for general enlightenment. Their prayer for darkness especially falls on Liberal authors and journalists; their fear extends to the influence of dress reformers.

To produce physical health, and thereby poise mental, moral, and spiritual capacities was seen a vast work, yet could be done as peacefully (if craft did not intrude) as planting flower-beds. The habits to be remedied were simply those of diet and dress. Diet-cure and water-cure were instituted; stimulants, condiments, and pork were abandoned, yeast and soda gave place to heat in raising pure bread, and men readily recuperated. Women lingered and languished; the obstructing form of their clothing was evidently the dead weight upon them. Tight ligatures removed from bodies, trammeling skirts from limbs, and their ailments readily yielded to treatment. That was physiology practicalized. The phrase "dress reform" rang freely over the hills of New York in 1851, and that year thousands probably adopted the improved style. All investigators were convinced that the reform ought to supplant the old corset and petticoat style, having no merit to preserve.

That some who bravely aided the inaugural could not continue the course, was a question of their ability and principle, not testimony against the cause. The opposition that affected a partial, though marked, relapse was as mean as it was mercenary—false as it was cunning and contemptible. Many women, knowing the value of the change both in example and personal benefit, were able to withstand all grades of attack and keep the idea before the world. The Woman's Club and "Sorosis" lent a little hope of aid, but caste and place conquered them. The Boston Physiological Association did not in thirty-three years advance to the ability to rebel against fashion's deathly demands. But constant discussion, though sustained by few, and finally narrowed to one, made the press friendly, and the conviction of the need and ultimate triumph quite general, preparing public opinion for the adoption of hereditary measures.

Since the opening of the reform nations hav watched each other to see which would go fearlessly forward with a consistent costume for women. A few efforts at economic change started in Europe, but not radical or lasting. Now that the planet has become international, it matters little where light breaks forth. The recent signs of the rising of women's star appears in both hemispheres. The favor awarded hygienic views in America has produced commencements of improved styles in fashionable circles and resolutions to resist indecent deformities and extravagances of fashion.

Long reasoning about burdensome dress in Europe manifests action. Last spring the women of Berlin, Germany, convened and declared the resolution to abolish petticoats and fashionable flippery and adopt trousers as the only convenient garment favoring free locomotion and health. During the summer Lady Harberton, in England, adopted the dual garment in the name of the divided skirt, and presides over the Rational Dress Association. All these show a clarifying in the elements of evolution, and cast lights along the horizon betokening a coming orb to complete the power of that which men hav vainly striven to perfect.

The persistent effort of women to hoard and utilize their strength to resist the sordid speculations which, to succeed, must sacrifice them, would so rapidly vitalize all their faculties that their star of fate would soon chase the clouds from the heaven of thought, feeling, and aspiration.

Will not the Leagues now lifting their uncertain star encourage this basic empowering of woman's, that its ascension be timely and its united life and radiance obscure and sink the sham comets, meteors, and rockets now rifting the concave and reigning pestilence on all humanity? M. E. TILLOTSON.

"VOLTAIRE IN EXILE."—A volume that will giv the readers a full understanding of the private life, and indeed the whole life, both public and private, of Voltaire. Though from the hand of one who was his familiar friend, and an admirer of his works, the picture is unbiased and perfect. While it does not, as has been the custom of many of the biographers of Voltaire, wholly condemn, it by no means lavishingly bestows praise. The writer admits the weakness of this great champion of Freethought to hav been that he lived as men of the world in his time lived, that "high as he towered in heart and intellect above the Christian herd among which he lived, he did not rise above them in social morality." But looking upon him as a philosopher, one is "seized with such admiration that the weaknesses of the man are forgotten and entirely swallowed up in his brilliancy, greatness, and philanthropy." Notwithstanding the enemies of Voltaire hav used every means to convince the world that he was an Atheist, he persistently declared his belief in a supreme being, and is endeared, in spite of his faults, to all who hav a love for truth, justice, and liberty.—Banner of Light.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing nearly seven hundred square inches more of reading matter than any other journal of its kind.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1881.

Around the World.

We hope there will be no cessation in taking shares in the Round-the-World journey which Mr. Bennett is now engaged in making. The expenses of the trip will be close upon $3,000, and the cost of the books, with their illustrations, will not be less than $1,500 or $2,000. So his friends who hav sent him away will see that many more names are necessary before the bare cost of the undertaking is paid. The idea is that the work shall be a sort of joint enterprise, the people contributing the money and Mr. Bennett giving his time. It is not fair to ask him to giv the year necessary to make the circuit of our globe and pay for getting out the books besides. The work will be dedicated to those advancing the $5's, and their names will be enrolled in the first volume, which is being forwarded at the rate of thirty-five or forty pages per week. It will take until about next January for it to be finished, and until that time the starry roll of honor is open to those who want to be pioneers in getting the truth. There hav been plenty of books of travel written, but all hav catered to some pious church prejudice, and, so far as telling the actual state of affairs existing in the "Holy Land" and the orient, were worth no more than what they would sell for as waste paper. Those who hav read Mr. Bennett's travels in Europe, written last year, will agree with us that his descriptions are faithful portraits of actual facts. He tells everything that he sees, and he has a shrewd way of seeing everything that is going on around him. His letters so far hav been marvels of descriptiv writing. The work, we feel sure, will be greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav, and we want all our friends and their friends to aid in disseminating it. There will be over one hundred and fifty full-page illustrations of scenes described, besides many smaller cuts. These will add greatly to the interest of the work, and with the faithful and close description will present Old-World places in a very familiar light. It will be as good as making the journey. And in order to pay for all this we shall keep the list open yet awhile longer in the hope that many more will yet send in their names. It isn't exactly square that the eleventh-hour laborers should get as much as the early workers, but if that is divine justice poor fallible human beings cannot be blamed if we giv the ones who subscribe now just as fine a book as those who subscribed to send the editor off. We can call it that the first sent him away and the last bring him back. Send on the V.'s.

The Bennett-Mair Discussion.

To those of our readers who hav perused the book as it was printed in these columns it is not necessary to say that this is a very valuable work for reference and interesting to peruse. It has been said by many that Mr. Mair was the ablest upholder of Christianity they ever read, and it is safe to say that whatever arguments could be adduced in favor of Christianity were brought forward by the gentleman. But falsehood, however ably upheld, cannot stand where the truth is known; and Mr. Bennett has shown this most clearly. Under his sledgehammer blows the theology of Mr. Mair crumbles to dust. He has a very effectiv way of putting his arguments, and he never leaves a point in doubt, but piles proof on proof, mountain high, until the enemy is completely overwhelmed in a mass of evidence.

Mr. Bennett affirms all the propositions—we had almost said truisms—and Mr. Mair denies with what power he can. He brings to the defense of Christianity the best arguments that can be adduced. His letters show painstaking care and a familiarity with authors unexcelled by any layman. Indeed, few professional theologians could draw from the arsenal of the church better weapons. But he is met at every point and disarmed with a promptness that shows Mr. Bennett to be more than his match, and no less familiar with authors. Mr. Mair knows only one side, while Mr. Bennett knows both, and he has not failed to show that Christianity is weak and indefensible, founded on assumptions, supplemented by deceit, and extremely weak in the essentials of proof.

This work will do a great amount of good wherever read. All who hav read it in the paper will want it in book form to preserve, whil for the new subscriber it will possess the added charm of newness. It contains 969 pages; price. $7.50.

A Trinity of Lithographs.

We hav for sale the lithograph likenesses of the three leading Liberals of this country—Thomas Paine, D. M. Bennett, and R. G. Ingersoll. They are all splendidly executed, and with a neat frame around them—which can be procured from picture-frame makers at slight expense—will be an ornament to any home. They will be sent, secure from breakage, by mail at the following prices: D. M. Bennett and R. G. Ingersoll, 50 cents each; Thomas Paine, $1.

THE Northern Wisconsin Spiritual Conference will hold a three days' meeting in Spiritual Hall, Omro, Dec. 2d, 3d, and 4th, 1881. They are happy to announce that they hav secured the talented orator and noted test medium, Frank T. Ripley, of Boston, for next convention. Other speakers are invited to participate. Friends are requested to bear in mind that they are all interested in the truths of Spiritualism, and if their business is such that they cannot attend, to please send what they feel able to the Treasurer, J. Woodruff, Ripon, previous to the meeting. Mr. Ripley will giv tests of spirit presence from the rostrum during the convention.

COL. JOHN R. KELSO has been in town for several days. He is about to bring out some radical works, and also wishes to engage in the Liberal lecture work. He is very able and enthusiastic and we would advise Liberal societies contemplating a course of lectures to send for him.

Obituary.

Another Liberal has passed away. Mr. J. D. Rhodes, aged fifty-three years, died Oct. 31st, of an affection of the heart.

He was a true friend of Freethought, and although persecuted on every side, did much for the cause. Honesty, peace, love, justice to all mankind, were his guiding stars. He was a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and took much interest in the paper. I hav a book which he dedicated to the National Liberal League. If you will inform me how to act I will send it to them, as he wished his name enrolled with the other Liberals. MRS. J. A. COOPER.

Meridian, Miss., Nov. 6, 1881.

Elmina's Good Example.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: If you all feel as conscious-stricken as I do for not responding to the former call that was made for our brave co-worker and the once editor of the bold and fearless free paper, The Battle Axe, you will now hasten with all diligence to redeem yourselvs, as I hav done, by sending a generous remittance to Minnie Merton, Brentwood, Long Island.

Communications.

International Anti-Vaccination Congress.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The Second International Anti-Vaccination Congress has just terminated a four days' session at Cologne. Forty-five delegates attended, representing the various leagues, societies, and opposition to enforced vaccination in Prussia, Saxony, Wurtemburg, Switzerland, Belgium, France, England, and the United States.

Dr. Hubert Boëns, of the Belgium Academy of Medicin, the author of numerous works on smallpox and vaccination, presided, and was supported by Prof. Adolf Vogt, M.D., of Berne University; Dr. H. Oidtmann, of Cologne; Dr. Waltz, of Frankfort on Odor; Dr. H. Schoppe, of Bonn; Dr. E. A. Meyner, of Chemnitz, Saxony; Dr. Weber, of Duisburg; Mr. Zoppritz, of Wortemburg; Dr. Ch. Pigeon, of Fourchambault, France; Mr. W. Tebb, of London; Mr. Thomas Baker, and many others.

Letters of regret for non-attendance, accompanied by expressions of warm approval of the objects of the Congress, were received from the Countess de Noäilles, Lord Clifton, Sir J. Clarke Jervoise, Mr. Peter Taylor, M. P., Mr. Thomas Burt, M. P., Mr. Kruchenius, Member of States General, Holland; Drs. Garth Wilkinson, W. J. Collins, Edward Haughton, T. C. Pearce, Enoch Robinson; Mr. Alderman Tatham, Mayor of Leeds, Prof. Alexander Wilder, of New York, Dr. J. Emery Codere, Professor Materia Medica, Victoria University, Montreal, Prof. James Browne, LL.D., of Williamette University, U. S. A., Dr. G. F. Kolb, Member of the Royal Statistical Commission, Munich, Dr. Westermayer, Ecclesiastical Councillor and Member of the Wirtemburg Diet, Rector P. A. Silgistrom, late M. P. for Sweden, etc., etc.

"The tables literally groaned"—to use the words of Mr. Gladstone with reference to the literature of this agitation on another occasion—with imperial, parliamentary, and municipal returns, statistical tables and official reports, to which constant reference was made by the several speakers, and with books, pamphlets, and journals relating to the subject of smallpox and vaccination. During the seven sittings of the Congress about twenty-five formal addresses and papers were delivered under various sections dealing with the scientific, statistical, social, political, and historical aspects of the subject. Several of the speakers, notably Dr. H. Boëns and Dr. Oidtmann, devoted special consideration to the irrational and unscientific basis of Prof. Pasteur's theories for multiplying artificial diseases as a means of promoting the public health instead of removing the sources and hot-beds of disease by sanitary measures, which could alone annihilate smallpox and other epidemics.

Dr. Charles Pigeon, the delegate from France, delivered an able address on the scientific and medical sides of vaccination, which, briefly epitomized, sets forth the prevailing opinion of the Congress in the following propositions:

1. Smallpox, when rationally treated, is not relativly a dangerous disease.

2. Vaccination does not afford immunity against it, but, on the contrary (being itself an infusion of zymotic molecules) is an excitant of it.

3. Vaccination not unfrequently inoculates syphilis and other maladies much more dangerous than smallpox, as the virus is never free from the risk of such contamination.

The official returns of burgomasters in the cities of Liegnitz, Lubec, Dusseldorf, Cologne, and other places demonstrated the constant priority to attacks of smallpox of the vaccinated over the unvaccinated, a fact admitted to be true of infants by Dr. Thilenius, the leader of the pro-vaccinators in the German Imperial Parliament.

Amongst other proposals approved by the Congress was the petitioning of the various legislatures to make vaccinators responsible for the evil consequences attending upon the operation, which, it was believed, would at no distant day cause the practice to be abandoned.

An Executiv Committee was elected for the ensuing year, and resolutions passed agreeing to continue the International Congress until the Compulsory Vaccination acts, which are everywhere the cause of unspeakable evils, are finally abolished. The next Congress is to meet at Berlin in 1882, during the sittings of the Reichstag. Yours faithfully,

William Tebb.

What Objections to Christianity? Bennett-Mair Discussion, between D. M. Bennett and G. M. Mair. This discussion was first published in The Truth Seeker, and now comes to us in book form. It will be of interest to both the Infidel and Christian. Both sides are well represented. Discussions of this kind always bring to the surface truths which might otherwise lie dormant for centuries. This book should hav a wide circulation, as it justly merits. Published by D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth St., New York.—The Liberal.

Thanksgiving.

In compliance with the request of good brother Jerome, governor of the state of Michigan, we thank thee, O Lord, that we are still out of hell. And we humbly confess that we, and especially all of our neighbors, in justice ought to be in hell for being just what thou didst make us. And we thank thee for the evidence of thy wisdom in making the devil and permitting him, with his snares and traps, to catch so many of thy children for roasting purposes, whilst thou dost get but few for the harp business.

And, Lord, we especially thank thee for permitting the forest fires of our state to burn out of house and home fifteen thousand of our good honest citizens. Thou couldst hav stayed the flames, but, in thy inscrutable wisdom, thou didst know best what was good for them. Five hundred men, women, and children were consumed in the flames, but Lord, in thy book, thou who didst will and permit them to be burned in this world, hast promised that the few who didst love them shall not be roasted in the next world. Michigan and brother Jerome should thank thee for thy blessing showered down upon those poor helpless creatures.

And Lord, after shooting our lamented President, Guiteau prayed to thee that the President might die, and that good brother Arthur might be permitted to occupy the presidential chair. Now, Lord, what gits me is that thou should have permitted a red-handed assassin to hav had a greater influence at the throne of grace than the whole Christian world. But thou knowest best. Every year ten thousand persons in India die of snake-bites. But in making snakes thou didst know best what was good for them fellows. Amen. M. Babcock.

United We Stand, Divided We Fall.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In the month of August last I attended the camp-meeting at Battle Creek, Mich., managed by the State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalis, tsand was surprised and pained to learn that many Spiritualists and Materialists still object to joining their forces in this way. For my part, though a Spiritualist, I see no reason why we should form separate organizations. There seems to be but barely one question, and that is the question of a future life, that at the present time seems to prevent the utmost harmony among all Freethinkers. Some Spiritualists, I find, are very sensitiv on this point without any cause, as I think. Our faith in a future life is founded on facts, and facts are stubborn things; they cannot be destroyed. It is possible we may be drawing wrong conclusions from these facts, and if so we so we ought to be anxious to be undeceived, and then scientific Materialists are the very ones who will be most likely to show us our mistakes, and put us on the right track. I, for one, am anxious to hear every objection that R. G. Ingersoll, Parton, Underwood, and Jamieson can produce against our version of these facts, and the Materialists should embrace every opportunity to giv the, as they believe, deluded Spiritualists the benefits of this superior wisdom.

Truth will never suffer or be put to the worse where it can hav a fair and equal chance with error, said John Milton, two hundred and fifty years ago, but it has not such a chance in this so-called land of liberty to-day. Freethinkers are not on an equal footing with Christians in this country and we never will be as long as we quarrel and divide our forces on every little matter of opinion. If Spiritualism is true the Materialist will find it out some time; if not in this world he will be converted in the next, and we Spritualists hav this advantage in our favor. Materialists, with scarcely an exception, rather be alive than dead; all such will anxiously look among us for evidences of a future life, when they find, as they easily can, that there is something besides humbug and delusion in what we call spiritual manifestations. Another thing the Spiritualists should not overlook is the fact that men and women must become Freethinkers before they dare investigate Spiritualism. As long as they believe the Bible to contain the word of God, they must believe that Satan himself is a great miracle-worker, for so the Bible teaches them, and thousand of them now really believe that these Spiritual manifestation are all the works of the devil. No, my friends, let us not fear that the Ingersolls and the Slenkers, the Wakemans and Bradlaughs, will annihilate Spiritualism. They are dissecting the carcass of old theology, our common enemy, and the discoveries they hav made hav already filled the land with Freethinkers, and Freethinkers are the only material out of which Spiritualists can be made.

I wish we had a thousand such men where we hav one; they are striking tremendous blows upon our common enemy—an enemy that has deprived us of many of our dearest rights, and are zealously laboring to deprive us of what we hav left. If Spiritualism cannot liv in an atmosphere of Freethought, in an organization in which they hav full liberty to demonstrate the facts on which their philosophy is founded, then let it die. And any Materialist or Atheist who fears that his favorit ism will suffer and become weakened in an organization where he can hav full liberty to prove if he can that death ends all, must lack faith in the power of truth. We who believe in a future life can hold our circles, private or public, precisely the same as though we had not joined in such organization. And the Materialists who pity our credulity and lament our weakness and inability to appreciate the beauties of their theory, "that death ends all," will hav plenty of time and opportunity to giv us the fiftieth exposé of the spiritual manifestations; they hav already given us forty-nine, if I hav made no mistake in the record. I, for one, am very thankful that they hav manifested such an unselfish interest in our welfare and such heartfelt zeal for our happiness and well being.

Friends of Freethought, there is but one course for us to pursue if we would recover the rights of which Christianity has deprived us. In the first place, all Freethinkers must unite, and not only unite, but work, and our first work is the complete secularization of this government. We must demand that every law in our statutes put there with the design of giving special advantages to the Christian religion is wiped out, until the rights of all men and all women, of whatever creed, whether they believe in one god or three gods, or in no god at all, shall be equal before the law; until Christians are made to comprehend the fact that the United States of America is in no special sense of the word a Christian nation.

Juliette Bowen.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Please announce to the readers of The Truth Seeker that Miss Juliette Bowen, of Keene, Mich., the young lady who on the 13th of last August climbed to the top of the new Methodist church steeple in that place and hurrahed for Robert G. Ingersoll, will send her photograph to any address on receipt of twenty-five cents.

Owing to the publicity the press has given to that performance, as well as the peculiar significance of it, very many from all parts of the country hav written letters expressing their admiration of her bravery and requesting the favor of her photograph.

Miss Bowen is an enthusiastic admirer of the "new dispensation of knowledge," of which Ingersoll is the "inspired apostle." She is intelligent, beautiful both in form and feature, and highly respected by all who know her, outside of the swamps of superstition. The church people sought to exercise their spite by means of their modern weapons, ridicule and ostracism, but her good name is so well fortified that all they can do is to gnash their teeth in impotent rage.

She climbed that steeple, one hundred feet high, from scaffold to scaffold, and descended without assistance, a feat that several other young ladies attempted without success. Her father, Alpheus A. Bowen, promptly paid the ten dollars, and is justly very proud of his daughter. He is a stanch Liberal, and does not hesitate to let the world know his sentiments. Miss Bowen's address is Lowell, Mich. Her friends, myself among the number, hav advised her to this course in regard to her photographs. All letters with stamps inclosed will receive prompt attention by herself.

Is There a God?

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In a last issue Clarke Irvine undertakes to prove the existence of a personal God by saying that the universe is far ahead of any work of man's, and so man's cannot be the highest intelligence in the universe. I think Bro. Irvine is imposed upon by those vague adjectivs, "high" and "grand," and their comparativs and superlativs. Who says intelligence is the "highest" state of being? Who pretends to know that man's intelligence is the "highest?" In what sense is the universe ahead of any work of man? It is, of course, much larger, but not, I think, more skilfully adapted to an end, which is the mark of intelligence. It would, I think, be precious difficult to prove that the universe as a whole is adapted to any end at all. This was always the weak spot in the famous argument from design, and since Darwin it has also become impossible to maintain design in the structure of animal bodies. I am not an Atheist myself, in the full sense of the word. Perhaps no man is. But that the universe is produced by an intelligent will seems to me contrary to all the evidence. Intelligence and will require an object to act upon, and a resisting force which reacts. How, then, can they be found in a solitary being, who has nothing to act upon or suffer from? Only by dividing God—only by some kind of transcendental metaphysics—is it possible to make thought appear the cause of matter. I say appear, for as everyone who has studied metaphysics well knows they never lead to any result which will bear careful examination.

The Harmony and Meaning of the Scientific Gospels.

TWO LECTURES DELIVERED BEFORE THE N. Y. LIBERAL CLUB BY T. B. WAKEMAN.

LECTURE I.

The next harmony of science results from the foregoing conclusion that we live in a world of relations held together by human sensation:

VIII.—IT IS THE LAW OF THE INDESTRUCTIBILITY OF MATTER AND THE CORRELATION OF FORCES.

In Mr. Spencer's phrase this is the "law of the persistence of matter and of the forces."

The older and imperfect statements of these laws were known as the "uniformity of nature" and "the law of cause and effect." These laws, however named, underlie all knowledge and all science. They are the conclusions of the most general and carefully-tested experience of the human race. They declare that no matter is ever within human ken, created or destroyed; and that the changes of matter, called forces, in mass or in molecules, are the exact correlations of each other, and may be converted into each other in definite proportions of quantity or quality. Hence the course of nature is uniform, that is, the same causes and conditions will always give the same effects. The same phenomena will always occur under the same conditions. If we can control the conditions, we can the result. The universality of the law of correlation has caused it to be considered absolute, universal, and necessary, like the axioms of logic and mathematics, but like them it rests upon experience in its last analysis.

All objective science is but the following out of this law under different conditions and with different examples. Science is the accurate testing and classifying of these co-relations. All subjective science is the applying of them for human uses and the modifying of phenomena according to them. The admirable works and lectures of Herbert Spencer, Prof. E. L. Youmans, Profs. Grove, Barker, Carpenter, and others, on this law and its history and consequences, make it unnecessary to pursue its details and applications further.

There can be no real knowledge of modern science which is not grounded upon this law. Every one should become acquainted with its histor, and filiation. For that purpose the compilation of Prof. E. L. Youmans's, "The Correlation and Equivalence of the Physical Forces," remains the most useful introduction.

But this law is not only true and the basis of all of the physical sciences; it has its necessary counterpart in Psychology, the science of the mind. It there appears as the law of inseparable association which forms the basis of that science. It is by virtue of this law of association that the science of the mind has become a science, and that we have a modern Psychology as different from the old as chemistry is different from alchemy. This counterpart is necessary, as above stated, because the sensations and thoughts of man rest upon his experience of changes which he regards as objective to him. The laws and relations of these changes are, therefore, inevitably from experience but yet the connecting links by which sensations and thoughts are held together, and are able to be coördinated into a science. Thus the microcosm, or little world, within the mind of man is the counterpart of his macrocosm, or great world, without him. The fundamental laws of both of these worlds are, therefore, but the two sides of the same human sensation and experience.

This law of correlation is often used as the basis of notions for which it is no warrant at all. For instance, it is said that the quantity of matter and force in the "Universe" is unchangeable and eternal, and that there is some objective unity of the forces, of which center or God, they are all changing forms. These are merely metaphysical notions, connected with the old universe idea. They are incapable of proof from anything we know. We only know that the changes in matter and in mind have a constant or certain relation to each other, as far as we observe, and that is the sufficient basis of all science. But it is more, it is the link by which all of the special sciences can be linked together into one grand science or positive philosophy.

We are thus directly brought to the ninth great Harmony:

IX.—THE FACT THAT THE SPECIAL SCIENCES ARE NOW SO FAR COMPLETED AND CORRELATED THAT THEY FORM A POSITIVE PHILOSOPHY; A NEW EXPLANATION OF THE WORLD; WHICH SUPPLANTS ALL THEOLOGICAL AND METAPHYSICAL PHILOSOPHIES.

This result follows from the steps which enabled us to see in the law of the permanency of matter and the correlation of its forces a link by which all of the phenomena of all of the several Sciences are held together as parts of one human world. The sciences arranged in their correlative order must inevitably give us the only true, verifiable, and really useful philosophy possible to man. It is a fact that this great achievement, this novus ordo seculorum, is before us. Its method is not that of inspiration, revelation, or intuition, but that of verification; the actual discovery of the true, the good, and the beautiful, by the test of experience. The law of correlation forms the warp by which the Cosmos is woven together as a whole around man as its center and only unity.

Resting upon this Philosophy, the final victory of Humanity is assured. For it is because the people are ignorant that they are destroyed. Science becomes more and more the illuminator, liberator, guide, and savior of mankind in proportion as it becomes a completed philosophy. As such it judges the past and determines the present and the future. It becomes destructive and constructive. Turned upon the past it reveals the terrible ignorance and superstition of the preceding methods of Philosophy. The adherents of these old methods fight this newcomer with utter desperation. They are willing enough that science may remain special and fragmentary, but when they find it founding a philosophy that will displace them, they become at once true successors of the fathers who burned Bruno. They are right, for this morning of the new Philosophy makes visible the darkness of the literature of theology and metaphysics which still forms the bulk of our libraries. A change, therefore, is coming over the thought of the world. No holy office, no ghostly or ghastly father, condemns that dead literature to the fire, but the light of tested truth more effectively leaves it to darkness and oblivion.

The words of Hume forcibly present this destructive truth, for, borrowing the allusion to the flames from theology, he says: "If we take in hand any volume of divinity or school, Metaphysics, for instance, let us ask, Does it contain any abstract reasoning concerning quantity or number? No! Does it contain any experimental reasoning concerning matter of fact and existence? No! Commit it then to the flames, for it can contain nothing but sophistry and illusion."

Prof. Huxley has figured as the Balaam of the Positivists—blessing when he went out to curse; for in quoting these words of Hume and indorsing them with all his might he adds to them his statement of the constructive side of the Liberal problem in words that ought to make him as immortal as their author. He says, referring to these words of Hume:

"Permit me to enforce this most wise advice. Why trouble ourselves about matters of which, however important they may be, we do know nothing and can know nothing? We live in a world which is full of misery and ignorance, and the plain duty of each and all of us, is to try to make the little corner he can influence somewhat less miserable, and somewhat less ignorant than it was before he entered it. To do this effectually, it is necessary to be fully possessed of only two beliefs; the first that the order of nature is ascertainable by our faculties to an extent which is practically unlimited; the second that our volition counts for something as a condition of the course of events."

These breathe the very spirit of Constructive Liberalism. In this way the advanced science that has for its warp the law of correlation disposes of the past, and turns us to the future in the spirit of construction, encouragement, and hope.

As a summary of what has been said, and as an outfit for the constructive Philosophy, let us begin with the memorable table of conclusions, summed up by Prof. Fiske. He presents it as a table of conclusions in which Comte and Spencer agree. The more important point is that it expresses the substantial agreement of all scientific thought on the fundamental points of Positive Philosophy. No one can fail to notice the immense grasp and the constructive tendency displayed in this table. The influence of social ends must ever render our Science more and more synthetic. The intellect analyzes and disintegrates—the heart and activity combine and integrate. But here is Prof. Fiske's conclusions from his Cosmic Philosophy, vol. 1, p. 257. In them we can all agree:

I. That all knowledge is relative.

II. That all unverifiable hypotheses are inadmissible.

III. That the evolution of philosophy, whatever else it may be, has been a process of deanthropomorphization.

IV. That philosophy is a coherent organization of scientific doctrines aud methods [and results].

V. That the critical attitude of philosophy is not destructive, but constructive; not iconoclastic, but conservative; not negative, but positive."

We may congratulate all students of Science and Liberalism upon this statement, so short and true and comprehensive. Those who stand upon this table may be called generally Scientists, Constructive Liberals, or Positivists. This criterion is proper here, for there are many men distinguished in the specialties and details of scientific research who, like Hugh Miller, are merely theologians or metaphysicians studying, experimenting, or speculating in or about scientific matters. They have never given themselves up to it or its methods unreservedly. Never, like Cortez, have they burned their ships and determined to conquer and live, or else to die in the New World. Those who do not achieve this high resolve are merely half-hearted friends, if not, like most clergymen, scientists, enemies, and Jesuits in disguise, using the language and seeking to get within the camp of science to betray it by pretending to be of its leaders. When the Jesuits took possession of the leading and education of Europe, the reformation was at an end. In the name of Science they strangled it. Our colleges and many of our "respected" special scientists are pursuing the same course now.

But how, in Prof. Fiske's words, can philosophy become "a coherent organization of scientific doctrines and methods" [and results]?

We answer, only by our next Harmony, the scientific arrangement of the sciences themselves into a whole under the law of correlation.

A Word for the Devil.

I think Bro. Babcock hardly does this much-abused person justice in the last TRUTH SEEKER, when he says that Satan drowned two thousand hogs, which was "a little tough on the pigs and awful mean on the owner." The devil wasn't to blame. It was Jesus who had just kicked the devil out of another kind of an animal, and threatened to send him into the deep (the sea?) The poor devil naturally asked to be let off, and Jesus, like a good hog-hating Jew as he was, sent him into the pigs, with the double result that the pigs were drowned and the devil got into the deep after all. This was a case of friend Jesus's smartness. Some people hav represented him as a sort of fine-talking fool, but I think if he had turned his attention to the old-clothes business, he would hav died rich. The man who told the story of the unjust steward was not a fool. Perhaps Bro. Babcock will say it was worse for the devil to get into one man than two thousand pigs. But again I say no. The pigs couldn't help themselvs; while the devil never got into a man unless the man was willing. Everybody abuses the devil "without cause." I like the unpopular side, and won't hear the devil misrepresented without taking up for him. Giv the devil his due. C. L. JAMES.

Mr. Bennett's Credentials.

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.
NEW YORK, July 24, 1881.

To Whomsoever these Presents may Come:

We, the undersigned, certify that the bearer of this letter is Mr. D. M. Bennett, a resident of the city of New York, and a citizen of the United States of America. He is about to leave his native country for a journey around the world.

Mr. Bennett is a remarkable personage, and is held in great honor by the most learned, Liberal-minded, and respectable men and women in this republic. He is and has been for many years editor and proprietor of a Liberal newspaper known as THE TRUTH SEEKER. This paper is published, as its name imports, to discover and promulgate the truth, and in opposition to the Christian religion, which prevails to some extent in the United States. For this opposition the Christians, during a temporary possession of power, imprisoned him one year under a most false and unjust accusation. As the church selected him for a special object of her malignity, the Liberals and Infidels adopted him as the champion of their cause and as the special object of their honor and esteem. Last year they sent him at their own expense [in part] on a trip to Europe. On that occasion he well approved himself and wrote such graphic and interesting accounts of his travels that the Liberal citizens of this country again send him forth on a larger tour of travel that shall take him around the world with the injunction to write full accounts of his travels and publish them in books. For these books some five hundred [now near seven hundred] of his friends and fellow-citizens have subscribed and paid the price in advance.

In the prosecution of this enterprise we commend Mr. Bennett to all men of progress and all Liberal opinions throughout the world. He is a man of truth and integrity, and the story he will tell of his persecutions and his sacrifices for the cause of Free-thought and to maintain a free press in a republic represented to be free will be worthy of implicit credit.

Mr. Bennett is one of the Vice-Presidents of the National Liberal League, and we, the Board of Directors of the League, hav written and signed these credentials as a passport to the friendship and favor of Liberals, Infidels, men of science and progress, wherever he may present them. T. C. LELAND,
Secretary N. L. L.

What I Don't Believe.

PART II.—NO. 59.

664. I cannot think that the four gospels show a spirit of truth in the way in which they disagree and contradict each other in many particulars. The uncertainty as to the time of his birth has been alluded to. To show that nothing is really known as to when he was born it is only necessary to quote a few prominent Christian authorities. Dr. Adam Clarke, in his Commentary, says: "The nativity of Jesus in December should be given up. The Egyptians are said to have placed it in January; Wagenseil in February; Boehart in March; Clement in April; some in May; others in June and July. Wagenseil as a second choice was willing to compromise on August; Lightfoot preferred September, while others were partial to October and November; and thus they have gone from one month to another, taking them all up in the circuit of the year." Unfortunately nobody can tell when he was born, and the Evangelists throw no light upon the subject. It is quite as probable as any other way that he was not born at all, and that the twenty-fifth day of December, as before observed, was adopted because for many centuries it had been a pagan festival and had been kept as the birthday of some of their favorite gods. There is about the same want of agreement as to the year in which Jesus was born, varying between the statements of Matthew and Luke from four to seven years. Prof. Draper says there has not been less than thirty different opinions as to the time of Jesus's birth. Chamber's Encyclopedia has this to say upon the subject: "The date of the birth of Jesus is now generally fixed a few years—at least four years—before the commencement of the Christian era. The reason of this opinion we cannot here state, but it may be observed that the reckoning of the dates from the birth of Christ did not begin till the sixth century, when error on such a point was very probable. The precise date of the birth of Jesus, however, cannot be determined, nor can the year of his death be much more confidently settled. The common computation fixes his death at the year 33 A. D., or when he was probably thirty-seven years of age. As to the month or day of the birth of Jesus nothing is known, although the circumstance that the shepherds were watching their flocks by night makes it very certain that it did not take place at the time at which the festival of Christmas is held." McClintock & Strong's Cyclopedia concedes that the birth of Jesus must have been at least as early as the year 6 B. C. The Encyclopedia Britannica (Article Chronology) says: "Christians counts one hundred and thirty-three contrary opinions of different authors concerning the year the messiah appeared on earth—many of them celebrated writers." By these confessions from high sources it can be seen how completely in the fog is the whole Christian world as to the period when their God made his debut on this planet. Quite as much certainty exists as to the time when the Wandering Jew, Robinson Crusoe, or Jack the Giant-killer was born. There is almost as much discrepancy as to where he was born, some having it at Bethlehem, others at Nazareth, some in a stable, others in a cave. The fact is, there is nothing at all known about it. All is conjecture or simple invention.

665. There are more disagreements and contradictions between the four gospel story-tellers than can be noticed here, but it will hardly do to let them all go unnoticed. There is a marked discrepancy between the first three evangelists as to the length of the mission of Jesus, and the fourth. From the first it is to be inferred that it continued but a year or a year and a half, while by the latter it is to be understood to be three years or more. In fact, Irenæus, who was the first to discover the four canonical gospels, insisted that it continued for thirty or forty years. I cannot think there is the slightest reliability in the many statements and opinions upon the subject. If such a mission was ever made, and if the four men who undertook to write it up knew the facts of the case and were able to write the truth, they could unquestionably have come nearer giving such a statement as would hav harmonized, and as people would have been able to understand alike. That this is not the case is a proof of its falsity.

666. There is great disagreement between the four gospel writers as to the number of times which Jesus visited Jerusalem during his mission. According to the first three he visited it but once and that near the close of his career. According to the fourth writer he visited the city three or four times and a different periods of his ministry. I cannot believe that authorities that agree no better than this are worth of credit. One of the narratives, at least, must be a positive falsehood, and very easily both could be.

667. The account of the slaughtering of the infants by Herod is only mentioned by Matthew. This was a very remarkable and important matter, and if it really took place the other three writers were very remiss in their duty to say nothing about it. As they said nothing about it, it is very fair to conclude that they knew nothing about it; and if they knew nothing about it, it is quite probable that Matthew did not, and that he simply spun a yarn on the subject for the sake of bringing in one of his prophecy-fulfilments for which he showed a great fondness. The slaughtering of all the babes of a kingdom, or of a given portion of it, was a monstrous and most improbable affair, and I caunot believe that it took place as Matthew states it.

668. There is a positive disagreement of statement between Matthew and the other writers about Jesus being taken into Egypt in his infancy. If he made that journey Mark, Luke, and John never heard of it; and as they did not, it is extremely probable that it never occurred, and that Matthew yarned again for the sake of working in another of his remarkable prophecy-fulfilments. While Matthew had Jesus off in Egypt, Luke had him on a visit to Nazareth, and being taken in to the temple at Jerusalem to attend to the matter of circumcision and the ceremonies pertaining to it. I am sure one or the other told a falsehood, and quite possibly both. It is a great pity the writers of God's inspired word should be guilty of such prevarication.

669. Matthew is the only one of the four divine narrators who has anything to say about Jesus visiting the temple in his boyhood and engaging in a dispute with learned doctors on intricate points of the law. The others appear to be very ignorant of this early discussion, and it is more than probable, as they knew nothing of it, that it did not take place. Matthew may easily again draw upon his fertile imagination.

670. There is a marked disagreement as to the choosing of the twelve apostles. One says Andrew was the first one chosen, while three insist it was Simon. It is not possible that all told the truth—one or three stated a mistruth. There is a similar disagreement as to the subsequent choice of the other disciples, but the one case mentioned is sufficient to illustrate the want of harmony among the four gospel writers.

671. There is nothing in the first three gospels about the Eternal Logos, or the new birth; nothing about the flowing of life from the Father to the Son, and from the Son to the believers in him; nothing of the pre-existence of the son in glory before he was born into this world or before the world was. The other three gospels contain nothing of the long metaphysical discoveries and homilies which so abound in the fourth gospel. The Jesus of the fourth gospel is entirely different from the Jesus of the other three gospels. If the second birth is really of such consequence as set forth in John, why in the world was it not made known to Matthew, Mark, and Luke? It is quite probable that the second birth was an after-thought gotten up late in the second century to conform to the pagan notion of a new birth. I do not believe that Jesus taught the doctrine.

672. Matthew, Mark, and Luke knew nothing of Nicodemus and his visiting Jesus by night to learn the mysteries of his doctrines. The matter was one of considerable moment or John would not have given such importance to it. But as the firs three wrote the whole truth, and knew nothing of the remarkable case, we will have to conclude that John was mistaken and wrote what never took place.

673. Matthew, Mark, and Luke had no knowledge of the great miracle of Jesus turning water into wine so particularly narrated by John. This, if done at all, was performed in a public manner, and would appear to be one of the most successful of the miracles which Jesus performed, and it being his firs it was extremely remiss in Matthew, Mark, and Luke to say nothing of it. If they knew it and ignored so remarkable an event they were certainly incorrect historians and cannot be relied upon in the statements they do make. But as they have nothing to say about it, I am inclined to think that it did not take place, and that John is guilty of misrepresentation in making the statement he does.

674. It is the same with the still more remarkable miracle of raising Lazarus from the dead; John is the only one of the four who seems to have known anything about the remarkable feat, or who deemed the trivial affair of consequence enough to mention. Now the raising of a man from the dead after he had begun to decompose, and the stench of decomposing flesh began to exude from his festering body, was a most remarkable event if it ever took place, and the first three writers were extremely deficient in the performance of their duty not to speak of the matter if they knew anything of it. As they have not a word to say about it, it is only fair to conclude they knew nothing of it; and if they knew nothing of it, as it was said to be performed in a public manner, it never took place at all, and was only one of John's big stories. So far as I am concerned, if all the four had teld it for a solemn truth, I could not believe that such a thing as raising a man from death ever took place. The thing is utterly impossible, and if a thousand Matthews, Marks, Lukes, and Johns were to assert it, it would not be true. A man may be restored when apparently drowned, or when he has sunk in a fit and animation is temporarily suspended. This thing probably occurs somewhere every day in the year; but when a person is really dead, and the work of decomposition has begun to take place, it is worse than idle to pretend that the body can be resuscitated and the former life be restored to it. The claim is utterly false; it never took place and never can. This one case clearly proves the utter unreliability of the gospel narrations.

675. The extraordinary sermon of Jesus on the mount seems of the four writers to have been known only by Matthew. Luke has something like it given on the plain, while Mark and John remain in total ignorance of the matter. And although in that sermon is embodied the gist of Jesus's teachings, and the summing up of man's duty, still it contains nothing of much that John puts into the mouth of Jesus. These terrible discrepancies are fatal to the trustworthiness of the gospel narratives.

676. The account of the somewhat remarkable exhibition of the transfiguration of Jesus when he became glorified as a spirit, and Moses and Elias appeared to him and conversed with him, receives no better treatment at the hands of the three story-tellers. Matthew, who was not present, is able to tell all about it, while John, who is claimed to be there, is entirely "mum" upon the extraordinary subject. This simple fact is quite enough to convince the thoughtful reader that the representation of the matter is utterly worthless.

677. There seems to be no better agreement on the singular subject of casting out devils. It seemed to form quite a large share of the occupation of Jesus, though nothing of the kind is now known in the world. Almost every disease is now known to come from natural causes, from an unhealthy condition of the system, or from an unfavorable exposure, but in the time of Jesus these diseases were called devils, and he delighted to cast them out. If a man was insane from any cause, he was said to be possessed of a devil, and the way to effect a cure was to drive him out by some holy spell. In the gospels an account is given of one of these insane men strolling among the tombs, having one or more devils in him, and he was very wild and furious. Here again there is a serious disagreement between Matthew and Mark as to how many men there were who had the devils inside them. Mark says there was but one man, while Matthew insists there were two. Did not one of them tell a falsehood? Could not both of them have equally misstated the truth? It strikes me that much credence cannot be safely given to either.

678. It seems a hard story to believe that a devil from one man, or two devils from two men, could divide up into a thousand devils and occupy that number of swine, causing them to rush pell-mell into the sea and be destroyed. The morality of thus destroying such a large number of hogs would seem very questionable on the part of Jesus, to say the least. For one, I must say the story is too devilish hard for me to believe it at all.

679. Mary Magdalene seems to have had more than her share of devils, entertaining as many as seven of them at a time, more, undoubtedly, than any ordinary woman is entitled to. How so many found entrance into one female is not satisfactorily explained. I entertain some doubts of the truth of the story; it, too, is most too devilish.

680. Among the dozen similarities between the three synoptical gospels and the fourth gospel there are conspicuous features. In the synoptical gospel the methods of teaching are in keeping with what might be supposed to be the language of an illiterate but somewhat intelligent Galilean peasant who had been reared in the provinces and was not familiar with the intricate and recondite matters pertaining to the deep subjects of philosophy and metaphysics; while in the fourth gospel we have principally enigmatical and metaphysical addresses, founded on the principle enunciated in the Alexandrian school—a philosophy turning chiefly on the person of Christ, the existence of the Eternal Logos and its relation to the father, and presenting a series of recurring contrasts. These discourses by no means tend to instruct ignorant and illiterate people, but to mystify and puzzle even the learned and thoughtful, and to tire and repel the average mind. Even when his hearers seemed to catch his meaning, Jesus would instantly utter some other obscure and perplexing sentiment; he would utter propositions and problems still more obscure and difficult of comprehension. He also did this when they had not caught his meaning at all. He seemed to delight to lead them on from intricate mazes to mazes still more blind and obscure. The rabbi Nicodemus seemed quite as unable to understand him as the Samarian woman or the rude Galilean peasants. A comparison of these gospels with the fourth tends very much to disparage the latter. In the former the multitudes are nearly in all cases disposed to be favorable to the teacher, while in the fourth gospel Jesus usually arouses their anger. In the first three they are astonished at the authority of his teaching; in the fourth his audiences usually try to stone him. In the three his form is easily and rapidly spread abroad, while in the fourth his words make little or no impression. In the first case people follow him from all directions, while in the other Jews send out officers to arrest him. In the one case his discourse seems to elicit enthusiasm and approval, while in the other they provoke curses and imprecations. And, what is curious in the matter, in the fourth gospel all the hatred and machinations aroused against him prove abortive for the simple reason given that "his hour was not yet come." He was thus enabled to move about among his enemies, arousing his anger as much as he pleased, because the time had not arrived for the final sacrifice to be made. This miraculous holding of the anger of his enemies seems to be the reason for describing in the fourth gospel a state of things so utterly different from what is seen in the other three. This great disparagement between the different gospel writers may be regarded as an unerring proof that they were not inspired from the same source, and that they were not guided by the spirit of truth, or at least that all of them were not, I can believe, faultless and infallible.

681. The almost unending differences between the four gospel writers may still be further traced. As to the matter of Jesus riding into Jerusalem they seem unable to tell the story alike. Two of them have it that it was an ass and its colt, while the other two have it the colt only. An ass more or less may make no material difference when the Lord wishes to ride in state, but it would seem that truthful and inspired narrators ought to be able to state the case alike.

682. The little incident of applying the ointment to the person of Jesus had also to be differently stated. Two say it was poured upon his head, while the two others say it was his feet. Admitting that it made no material difference to which end the grease was applied, in all conscience would it not have been better for them all to have told the truth about the matter? If it was the head it was not the feet, and it was only uttering a falsehood to say it was the feet, and, vice versa, if it was the feet it was not the head, and it is positively false to say head. I cannot harmonize these falsehoods.

We hav plenty more of those colored posters on hand which we will gladly send to any friend who takes enough interest in The Truth Seeker to aid in extending its circulation.

Letters from Friends.

PORT JERVIS, N. Y., Nov. 10, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I am sorry to be one of the eleventh-hour men you speak of, but as it is better late than never, I inclose post-office order for $5.00 for the Round-the-World Trip, which I hope will be a pleasant one. Yours, J. P. PALMER.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, Nov. 3, 1881.

MR. MACDONALD: You will find inclosed money order for five dollars, to apply to the Trip Around the World. Please add the name of Lucian Schwitzgabel to the list of Salt Lake City, Utah.

LUCIAN SCHWITZGABEL.

GRANTSVILLE, NEV., Oct. 26, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been sorry that my pecuniary circumstances did not permit me to be among the first who contributed their five dollars to send our loved and very able writer, Mr. Bennett, around the world. I hav hoped, however, that I would be able, sooner or later, to send in my mite and to that extent help a good work and a noble cause. I am already assured by the letters received from our distinguished traveler that if nothing happens to him, it will prove a splendid investment. I am now happy in inclosing you ten dollars, five for the above-named object, and for the other five send me the following books; "The Gods, and Other Lectures;" "The Ghosts and Other Lectures," cloth, $2.50; "The Truth Seeker Collection," 75 cts.; "Six Lectures on Astronomy," by R. A. Proctor, 20 cts.; Herbert Spencer's "Sociology," $1.50.

Very respectfully yours, PAUL GARIEPY.

HOOPER, UTAH, Oct. 6, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: By next mail of the 24th inst. I will remit you post-office order for three dollars, for THE TRUTH SEEKER from Oct. 1881 to Oct. 1882. I hav been striving to send you five dollars to help swell the Round-the-World Fund, for surely if there is any man competent to make a trip around the world and tell all the particulars of what exists, and what has been in the past, that man is D. M. Bennett, as every letter he has ever written proves him head and shoulders above all other letter-writers. You must accept my wish for the deed in my case, in regard to my V, for I cannot do impossibilities, even to help the noble benefactor, D. M. Bennett. It is true, I never promised a dime. If I had, I should sell my last shirt to help friend Bennett in his noble efforts to giv the sons and daughters of men the truth and nothing but the truth, as he finds it upon this beautiful earth, which is as far superior to the Golden City men talk about so very much as the sun is above a Mormon slut (that is, a thin wick put through a pant button, and a little fat in a yeast powder box-lid, for a light).

I take enough interest in THE TRUTH SEEKER to put up some of your posters in this place and Ogden, and I will post one or two in Salt Lake City the first time I go there.

Yours fraternally, EDWARD F. MUNN.

H. L. GREEN'S LECTURE TRIP.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Since I wrote to you I hav lectured in Grand Ledge, Otsego, Coloma, and Augusta in this state, and next week expect to speak in Jonesville, Union City, Colon, and Schoolcraft. There are a great many outspoken Liberals in Michigan, and many more, who, I am sorry to say, are not outspoken. And, as everywhere else, the Liberals here stand much in need of organization. For that reason it is very difficult to arrange for a lecture in many towns. There is not a village in the state where a respectable audience could not be got together to listen to a Freethought lecture if there was some one person in the town who would take the lead in making the necessary arrangements. But I am pleased to learn that in most every town of any size I find a few live, activ Freethinkers who are doing what they can to disseminate light and knowledge, and the number is increasing every day.

At Grand Ledge I found a town full of Freethinkers. Nearly every business man there is in sympathy with our movement, and although the announcement of my meeting was not made until the morning of the day that I lectured, the Opera House was well filled with an intelligent class of people, who listened attentivly to what I had to say for nearly two hours. During my stay at Grand Ledge I enjoyed the hospitality of the peaceful home of Mr. Harrison Halbert, the most radical Freethinker I ever met. He is a man of property in that community, but has no fear of the minions of orthodoxy. All know what his views are. A short time since he visited the home of some orthodox relations, and after family prayers he coolly inquired, "How long before you expect to get an answer to that prayer?"

At this place I also made the acquaintance of Messrs. Geo. W. Irish, Stephen Pearl, Iria Smith, and others of the Liberal "household of faith." On Sunday evening last I spoke at Otsego, Mich., to a large audience. At that village a new fine Opera House has just been built and my lecture was the first one ever delivered in it. For the privilege of lecturing there I am indebted to Dr. Chase, of Otsego, the son of Hon. Warren Chase, of California, so well known to the Liberal public. Dr. Chase is a worthy scholarly man who is an able advocate of Freethought views.

On Monday evening last I lectured in Coloma on the shore of Lake Michigan. I was invited there by Dr. W. Ryns, who is as live and earnest a Liberal as I hav met with for many a day. He understands how to get together a large meeting. He did not spare any labor or expense in advertising, and the result was one of the largest gatherings I hav been permitted to address in this state. And it was composed of the most intelligent of people. Wednesday evening I talked at Augusta. I was invited there by Lowell Hulett, who I found to be a thinker and worker. His countenance and general appearance reminded me of Wendell Phillips more than any man I ever saw. And surely any man should be proud of thus resembling the most polished orator and greatest reformer this or any other country ever produced.

At Augusta I was permitted to make the acquaintance of a number of the most earnest and intelligent of Liberalists, among whom I remember the names of E. W. Hewett, W. V. Warmington, F. B. Hall, C. M. Bradish, and last, but not least, Mrs. Piper, your most efficient agent there, who is constantly laboring with successful results to increase the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I had a most pleasant visit with E. W. Hewitt, Esq., a lawyer here. He is one of the best read men I hav recently come across and also a great friend and admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Mr. Hewett ought to take the rostrum for Liberalism. I enjoyed the hospitality of the pleasant home of friend Hall, who, with his intelligent wife and daughter, did all they could to make my visit pleasant. I shall long remember my visit with our Liberal friends at Augusta.

H. L. GREEN.

BROUNSBORO, OR., Oct. 24, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I see I am behind again, so I inclose post-office order for three dollars, one year's subscription. I cannot do without THE TRUTH SEEKER. Two or three men in this neighborhood think they will subscribe for it. Send me some posters, and I may get more to think the same. WM. TERRILL.

HART, MICH., Nov. 3, 1881.

MR. EDITOR; I see by the tab on my paper that I hav been caught behind with the needful, which I did not intend should happen, but I find it quite difficult to keep up with all the demands. I intend to keep on taking the best paper in the world as long as I am able to pay for it, especially if it continues to conduct itself as creditably as it has thus far. I inclose the amount necessary to insure the paper for another year. C. A. GAINES.

BOISE CITY, IDAHO, Oct. 27, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: My tab tells me I am somewhat indebted to you. I can ill spare the cash, but I could not think of such a calamity as being the loser of a single copy of your valvable paper without abhorrence. I desire, oh, so much, to be in that starry galaxy of names to assist our grand old hero around the world, and would gladly send ten dollars instead of these lonesome two, but cannot, being at the foot of the ladder. But I am not always going to remain there, and when I do get up a few rounds I will see that my share of the patronage to the best paper in America is faithfully and freely given. Inclosed find money order for $2, which apply on my subscription.

Ever yours, EVERARD MARTIN.

SENECA, IOWA, Nov. 6, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Will you please ask your readers through the paper if any of them know of a cure for nasal catarrh, and oblige a lady reader of your paper? E. M. B.

OWEN SOUND, CAN., Oct. 29, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed five dollars, three for THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year, from Sept. 1881 to Sept. 1882, and the balance as per order inclosed. I am a little behind time with my renewal, and I am thankful you did not cut me off in my shortcomin . I am determined to stick to the old ship. It was she who brought me out of the fogs of superstition, and I owe more for the passage than I shall ever be able to pay, but I am doing my best, hoping Mr. Bennett a pleasant and profitable journey and a safe return.

Yours truly, BERT F. THOMSON.

EATON RAPIDS, Oct. 29, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find one dollar for two new subscribers for three months each. They are both good Liberals and will probably become permanent subscribers. I will try to get more. I think that is a good way to increase the circulation of the paper. Many will become interested in the paper and will become permanent patrons. That is the way I commenced. I lent several copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER to my Infidel brother in the state of New York last winter. He is now a subscriber to the paper. Much good can be done in this way. Yours, for the good cause, A. ATWOOD.

CHICAGO, ILL., Oct. 31, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $2.00. One place to my account for the Round-the-World Trip, and for the other dollar send a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I suppose you will know before you get this that we Liberals of Chicago organized an auxiliary of the National Liberal League yesterday afternoon at 54 North Lake st., and there was a very good assemblage of Freethinkers. The following officers were elected: President, Mr. James K. McGie; Secretary, Mr. E. A Styens; Treasurer, Mrs. M. E. Clemens. Everything passed off finely, and things in general look well for a good League. Respectfully yours for truth, JOSEPH M. A. RICKNER.

YPSILANTI, MICH., Nov. 2, 1881.

MR. BENNETT, My very necessary friend absent and still receeding: Your letters from abroad add value to the best independent paper on this planet. Nothing abates from the life and interest of THE TRUTH SEEKER with the manager, or I might say your right-bower, yea, and your left-bower also, in charge.

If you find a greenback hereinclosed, please send your paper to Farmer Green (a new man received on probation and who perhaps will come into full communion); for the balance of said greenback please send to me "Exeter Hall," a romance by Wm. McDonnell. Yours sincerely, JOHN W. BABBITT, M. D.

HARRISBURG, OR., Oct. 22, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I renew my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I expect my time is nearly out, and send you another subscriber. I scatter my TRUTH SEEKERS around among my neighbors. Some of them like the paper but do not send for it. It is rather had to giv up the Bible stories they hav been used to all their lives. I will send you $6, and wish you great success in editing THE TRUTH SEEKER while Mr. Bennett is gone. Yours affectionately, HORACE LANE.

BEACH CITY, O., Nov. 3, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will please find draft for $3 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year. I hardly think Mother Shipton's prophecy will come true in reference to the world's coming to an end. I think she will make a failure of it the same as all old Bible prophets did when they made a definit shot, especially at the world's destruction. I don't see why they should miss, the mark is surely big enough. The only way to prophesy successfully is to do it by random, then it will hit something by guess. Yours truly, M. SHISLER.

CARISBROOK, NEB., Nov. 1, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me a few of those posters and I will do what I can to help extend the circulation of the best paper ever published. Liberalism is gaining ground rapidly here.

Yours truly, J. A. COFFMAN.

HART, MICH., Nov. 1, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: According to the date on the wrapper of my paper the time is out the first of January next, and there is no use of my waiting until then to find out if I want to renew for the year of 1882, for that is a settled fact now, and please find money order to that effect, and when the life of that Guiteau fellow who shot the President comes out in book form, I want it. We want to know all about his Christian career, and to how many different denominations he belongs, and all about it, etc. The orthodox here say he was a Mormon, and that the Mormons ought to be put down, etc., but it is laughable to see how mum some are, and how other Christians try to smooth it over on the plea of insanity. I think they are all insane.

Yours for truth, justice, and common sense,

CHAS. V. WARREN.

MENOMONEE, WIS., Nov. 3, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: You will please excuse me for not remitting to you before. I lost my receipt for the money I sent you to pay for for TRUTH SEEKER. Inclosed I send $1.50, the balance due you for one year's subscription. Do not fail to send the paper regularly, for I would as soon go with but two meals a day as be without the paper.

Respectfully, R. E. LOOMIS.

BEAVER DAM, WIS., Nov. 4, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: The tab on my paper tells me it is time to renew. I hav got to break up housekeeping or take THE TRUTH SEEKER, so not being ready to break up housekeeping, I must hav the paper, having read it for years. I expect to continue to read it to the end, as I am now sixty-four years old and badly bunged up with inflammatory rheumatism. I find the paper an agreeable companion. Those letters from Mr. Bennett are very interesting, and if I had not sent in my "V" for the books of travel I certainly should do so now. You will find inclosed $5—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and $2 for three pictures, Bennett, Ingersoll, and Paine.

Yours truly, H. E. DAVIS.

PORTLAND, ME.

MR. EDITOR: Jacob W. Davies, aged 20, died at Joliet, Ill., Oct. 26th, of typhoid fever, at the house of his father, Wm. J. Davies, of the Rolling Mill, Portland, Me. The diploma of the young man was hanging on the wall at the time, it being a diploma from the Portland Business College. The glass of this diploma suddenly and spontaneously cracked in two at the moment of the death. The crack was the shape of a rainbow inverted, reaching from the top corner of the left to that of the right, while the middle passed exactly across the name of the deceased.

DR. J. DAVIES.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Nov. 12, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to ask a few simple questions for Mr. T. B. Wakeman to answer. What does he mean by the term "universal?" He uses it frequently; I note only one instance: In your issue of October 22d, page 675, first column, he speaks of the "uniform, univrsal, and inherited experience of mankind." If no "universe," then no derivativ from it, of course, no "universal."

"That the world was then discovered and declared to be a cosmos but not a universe." In the same number of your paper, and I think in every number lately, you speak of "Around-the-World" fund and of "the Round-the-World Journey which Mr. Bennett is now engaged in making." Had you better not modify your language a little in accordance with Mr. Wakeman's "new gospel?" According to his reasoning, around the world would mean around the "solar system"—too big an undertaking for even Mr. Bennett.

Near the bottom of the third column I read that "the space beyond the universe could only be thought of as infinit." How can that part of space which is beyond the universe, or beyond anything, be infinit? It must be finited on the part adjoining the universe, or "the world," as Mr. Wakeman puts it, and consequently cannot be infinit. A few lines further on he says, "There cannot be two infinits." How is that? There is infinit space or "infinity" of space, and infinit or infinity of time, and time and space are not one, surely. In the same issue the author speaks of the "nowhere of infinity." I do not know whether he means here that "nowhere" is infinit, or really what he does mean; I would like to hav him explain. And, then, just above he speaks of "Bruno, the proclaimer of infinit space and infinit worlds." But hold, good friend, "World," you contend, includes the whole, reaching even beyond the solar system. How, then, can there be an "infinity" of worlds in addition to infinit space. These are only a few of the "points." will notice more anon. INQUIRER.

[We leave his for Mr. Wakeman to elucidate. As for ourselvs we sh ll still stick to the "Around-the-World" Jou ney, and hope to add a good many more V's to the fund. If Mr. Bennett should conclude to go around the solar system, we must hav much longer list than now.—ED. T. S.]

LANCASTER, TEX., Nov. 8, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed find post-office order for $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1881. It should hav been sent before now, but the good (?) book says that the eleventh-hour man fares as well as any, so I suppose I am all right. The greatest misfortune is that Liberals are poor. I am glad to see the star is affixed to the names of so many of the donors to the Round-the-World Trip, and I think the reason it is not to all the names is that they hav died since making the pledge. The Lone Star state seems to be behind in the cause of Liberalism, but there is plenty of the right kind of material here if it was only worked up. If you will send me a few of those posters I will find places to stick them up. Wishing the old hero a safe trip around this little ball, I am, Yours respectfully, J. S. HATTER.

AYER, MASS., Nov. 8. 1881.

EDITOR OF TRUTH SEEKER: I hav been reading the "Life of President Garfield," written by a clergyman, and it has too much clerical color and shading. In his debate with Prof. Denton he showed his great ability as a powerful defender and champion of any cause he undertook, and it was no less a display of his early teaching and collegiate education which led him to defend the Bible and the Christian faith. But his biographer may try in vain to convince intelligent, thinking people that such a large-hearted soul can be crowded into sectarian bands. Had he been the pupil of Denton he would hav been the able advocate of science and reason instead of church dogmas and the mythical writings called the "word of God," which the priesthood hav lately taken the liberty and assumed authority to revise and scratch with as much nonchalance as a voter would a ballot.

With the thoroughness with which President Garfield investigated whatever he undertook, he would hav broken every sectarian band and stood with the Liberals and Freethinkers of to-day, as he has by his acts indorsed the political principles of Thomas Paine, which made it hopeful for such as he to be made President of the United States, but of whose rare services a professed Christian deprived us. Is there a history of Garfield whose biographer is a man who will giv us facts without clerical shading?

Yours for even justice, ELIJAH MYRICK.

ASHLAND, MICH., Oct. 29, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: We hav got a new crop of preachers here this fall, and religion is on the raise. If you will be so kind as to send me THE TRUTH SEEKER and that little book called "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," I will be very much obliged. You will find inclosed seventy-five cents to pay for the same.

Yours very truly, M. F. THAYER.

ROCKFORD, ILL., Nov. 2, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Oblige me with a copy of the paper of Oct. 29, 1881, as the copy sent me met with a calamity which has ruined it. Through the kindness of a friend who was about dying, I was furnished with a complete file of THE TRUTH SEEKER from its birth, and as I am carefully preserving each number for binding I must hav the one above described. I consider THE TRUTH SEEKER files the most valuable library now in reach of the genuin inquirer after the truth. I hope all your subscribers are taking pains to preserve their numbers for binding.

Very truly, G. W. BROWN, M. D.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, Oct. 30, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Each week the dear old sheet comes laden with choice thoughts. Mr. Bennett's letters of travel are highly entertaining. T. B. Wakeman's lectures and essays are always replete with choice thought. Miss Susan Wixon on the "Social Status of Liberalism" is timely and apropos. Yes, we need social intercourse—the friendly greetings, the warm hand-clasps, and genial faces from which the soul radiates love and friendship. Let us be grandly human, daring to do the right and be true.

This glorious day I visited Wade's Park and the beautiful Lake View cemetery. Oh, it is grandly beautiful both by nature and skilled art. We alighted from our coupe, paused at the entrance of Scofield's new vault to gaze upon the beautiful casket which contains all that remains mortal of the good Garfield. Beautiful flowers guard the entrance within and a soldier guards without. The funeral car is stationed on the declivity of the mound where his monument and crypt are to be erected. Please send my paper to Elkland, Pa., as we are to leave this beautiful city for our country home. Ever for the right, GRACE L. PARKHURST.

SOUTH DARTMOUTH, MASS,, Oct. 30, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I think that W. J. Dean, of Joseph, Or., in his communication of Oct. 5th, has touched a very important subject. And as at the close of his communication he invites others to express their opinion, I will write a little, with your permission.

There is no mistake that a very large per cent of our school literature is tinctured with theological expressions. I hav myself overhauled some of the text-books which are in daily use, and what I hav seen is on a par with what Mr. Dean announces as the result of his investigation of sundry day school books. It does seem that there is a concerted and systematic effort on the part of those who compile our school books to inject just as much theology as they can, so as to giv the youthful mind an impetus toward the dogmas and doctrins of priestcraft and superstition. And in view of all this, taking everything into consideration, I agree with your correspondent from Joseph, Or., that it would be an incalculable benefit (an antidote against the theological poison which is being so persistently and perseveringly injected into our school literature) if all such writers as James Parton, Prof. William Denton, and Susan H. Wixon would compile a system of school books which would be free from the objectionable features which pervade the text-books employed in our schools. Not content with foisting the Bible on our schools, the devotees of superstition are also doing all they can to inoculate our school literature with their theological views. I hav thus endeavored to giv somewhat hastily my views on this important topic, and, like Mr. Dean, would also invite others to do likewise. Let us hear from Susan H. Wixon, Elmina Drake Slenker, and as many others as may find it convenient to respond. This is really a very important matter, and I for one thank Mr. Dean for alluding to it. Truly yours, EDWIN H. BARTLETT.

PACIFIC, Nov. 9, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I inclose $2 for the lithographs of Pa ne, Bennett, and Ingersoll. Please send them to my address.

I cannot let the opportunity pass to giv you my thought in regard to a criticism on a discourse purporting to be from the spirit of Thomas Paine in THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 8th. You remark: "It is no more like the clear, incisiv, convincing language of the words that we know of Thomas Paine than white is like black"—no, than black is like white. You think if he did write it he has lost a good deal of his nativ common sense somewhere between here and the next world. Now I would like to ask you, or any one of your way and manner of reasoning, if he has not—if any man that dies does not lose a good deal? Will I answer my own question to you? Has he not lost all his object—his "external" correlate, eh? Is reason object or is it subject? What is the "I?" Is one, the body, it, or is one of it? If one is of it, that is, the I, the mind, that which one knows of life, of object, being, then what can he say and do without it? Please state the how and con so. There is no logic in such reasoning as Materialists advance in regard to spirit. One might as well demand of a man without legs to walk—a man without arms to perform the same acts as perfect as those who hav them, than to ask a disembodied spirit to speak the same as when he had his total correlate. It is too absurd to think—to ask—it.

Are you not aware how little man knows of the laws of the whys and wherefores of his organized body? How, then, can he assume, control an organ that is not even his own—that is the life and cause of an other? How, where is your scientific cause order, I would like to know? Motiv being is of objectiv condition—is above it, and consequently cannot be proved it. If it takes twice two to make four, and the state of four cannot be contained in two, no more can the spirit be demonstrated as such in the object as such. If this is insane writing, please tell.

Yours, A. H. KRUGER.

DES MOINES, IOWA, Nov. 5, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: D. M. Bennett's letters from Around-the-World Trip are such real pictures of the characters of men, places, and things that they need only to be known in order to be immensely admired. No matter what companion Mr. Bennett falls in with, if the bare-footed, bare-legged real Colleen Bawn, or the refined and talented Mrs. e sant, he is the same "plisant gintleman." I hope that he will make many and extended lateral excursions on his journey, even if it will consume some time. My opinion is that Mr. Bennett never was more interesting or better employed than at the present time. His record will undoubtedly be a valuable production. The more his letters are read the more the book will be sought. Let Liberals giv THE TRUTH SEEKER an airing.

Inclosed is a post-office order for $7—$3 to place to my subscription account, and $3 to send the paper for one year to L. T. Womacks; addre Waukee, Dallas county, Iowa, and for the other dollar please send to me the "History of the Council of Nice, A.D., 825."

Yours truly, A. CLEGG.

Can God Find His Equal?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I notice the following query going the rounds of the press: "What is it that God never saw, Washington seldom saw, and we see every day?" The query is answered by asking if God ever saw his equal. "With God all things are possible" (Matt. xix, 26, and Mark x, 27). Therefore, if God never saw his equal, it is possible for him to see it. It is possible for him to make "two hills without a valley between them," and to make a "four-year colt in a minute," and to make matter without force, or force without matter. Let us swallow the whole while we are so inconsistent. Let us hear through your columns from some of the knowing and posted ones. POND.

A Note from Col. Kelso.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: My last letter was written from Idaho Springs, Col., some five months ago. In that letter I promised to giv your readers an account of my future wanderings, adventures, observations, etc. For the next three months I wandered among the indescribably grand scenes of the great mountains of that state, and had many thrilling adventures. I wrote a full account of these wanderings, adventures, etc. This account, however, made a book—and a very interesting book, too, myself being judge—and not a mere letter that could find room in your already crowded columns. I could not ask you to publish it as it was, and to condense it would spoil it. Hence my promis to your readers has not been, and probably never will be, fulfilled.

I lectured in several of the cities and towns in Colarado, my lectures everywhere exciting a good deal of enthusiasm among the Liberals, who are quite numerous, and striking terror into the ranks of the legions of bigotry, superstition, and priestcraft. About the middle of September I came on to eastern Kansas, where Liberalism is quite strong, and where I delivered several successful lectures. I then came on to Chicago and attended the National Liberal League Congress that met there on the 30th of September. After the close of the Congress I delivered a series of lectures in Union Park Hall to small but very appreciativ audiences. I then came on to this great and wicked city to secure the publication of some Liberal writings, "Deity Analyzed" and "The Devil's Defense," upon which I hav spent several years of faithful labor. This business being now nearly accomplished, I will soon be able to devote my whole time, and whatever talent I may possess, to the duties of the lecture field.

On the evening of the 25th of this month I am to lecture before the Manhattan Liberal Club, in Science Hall. After that I will be ready to go anywhere that I may hav a call, even to the North Pole. I am earnest in this work, and hope that I shall hav calls enough to occupy all my time. (You see I am getting in a free advertisment here, but it is for the good of the cause and is the only kind that I am now able to put in.) I would like to hav calls even from small country villages that are rarely if ever visited by other Liberal lecturers. Even if the Liberals of such places can promis me nothing more than the actual expense of reaching them and of stopping among them, let them not hesitate to call me. If that is the best thing they can do they shall hav my services any way. I wish to become acquainted with the Liberals and with the condition of Liberalism everywhere. Address for the present care of TRUTH SEEKER. Yours truly, JOHN R. KELSO.

Hell.

I said that hell had not then been invented.
We hav the advantage over Bible times.
They burned or hacked the body, well contented
When death ensued; but when we've racked the limbs
Or burned and buried those who hav dissented,
Or won't conform to our religious whims,
We hav the satisfaction of discerning,
With eye of faith, their hell forever burning.

It would be joy to Jacob could he look
And see his brother Esau writhe in hell,
Or Elisha see the boys the bruins shook
As a dog shakes a rat, all roasting well:
Or David, paired with Mrs. U., who took
A bath one evening, seeing him who fell
In battle by his act, show her Uriah,
Who feels that God is a consuming fire.

In this we hav the advantage. John'than E.,
Who wrote the famous treatis on the Will,
Can look from heaven's battlements and see
A delicate cinder that, on earth, was El,
Or Ellery Channing, who maintained that three
Were three times one, not one, and now in hell
Gets his deserts. And gentle John'than E.
Harps louder on his harp to the blest trinity.

And J. Iscariot Cook, who once applied
The microscope to Mary, and explained
The mystery of the birth of him who died
On Calvary: that she was not impregned
By power the highest; and old Gabriel lied
Or was mistaken; and that Mary feigned,
Or was deceived, when she broke forth in song,
Exultant that her offspring was the long

Foretold messiah, through whose marvellous birth
All nations and all peoples should be blest,
And she should be proclaimed throughout the earth
Happy above all mothers. Cook expressed,
Without the slightest tendency to mirth,
Among his hearers, who all seemed impressed
With its importance, his belief that Jes-
Jesus was born as drones among the bees.

'Twas partheno-genesis and nothing more,
So said the latest science. Then he quoted
Jaw-breaking German gutturals—a score
Of men to physiology devoted;
And said the person we'd been taught t' adore
As the original Grecian word denoted,
Was a subsistence, not a person: three
Subsistences, not persons, were the trinity,

Which was a substance. Now, I cannot see
How substance, which himself was nought
And could do nought, when multiplied by three
Became the infinit God, transcending thought:
How three noughts added made infinity;
How this subsistence lived on earth and taught
And walked about and ate and drank and died;
Died like a man—nay, like a thief, was crucified.

Still he is confident, this Joseph C.,
That in some future state, some post-existence,
Translated into heaven, he will see,
While sitting, cheek by jowl, with the second subsistence,
The devil, aided by a score of assistants.
Heaping the coals around poor Theodore P.,
While P., like Lazarus's friend, begs Joe for water,
And Joe will see him damned first, as he oughter.

Provided always Joe can find some screen
To hang between his past and God almighty,
So that the damning record can't be seen,
The black and hideous record suæ vitæ,
He hinted at, when lecturing yestreen,
In the "old South," when Standing Bear and Bright-eye
And ghosts, as thick as leaves in Vallambrosa,
"Declared" he must hav been damned fast, this Joe, sir.

Proviso 2, that Joseph is sustained
In his queer notions of the trinity,
By this triune; for Joseph would be pained
Should it turn out that the divinity
Is not a triplet; and that he impregned
Miss M., and, proud of his paternity,
Resents the insult that the heir to the throne
Is not one whit superior to a drone.

But Joseph's dumb; that is, upon this theme.
He's dropped the subject—never mentions it.
He knocked the keystone out from the grand scheme;
The brethren were disgusted with it, quite.
The clergy thought him upon this point lame.
'Twoul bring upon the sect a perfect blight.
Jesus no father? God no son? What next?
Then all religion was but a pretext.

—Simeon Palmer.

Believe or Be Damned.

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

The holy clergy of our land
Would fain hav all men understand
That inspiration takes the lead
And does all reason supersede,
That into men faith must be crammed—
Believe in ghosts or else be damned.

The way to hades they unfold,
And brimstone tales are by them told,
Which none must question or deny;
'Tis Bible truth, it cannot lie,
So down our throats it must be rammed—
Believe it all or else be damned.

When wise men study nature's laws,
Without intent to hurt God's cause,
And bring out facts that creeds oppose,
The clergy then declare them foes;
They raise the cry, their wisdom's shammed,
Believe them not or you'll be damned.

'Tis said that Joshua stopped the sun
More time to get some butchering done;
Priests swear 'tis true—don't question why,
But men of science nail this lie;
Their zeal for truth cannot be calmed
By threats if not they will be damned.

There is that other fishy tale
About old Jonah and the whale;
The story of creation, too,
Which science proves cannot be true;
To dodge it priests hav hawed and hemmed,
Oh, reason not or you'll be damned.

Ye who to reason are not deaf
Tell where the sin's in unbelief.
Belief no man can well control
Without some facts to save his soul.
That black is white cannot be jammed
Into mankind, though they are damned.

'Tis acts, not faith, that make the man.
Believe some creeds some never can,
Nor those who slander unknown gods;
But truth's their star, no stupid frauds.
Though hell-fire right and left is slammed,
They rest assured there'll none be damned.

WHAT OBJECTIONS TO CHRISTIANITY THE Bennett-Mair Discussion.

BETWEEN

D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.

(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5 The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founded upon the doctrin and authority of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progress and improvement.

8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which mankind are capable of receiving.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT. Trade Mark. Patented.

A Dose of

Tarrant's Seltzer Aperient

Has removed the agony of rheumatism, and its continued use entirely healed the patient. Rheumatism is but little understood. Some empirics resort to embrocations, which are really dangerous. It is now acknowledged to be a blood disease resulting from acidity. This aperient corrects all such acidity, and thus cures the disease. All rheumatic sufferers are advised to try it.

Sixteen Saviors or None.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

Being a reply to John T. Perry's "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examins all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other, and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and themselvs, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. SCHOOL OF STENOGRAPHY.

THE PHONOGRAPH

Is a machine for writing shorthand. It is simplicity itself. Is very easily learned. Easily operated with all the fingers. Its writing is more legible and accurate than any other system of shorthand. The writing of one operator can be readily read by another. Ordinary shorthand requires the verbatim reporter to commit to memory hundreds of contractions and word-signs. Operators of the Stenograph use less than one hundred contractions. The letters are represented by dots and spaces—nothing else. To fit persons for shorthand clerks only half the time required to learn the best phonography. Six hundred letters per minute can easily be made, which is more than sufficient to equal the speed of the most rapid reporters.

Competent assistants in every store, private dressing and consulting rooms, and every convenience with female attendants for ladies. All our garments are the same, no matter at what depot they may be purchased.

IMPORTANT TO INVALIDS WHO HAV BEEN TREATED BY MEDICAL MEN AND STILL CONTINUE TO BE DISEASED.

I am happy to say there is a lasting hope for you. The system of which I am the inventor will do more for you than all the drugs in America. It cannot be gainsayed that more die of drugs than from disease. The present system of medicin is a mistake and must soon giv way to more rational means. Thousands of persons in Brooklyn and New York are ready to testify that my "WILSONIA GARMENTS" cured them after the most skilful drug treatment had failed. Medicin in acute forms of disease of recent origin, may be of benefit, and in case of accident it is quite right to use every possible palliativ; even poison, that in large doses would kill, may in suchcases of sudden disease, if used with proper caution, be found of great value; but in all chronic diseases such as paralysis, rheumatism, anchylosis, asthma, bronchitis, heart disease, gout, varicose veins, catarrh, spinal disease, locomoter ataxia, and many other forms of a chronic character must forever defy the power of drugs.

The history of medicin is one that, if read with care would strike terror into the minds of every thoughtful reader. Themost scientific writers of the past and present hav all denounced the practice of medicin as mere experiment, and the thousands who die under medical treatment only too truly tell the melancholy fact. The infant is wrested from its mother's breast; the bride of yesterday the corpse of to-morrow; the laughing boy, the romping girl, the loved and noble husband, the aged parents, all and each in turn are daily hurried to their end by the errors of drug treatment; and yet the people go on from decade to decade without ever making inquiry as to the cause of such a state of things.

I hav now, after sixteen months' residence in Brooklyn, proved that medicin is not only not needed, but that every form of chronic disease hav one common source or cause, and that the same means that will cure gout will cure cancer; the same that will cure paralysis will cure catarrh; the same that will stay bleeding of the lung will cure anchylosis. This very astounding statement must must strike terror into the minds of our regulars, who pride themselvs so much on their acumen and pretenses of diagnosis. These men only too frequently declare a lung to be diseased when that lung is in perrect condition. Then how often is it declared that the heart is enlarged or fat, or its valves indurated, or some other such wild statement, only to frighten the poor victim into an ever-changing course of medicin—mercury to-day, chloral hydrate to-morrow, belladonna next day, and so on, week by week, year by year, until the poor patient becomes a walking drug store, and then dropping into an early grave.

Now, to obviate all this diagnostic nonsense, I hav come to the rescue of these poor invalids, and tell them plainly that there is but one cause for disease, and consequently one means of cure.

ONE DISEASE! ONE CURE!

The fact being that there is but one disease, no matter what form it may take, and it is only by and through the quackery of the schools of medicin that diseases and their cure hav been so multiplied, we now know the want of nervous force precedes a languid circulation or the want or equilibrium in the circulatory system; in a word, the blood is the life, and electricity the equalizer of all our forces, so that if we can by any means infuse magnetism into the human organism soothingly and gently we shall thereby attain to a natural state of existence and death shall only be the result of nature's inevitable law, instead of the early deaths amid racking pains, superinduced by the introduction of poisonous drugs and quack nostrums dispensed indiscriminately by empirics and the schoolmen of our colleges, but amid all this there is a hope for every invalid, and that hope is centered on nature's universal remedy—magnetism.

Before window glass was invented the only lighting media for our houses in the daytime were holes in the structure for the poor, or frame work of horn for the rich. The man who invented glass did not invent light, but only a medium by which it might be transferred. Just so with the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC BELT. WM. WILSON did not invent magnetism, but only a means whereby it may be accumulated and transfused through the animal economy of man.

WM. WILSON pretends to no secret as in quack nostrums, but freely and proudly discloses to every one the principles of his invention, so that all ingenius persons may for themselvs construct their own Magnetic Belts, the only question being whether they would waste their time and money instead of purchasing the appliances made by the aid of valuable machinery and constructed on scientific principles. I know only too well that the doctors will try to crush me for having dared to teach them their business. This some of them hav already done, first by inducing the internal revenue officers to place a tax on my garments; failing in this, I hav fought the government and won my case (although at the cost of three thousand dollars), yet I won in opposition to these doctors. But another move must be made thought they. A happy thought. Let us go to Anthony Comstock, get him to write a letter to a large number of persons given as reference, pretend the certincates of WILSON are false, malign him in a circular letter, break the people's confidence in his goods, and thus we can close him up. Well done, says doctor number two, and the thing was done. Comstock was imposed upon, as I hav now every reason to believe, in fact from the first I thought such was the case, and so wrote to Comstock the following letter asking for the names of the persons who had thus given him the information, but those persons being doctors Anthony Comstock dare not disclose their names; it was left to me to ferret that out, which I hav done, and confronted several of them, two of them who went to the fore, and others who acted as stool pigeons in the matter.

Here is the letter I wrote to Anthony Comstock:

WILLIAM WILSON'S LETTER TO COMSTOCK.

465 FULTON ST., BROOKLYN, Sept. 13, 1881.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:

DEAR SIR—I was surprised this morning to find in my consulting rooms many of my former patients, each bringing me a circular letter received from you, a copy of which is inclosed herewith. With this each handed me a copy of their replies to you. You hav evidently been imposed upon. I would take it as a favor if you would giv me the names of the informants to whom you refer. They are amenable to prosecution, and it may become my duty to institute proceedings against them. It will giv me pleasure to afford you convincing proof of my position, and of the nature and benefit of my appliances as a curativ agent. I believe my services in this reepect will be found to be such as to commend me to universal approval as a public benefactor. Mention is made in your letter in reference to my name. Allow me to refer you to the Brooklyn directory, where you will find an advertisment of mine and my name and address in full.

I hav inclosed one of my blank checks (not for use). You will see my name printed on the end. As to my having been a cabinetmaker, upon that fact I build my glory, in not only having earned an honest livelihood, but to hav won the respect of all honest men with whom I hav come in contact, until to-day I stand in the proud position as the inventor of a system destined to overthrow the pernicious practice of drugging humanity. I understand fully the penalties I hav to bear for having dared to teach medical men their business. Do you not know that all great inventions and improvements ever emanate from persons whose walks in life hav been totally distinct from that in which such inventions were likely to spring? My discovery of the real nature of nerve fluid and blood composition must revolutionize the practice of medicin. That being the case, hav I not cause to be proud of once having been a cabinetmaker? If a rail splitter may become a President, and our now President not being ashamed of having once conducted a barge, why should William Wilson be ashamed of having been a cabinetmaker?

Hoping that you may pay a visit to my establishment, and there see for yourself the result of my labor, I remain,
Respectfully yours, WILLIAM WILSON.

P. S.—I intend to publish all letters sent to me, being copies of those sent to you, and will take it a favor if you will forward all letters sent you FOR or AGAINST me. The following paragraph, cut from one of my advertisments, may be of interest to you:

My difficulty is that many persons will become rotten with disease, will swallow medicin enough to float a steamship, and rub in liniments and ointments enough to tan the skin till it becomes like the sail of a ship; and then, hearing of my marvelous cures, will expect, on putting on my goods, to jump into new life in two or three months. This, in most cases, is an impossibility, and persons governed by such expectations had better not waste their time or my own in calling upon me.

With respect to the names given below, a few words of explanation should be given. I hav not studied cases to suit my purpose, but hav taken each one seriatim, not knowing or caring what report may be supplied on application to the persons therein named, knowing full well that to wear the WILSONIA is to obtain perfect health, although in some cases it may take as many weeks to effect a change as it does hours in other cases. But it never has failed, and never can, when the instructions given are followed out.

Now, citizens, read the letters sent to Anthony Comstock in answer to the libelous letter; say, then, am I not cruelly injured by Anthony Comstock? Why did he not make inquiry before he wrote such a letter? I will giv to any one $5,000 for one case where I hav ever deceived a single person. I always, in my pamphlets, tell persons what are my proportions of cures, and giv the names of persons who wear my goods, not caring what the persons say whom others may apply to.

READ THE FOLLOWING DESCRIPTION OF THE "WILSONIA" GARMENTS.

Electricity as a curativ agent has long been recognized by the faculty. In fact, from the time of Galen, through every decade, this marvelous agent has attracted the attention of all thinking men; but thinking and acting are distinct characteristics; therefore, while thousands of medical men hav decided that electricity was the one thing needed as a direct means of cure, yet the bigotry of the schools of medicin has ever prevented the introduction of anything that did not correspond with the preconceived notions of those who gloried in the names of professors, but in such pride of position dared not relinquish their glory. And thus it is that thousands hav been compelled to swallow the abominations of our drug stores through hundreds of years, and hav as a result, gone to an early grave. The methods by which electricity has been applied are numbered by the thousand—batteries of various kinds, electric machines, electric belts, electric disks, electric garters, electric rings, electric medals. Then we hav had magnetic belts in dozens of designs, all intended to produce and maintain a current of magnetism in the blood, by which process alone can the blood be continued in a perfect state of circulation. All these appliances do possess valuable properties, but the great trouble ever present was the want of continuity on the one hand, and an absence of perfect ventilation on the other. Not only so, but yet another want in all these was a means to keep back the electricity of the body so that by a conservation of forces we could use over and over again the waste nerve force which would be otherwise thrown out into the atmosphere. This I hav succeeded in doing by encasing my garments with an impervious tissue such as oil silk, gutta percha, or any other non-conductor of electricity, but by preference I use gutta percha as the best non-conductor known; also that any two pieces of metal of different molecular construction must of necessity, when brought in contact where heat and moisture can ramify between them, such impact of metals must produce an electro-galvanic action. This I hav done in a variety of ways. By my first patent I used disks of copper and zinc attached to the magnets, and next I placed ribbons of copper and zinc with chemical calico between them to absorb the moisture of the body, but after many trials I hav proved my present method the most effectual means ever adopted by mankind in any part of the world for the production of continuous magnetic action.

Therefore, I am in a position to say that never in the history of the world has such a perfect magnetic garment been produced, embracing the following requisits:

First—Non-contact with the skin.
Second—Constancy of current unimpeded.
Third—Capability of being washed and cleansed.
Fourth—Perfect ventilation, whereby the moist vapors of the body are ever eliminated.

This is a most important point, and upon which I feel the greatest possible pride, it being the desideratum in all magnetic body wear, and the methods by which these effects are produced are simplicity itself, at the same time evolving a galvanic current, by the impact of dissimilar metals forming the ventilating openings.

NOTE.—The above points should be studied by every physician, and then, compared with all that has gone before, it will be found to be the most perfect arrangement in the world, as the following testimonials will prove, and be it remembered that these testimonials were sent to the government spy, ANTHONY COMSTOCK, who was stupid enough to doubt the value of my invention.

2 ST. FELIX ST., BROOKLYN, Sept. 13, 1881.

A. COMSTOCK,

DEAR SIR: Yours just received, contents noted. In reply will say I know nothing of Mr. Wilson's antecedents, hav never inquired about them. His garments were spoken of to me last winter, when my adopted daughter was suffering from a complication of diseases, who had been sick two years and more. Had been under the care of Dr. Smith, of Brooklyn, who said, after attending her for months, that it was a very bad case, and she constantly grew worse. I called on Mr. Wilson, saw his goods, heard his testimony, took the garments home with me, and my daughter put them on. She has experienced great relief. Has just returned from the country, where she has spent several weeks. She still wears the garments, and would not be willing to leave them off for a day. She is not cured yet. Don't know as she ever will be, but that she is greatly benefited I am sure. No one would hesitate to say, who saw her then and now, it must be the garments that did her good, for she took no medicin after putting them on. I hav a set of the garments myself. I would not part with them if I could not replace them. My little granddaughter, who was always troubled with a cough in winter, and had catarrh very bad more than ever last winter, has had no cough or catarrh since. I do not believe Mr. Wilson an impostor, but believe his invention has been a blessing to hundreds of suffering people. Yours respectfully, MARTHA MOXSON.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:

SIR—Yours of late date received. I furnished Mr. William Wilson with a certificate of my case. After wearing his Magnetic Clothing for five months, and being nearly cured of a loathsome catarrh of lifetime standing, with its wretched train of consequences, dyspepsia, heartburn, etc. Numbers of my friends, people of intelligence, hav been equally benefited, and, if called upon, will bear testimony to the "WILSONIA." As to the antecedents of William C. Wilson, I know from Mr. Wilson that he has been in New York heretofore. I hav repeatedly heard him refuse to be called professor or doctor, but insists upon "William Wilson, House Carpenter." Your most direct means of information would be to call at Mr. Wilson's place of business. His rooms and factory are always open to the public for inspection, and the most critical scrutiny is invited. E. S. CHIPMAN.

BROOKLYN, September 13, 1881.

MR. COMSTOCK:

DEAR SIR—Your note came at hand in reference to the "WILSONIA." In answer to you I may state I hav been suffering for years with bleeding to the nose and other troubles, such as weakness and general debility, etc. I called on Mr. Wilson last summer, and stated my case to him. He put some of his belts on, and, contrary to my expectation, I began to feel relief, and am now a well man, which was a great surprise to me, after having tried every remedy that I could get hold of. As far as being swindled by him, I consider he has been my benefactor, as far as restoring me to health.

I cheerfully gave him my name, hoping that it would do some poor mortal placed in the same condition I was some good. Respectfully, E. NILSON,
413 Bridge street.

September 13, 1881.

MR. A. COMSTOCK:

DEAR SIR—Your letter addressed to my wife has been handed to me by her for answer. I would inform you that Mr. Wilson has had the full and free consent of myself and wife to use her name as reference.

Mrs. Robb has suffered for a great many years from neuralgia (eighteen years). On April last, when very low, I obtained the "WILSONIA," and from the first moment of putting them on she experienced great benefit, and every day gains strength; so much so is this the case, she is now able to go out and enjoy life, something she has been unable to do for years previous. Hoping this will satisfy your scruples regarding the "WILSONIA,"
I remain yours respectfully, R. ROBB.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:

SIR—Your letter, dated the 10th inst., received. In reply I would say that I hav received all the benefit claimed by the "WILSONIA." Mr. Wilson has used my name with my knowledge and conseut, and he has not exaggerated any statement made by me. I know nothing in regard to Mr. Wilson's pedigree, but I know this much, that the "WILSONIA" Magnetic Clothing has done for me what medicin could not do. I am now enjoying better health than I hav been since the war, and I owe it all to the wearing of the "WILSONIA" Magnetic Clothing.
Respectfully yours, etc., JOEL E. CANNON.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your communication respecting the "WILSONIA," I hav to state that I know that my name appeared in the different papers, that I hav been a sufferer from nervous prostration for years, and I hav worn the garments prescribed by Mr. Wilson with great benefit without the use of a particle of medicin. I was confined to my room with my eyes for three months, suffering from Ophthalmic Catarrh. I am now able to be out in the open air. They are getting stronger every day.

MR. A. COMSTOCK:

SIR—In answer to your communication of yesterday I take pleasure in informing you that the certificate which I gave to Mr William Wilson was true in every particular, and from my present knowledge I can fully recommend his WILSONIA to any person suffering from the complaint with which I was afflicted, namely, hemorrhage of the lungs. Yours, etc., MICHAEL MARRION,

MR. COMSTOCK:

Yours received to-day at hand about Wilson Garments. There was a time when I had no faith in them, but when I came to put them on the Goods did me so much good I can't but speak well of them. They hav been a great blessing to many others I know. A great many of my friends hav been greatly blessed by having these Garments, and to-day they thank God there are such Garments. I suppose I hav had two hundred persons call to see me about these things.

I can't say too much about them. I am doing business on Fulton street, and hav been for twenty-eight years.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:

DEAR SIR—In answer to your favor of September 10th relativ to Mr. Wilson, I beg leave to state that Mr. Wilson was introduced to me by a Mr. Berwin a year ago last April, Mr. Berwin informing me that Mr. Wilson was the inventor of certain Magnetic Clothing which he (Berwin) knew to be all that Mr. Wilson represented them to be. Having suffered very much from a rheumatic and nervous affection in my left foot, I was induced, through the persuasion of Mr. Berwin, to wear the WILSONIA SOLES. After putting them on I experienced immediate relief, and consider myself entirely well from wearing them, and gave Mr. Wilson permission to use my name as reference. Regarding Mr. Wilson's antecedents I know nothing, and care less, so long as poor humanity is benefited through him. Many of my acquaintances hav worn the WILSONIA, and speak in the most flattering terms about them. I hav always found Mr. Wilson a gentleman of sterling integrity, and hav known him to assist the poor and afflicted in goods and money.
Yours very respectfully, BENJAMIN LEWIS.

DEAR SIR—Yours of 10th received. In reply will merely state that, as regards W. C. Wilson and his Garments, I will say that I used them and found them to be a great benefit—in fact a cure. I was afflicted with rheumatism so badly that I could not move. After applying his goods I found relief immediately. My name was used by my consent, and I will gladly indorse his Garments as a great benefit to all that are afflicted.
Yours respectfully, EDWARD W. FEW.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK:

DEAR SIR—I received a letter from you to-day about the WILSONIA, which you condemn wrongly. I hav been sick for more than two years, and I had fifty-six doctors trying to cure me, without success, and they did not giv me any relief until I put on the WILSONIA, which helped me to work at my trade, and now I am as well as ever. PETER LEHLBACH.

BROOKLYN, September 13, 1881.

DEAR SIR—Yours of September 10th making inquiries concerning the WILSONIA Garments at hand. In reply I hav to say that Mr. Wilson has my consent to refer to me. I still wear a portion of a suit of the WILSONIA Garments, and I believe with good results, having been troubled with dyspepsia and indigestion for many years. In my business relations with Mr. Wilson I hav found him satisfactory. Very respectfully,
J. H. LITTLEFIELD, Artist.

MR. A. COMSTOCK:

I received a letter of inquiry and abuse combined concerning a gentleman of this city (Mr. William Wilson), purporting to hav emanated from you, or at least bearing your signature.

My testimony (to which you allude to and as published in the papers) was given unsolicited by Mr. Wilson, and I hereby reiterate the facts as published over my wife's and own signature. Further. I consider the WILSONIA appliances the marvel of the world as a curativ agency.

As regards the genealogy of Mr. Wilson I am not informed, neither do I care. Suffice to say, I know him to be a gentleman even though four years ago he stood knee deep in shavings behind a carpenter's bench, which, in my opinion, was and is far more preferable and honorable than striving to gain notoriety by defaming the character and ability of a superior, even though he be a poor cabinetmaker. Respectfully, T. DET. TRUAX.

MR. A. COMSTOCK:

I received your letter of inquiry on the WILSONIA Garments yesterday. As to the merit of the goods, I hav found them to be entirely as represented, and I take great pleasure in recommending them to all my friends and acquaintances who are sick and afflicted, knowing, as I do, their real worth. When I bought the goods of Mr. Wilson I did not question who his father or mother were, or what his business was some yeurs ago, but I did ask about the goods, and that proving satisfactory, I bought them. However, I hav heard Mr. Wilson refer with pride to his being a mechanic working at the bench a few years ago. His name you will find to your satisfaction. William Cotter Wilson, in the directory. I am very truly yours.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK:

DEAR SIR—Your note of inqury of the 10th duly received. Contents noted. In reply, most respectfully say, I hav no knowedge of Mr. Wilson's antecedents whatever, nor do I think it matters so far as I am concerned. But of the appliance known as the WILSONIA I do know something about it from personal and happy experience. For more than nineteen years I had been a sufferer from partial paralysis of my entire left side, and hearing of the WILSONIA I wrote Mr. Wilson to send some one to measure me for a suit. He did so, and in less than ten minutes from the time I had them on my body they produced a feeling that alarmed me. I called Mrs. Mansfield, told her I was feeling strangely, telling her at the same timr I had on one of the WILSONIA garments. Mrs. Mansfield insisted I should take it off. But in that we differed in opiuion. She assisted me to the putting on of my top coat, and I made an attempt to get out into the park opposit my office. I walked two and a half times round the reservoir park without stopping, which for years before I had not walked more thau one-fourth that distance without resting several times. In the evening I walked seven times around the park without resting, and from that time to this I hav been able to walk from two and a half to four miles each day. I am an old man of nearly 70 years, and so supple on my limbs I can jump over my office table or any chair in my house. I know nothing of Mr. Wilson's antecedents, as before stated. I only know he has beeu the instrument of making me a well man, and for that he has my thanks and blessing. Sincerely,
JAS. V. MANSFIELD.

MR. COMSTOCK:

DEAR SIR—Iu reading one of the morning papers I read your letter addressed to Mr. Wm. Wilson, also a large number from people I am personally acquainted with, in reference to the benefit derived by them from wearing the WILSONIA appliances, and would say I know them to be true statements of their cases. I myself am clothed in the goods, as also my wife. We hav both beeu greatly benefited by wearing them, and do not by any meaus consider either Mr. Wilsou or his garments the fraud that you say in your letter as people having represented to you. You hav evidently been imposed upon.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:

SIR—I hold in my hand a note, epistolary, of which the following is a copy:

"607 WARREN ST., BROOKLYN, 9, 15, 1881.

"Professor C. HATCH SMITH:

"MY DEAR FRIEND—I inclose letter from Anthony Comstock, Esq. Please answer the same as you are acquainted with all the facts. Yours truly, CLARIBEL STEVENS."

The facts are as follows:

Mrs. Stevens, to whom your letter is addressed, wears a suit of WILSONIA. Her two living daughters is in heaven), one son, Mr. Theodore Stevens, and a grandson, Mr. E. G. Vail, Jr., each possesses and constantly wears a suit of WILSONIA.

All of these goods hav been purchased upon intimate knowledge of their curativ properties. Perhaps my wonderful cure of paralysis (hemiplnegia) by wearing a suit of WILSONIA may hav influenced these purchases. These parties have received great benefit from wearing the WILSONIA, and they regard Mr. Wm. Wilson, "the carpenter," as a gentleman, a genius, and a man whose simple word is as good as a bond duly executed.

For evidence of my sickness I refer to my esteemed friends, Hon. James Watt, M.D., Doctors Bedell and Hamilton of Brooklyn, and Professor James L. Little, M.D., of New York.

For evident proof of my cure please call and see me. I will show you the dumb doctor WILSONIA that gave me freedom from disease of the heart, softening of the brain, rheumatism in the right hand and forearm, paralysis, and a pulse that intermitted one beat in five or seven or ten or three, etc.

Further, I will explain to your perception just how Doctor WILSONIA effects this magical cure. To wear WILSONIA is to get well of every form that disease may take. If I fail to prove this, notwithstanding your uncharitable epistle to Mrs. Stevens, I will obtain from William Wilson a handsome gratuity for your society. If you will become a WILSONIA missionary to the poor of New York you may stay the evils of vice and test WILSONIA in a Christlike frame of mind. They who evoke the law perish by the law. You will be no exception—or should be—to this fiat of Holy Writ.

SEPTEMBER 17, 1881.

MRS. SHAW, 325 EAST EIGHTY-FOURTH ST., N. Y.,

DEAR MADAME: I received your note yesterday, wishing to know as to my experience of the "WILSONIA" garments.

I hav had weakness in my back and loins upward of thirty years, often confined to bed for six and eight weeks at a time. I then used Davis & Kidder's Electric Machine, which partly relieved me, so that I could follow my occupation, but always felt the pain and weakness.

In 1876 I got paralyzed in my left side, when I was compelled to leave off work altogether.

In about a year my limbs commenced gaining strength. I could then open and close my left eye, but my back and loins never gathered strength. My feet and legs swelled almost to bursting. I was altogether confined to the house.

Having noticed the cures of the "WILSONIA" garments, I got a set at $103. I hav been now using them thirteen weeks and hav found great benefit. My limbs and back are greatly strengthened. I sleep and rest better than I ever did. My sight and hearing are greatly improved and I think ultimately I will be cured as much as I can expect at my age.

I am 69 years of age, and weighed, when I commenced wearing the garments, 245 pounds. My weight is considerable less at present; my feet and legs do not pain me now, the swelling is reduced nearly to their former size.

My wife has rheumatism in her loin and leg, which prevent her from sleeping. I let her hav one of my pieces to lay on the place effected, which giys her great relief.

Such, dear madam, is my experience of "WILSONIA" garments.
Yours respectfully,
HENRY SCULLY,
223 East 120th street, Harlem, N. Y.

CLEARFIELD, PA., Sept. 22, 1881.

MR. ANTHONY COMSTOCK,

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 10th instant came duly to hand, and at the first convenient opportunity I reply to the interrogations contained therein.

First. As to the merits of the "WILSONIA," I can only speak from my own experience. I was afflicted with varicose veins so that I had been confined to my bed for five weeks. I concluded to try Mr. Wilsou's magnetic goods. The first appliance gave me great relief, and in three weeks I was able to attend to my business. I was also afflicted with asthma, and greatly to my surprise I was also entirely cured of that. In addition to the foregoing my general health is much improved, so that I am now ten pounds heavier than I hav been for years through the summer season.

The "WILSONIA" may be a "swindle," but, if so, I hav not discovered it. Swindles, in my opinion, are as likely to originate in Nassau as Eighth street.

Second. Has Dr. Wilson my "permission" to publish? Certainly, if the use of my name will do him or any one else any good, he is welcome to it. Hoping that the above may be satisfactory, I remain yours, frankly,
GEORGE THORN.

OFFICE OF THE MANHATTAN LIFE INSURANCE CO., 156 AND 158 BROADWAY. F. C. LILLIBRIDGE, AGENT FOR NEW YORK, BROOKLYN, AND HUDSON RIVER COS.

A. COMSTOCK, ESQ.,

DEAR SIR: Having seen your letter denouncing WM. WILSON as a swindler and seen considerable in the papers relativ thereto I would say that I, too, am wearing the WILSONIA, having had a paralytic stroke six years ago. When I first had the stroke I was helpless as an infant, could not speak for eight days. I hav been wearing them since the 25th of June. My friend advised me to get them, but really, I must confess I had but little faith in them. Had I known then what I know now, I would hav signed a bond for five thousand dollars if I could not receive the benefits from other sources, but what I would hav had them. I fully indorse Mr. WILSON, and do not believe him to be the fraud you represent him to be. It seems to me strange that you should hint at anything as to hi antecedents. What has that to do with his invention? I hav several friends that look upon Mr. WILSON as their friend and benefactor, having restored them to health appiness. Yours respectfully,
F. C. LILLIBRIDGE.

BROOKLYN, Sept. 27, 1881.

MR. COMSTOCK,

DEAR SIR: I received a number of days since a letter from you, asking coucerning the WILSONIA garments—if I had tried them, and if I had given permission to publish my name in their connection, and other matter which I cannot now recall. I wore them for six months with most marvelous effect. I do not care to write the details, but will giv them to you in person at any time, as I hav gladly done to all applicants, though my permission as reference was never asked. Respectfully,
J. H. BARNEY.

2,310 THIRD AVE., N Y., Sept. 26, 1881.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.,

DEAR SIR: Miss Claribel Stevens hands me your letter of the 19th inst. for reply. I learned that you had addressed to William Wilson's patients a letter of apology and explanation, so that I ventured to request Mr. Wilson to let the whole subject drop. But, in your letter, you so utterly fail to rise to the importance of the issue, and so belittle the "noble cause," of which you are a recognized exponent, the first, knowing Mr. Wm. Wilsou's high character for integrity and earnest love of truth; and, second, being alive to the necessity that a "public censor of vice" should stand before the people sans reproche, the question becomes hyper important; is it wise to pigeon hole the papers and relegate the issue to oblivion, as your letter, prima facie implies a desire on your part to accomplish?

Your will scarcely controvert that great men suffer wrong rather than do wrong, and that a Christian frankly acknowledges his fault. In the issue Wilson vs. Comstock as you hav seeu fit to act upon neither of these, in marking out your policy in re, I respectfully ask you earnestly to consider the following propositions?

First. Is WILSONIA the greatest marvel of the nineteenth century?

Second. So far has WILSONIA cured ninety per centum of those who hav been the pioneers to invest money in it?

Third, Are the patients of William Wilson deserters from the great army of chronics, of which such men as Drs. Frank H. Hamilton, Agnew, Bliss, and their like are the officers? Deserters from "Ye men of high degree" to enlist under the banner of WILSONIA, the standard of ye "poor cabinet makers?"

Fourth. Has WILSONIA cured epilepsy, progressiv locomotory ataxia, mitral regurgitation of the heart, paralysis, varicose veins, prolapsus uteri, suppressed scarlet fever, consumption, rheumatism, pyæmia, and all other forms of disease?

Fifth. Is the great army of medical men at fault as to what causes blood circulation, and must their wiseacre idealism vanish as a mirage before the wand of a "Poor Cabinet Maker?"

Such, dear sir, are a few of the salient points in the issue raised, and I am certain the cause of true science will be conserved by a legal jurist in presence of the "Ermine" and

---

"GOD SAVE THE RIGHT."

If you are a true knight errant you will find WM. WILSON a foeman worthy of your steel.

And now, Mr. Comstock, please note the following; I put it on record here:

The life of James A. Garfield, autopsy facts and all taken into consideration, would, not might, hav been preserved, had Dr. Frank H. Hamilton granted my request conveyed to him by letter in New York, and telegraphed to Washington. Had I the right to address the worthy doctor, knowing that WILSONIA would save Garfield's life? Let the facts say whether the doctor's silence was courteous. I hav known Hamilton from boyhood. My father, the late I. H. Smith, M.D. of Auburn, N. Y., was the friend of his youth. My grandfather, the late Dr. Goodwin, of Geneva, was one of the founders of the Geneva Medical College, which was moved to Buffalo. Dr. Hamilton has now on his sheives the cream of my late father's medical library, which I presented to him.

Dr. Hamilton's first step to fame was his call to the professorship of surgery at Buffalo. But WILSONIA was not to save Garfield. Hamilton will yet learn that it would hav saved his illustrious patient. It was not to be. God's purpose is declared Your obedient servant,
C. HATCH SMITH.

NO. 330 CLERMONT AV., BROOKLYN, Sept. 27, 1881.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK:

In answer to your communication permit me to say, that, whether William Wilson be a cabinet maker or not he has helped me and my wife and daughter. I hav seen what the WILSONIA garments hav done outside of my family, and I can testify that there stands not to-day a man on earth who is doing more good for suffering humanity than this same William Wilson.

You hav not got marble white enough on which to carve his name, and to lay your hand on him in the glorious work he is now performing is to lay the hand of the vandal on the ark of the covenant of common sense in the temple of human health.

I am his friend, for he has been mine, and I only wish, if it should be your misfortune to suffer some of the ills that poor human flesh is liable to, that obeying injunction of the great Master, he may return good for evil by clothing you with the garments you say are a swindle, and that you, like St. Paul may drop persecution and become an apostle of the new dispensation of health inaugurated by the man who was poor enough to work at the bench for his bread. I am respectfully,

DEAR SIR: I hav been wearing your garments for the past two months, am still wearing them, and I firmly believe they hav saved my life. Previous to wearing the garments I was suffering constant pain from fibroid tumor on the womb. Since using the garments I only hav pains once in a while, and the tumor is greatly reduced. I BELIEVE THEY WILL CURE ME, IF A CURE IS POSSIBLE. Please send me a number of circulars.

REMARKABLE CURE OF RHEUMATISM.

BROOKLYN, Oct. 3, 1881.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.,

DEAR SIR: A few days ago I received a letter from you, and, owing to a little trouble in my family, I did not answer it, and now I take the first opportunity of doing so and reply to your inquiries. I may tell you that Mr. Wilson has my consent to use my name. I had been lying helpless to myself and family for three months, then I got the WILSONIA garments. I could not put them on myself; they were put on by a friend of mine, and, strange to say, after wearing them only ten days I was up and walking about, able to care for myself and family, and attend to my household duties. Therefore, I must say when all else failed the WILSONIA CURED. This is all I know about Mr. Wilson; he has been my best friend, and has my thanks and blessing; may good luck attend him and his. Good work will always prosper. I remain yours, etc.,

325 HERKIMER ST., BROOKLYN, Oct. 10, 1881.

Prof. JAMES A. CARMICHAEL,

DEAR FRIEND: I did not see you last week when I called for those garments Mr. Wm. Wilson was so geuerous in presenting to me, through your kind influence. I hav had the garments on one week, and I experience quite a perceptible benefit. This to me is very encouraging In one month I believe others will notice my improvement. I am not able to jump over a table yet, but I hav no doubt but that I will in less than a year. I must acknowledge here that I hav received more permanent benefit in the past one week than I hav in all former experience with physicians. If these garments restore me to activity, which I hav no doubt of, I shall feel it my duty to proclaim to the public, personally or otherwise, what I know about the virtues of WILSONIA, in gratitude to Mr. Wm. Wilson. Very respectfully yours,
PHILIP H. O'NEILL.

WHEN any one tells me that he saw a dead man restored to life I immediately consider with myself whether it be more probable that this person should either deceive or be deceived, or that the fact which he relates should really hav happened. I weigh the one miracle against the other, and, according to the superiority which I discern, I pronounce my decision, and always reject the greater miracle. If the falsehood of his testimony would be more miraculous than the event which he relates, then, and not till then, can he pretend to command my belief or opinion.—Hume's Essay on Miracles.

WHO knows not that truth is strong—next to the Almighty? She needs no policies nor stratagems nor licensings to make her victorious; these are the shifts and the defenses that error uses against her power. Giv her but room and do not bind her when she sleeps.—Milton.

PERSONS with feeble and untrained intellects may liv according to their conscience, but the conscience may be itself defectiv. To cultivate the intellect is, therefore, a religious duty; but when this truth is fairly recognized by men, the religion which teaches that the intellect should be distrusted, and that it should be subservient to faith, will inevitably fall.—Winwood Reade.

WE never can be sure that the opinion of the majority is true. Nearly every opinion held by the majority was once confined to the minority. Every established religion was once a heresy. If the opinions of the majority had always prevailed Christianity would hav been extirpated as soon as Christ was murdered. If an age or a people assume that any notion they entertain is certainly right, they assume their own infallibility and arrogantly claim for themselvs a prerogativ which even the wisest of mankind never possess. To affirm that a doctrin is unquestionably revealed from above is equally to affirm their own infallibility, since they affirm that they cannot be mistaken in believing it to be revealed. A man who is sure that his creed is true is sure of his own infallibility, because he is sure that upon that point he has committed no error. Unless, therefore, we are prepared to claim, on our own behalf, an immunity from error and an incapability of being mistaken, which transcend the limit of the human mind, we are bound not merely to permit our opinions to be disputed, but to be grateful to those who will do so.—Buckle's Essays.

THE advantages which the higher conditions of life are supposed to confer bear no proportion in value to the advantages which are bestowed by nature. The gifts of nature always surpass the gifts of fortune. How much, for example, is activity better than attendance; beauty than dress; appetite, digestion, and tranquil bowels than all the studies of cookery, or than the most costly compilation of forced or far-fetched dainties!—Paley's Natural Theology.

BUT human bodies are sick fools,
For a' their colleges and schools,
That when nae real ills perplex them
They mak' enow themselvs to vex them;
An' aye the less they hae to sturt [trouble] them,
In like proportion less will hurt them.

A country fellow at the plough,
His acres tilled, he's right enouch;
A country lassie at her wheel,
Her dizzens done, she's unco weel;
But gentlemen and ladies warst,
Wi' evendown want o' work are curst.
—Burns's Twa Dogs.

"WOULD you destroy all religion?" asks the believer, and I answer, "Yes, just as much of it as is Christianity—just as much of it as is fanaticism, untruth, and unnaturalism, and that is the 'whole structure,' for the morality, the purity, and the goodness that are engrafted upon it are really no portion of the tree itself." These things are eons of ages older than the systems of Christianity, and are simply but the outgrowth of civilization, culture, and intellectual development, and they increase and multiply as the race slowly evolves from darkness into light through the experience and practical knowledge that are developed by reason and common sense. We need no "substitute for the "religion of Christ." All religions are but forms of superstition that enlightened intellectuality invariably dissipates into thin air and finally annihilates entirely. Where now are the millions who once worshiped Jupiter and Juno as king and queen of the earth and gods of the universe? Only the remains of lofty temples, a few inscriptions upon old monuments, and brief encyclopedial records remain to tell us they ever were; and the day is certain to come, in the distant future, when your boasted Christianity will stand just as far back in the records of the race as that old Greek and Roman religion now does.—Elmina Drake Slenker.

THE virtue which the world wants is a healthful virtue, not a valetudinarian virtue—a virtue which can expose itself to the risks inseparable from all spiritual exertion; not a virtue which keeps out of the common air for fear of infection, and eschews the common food as too stimulating. It would be indeed absurd to attempt to keep men from acquiring those qualifications which fit them to play their part in life with honor to themselvs and advantage to their country for the sake of preserving a delicacy which cannot be preserved—a delicacy which a walk from Westminster to the Temple [or down Broadway, N. Y.] is sufficient to destroy.—Macaulay.

THINK not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets. I am not come to destroy but to fulfil (Matt. v, 17, 18). Ye hav heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not kill; and whosoever shall kill shall be in danger of the judgment. But I say unto you, etc. (Matt. v, 21, 22). Ye hav heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not commit adultery. But I say, etc.—Matt. v, 27, 28.

LOVE AND LAW.

In the twilight's gloaming
Stood a maiden young and fair,
Watching anxiously for some one,
Who was certainly not there.
Long she peered into the darkness,
While her mind was fraught with fears,
And her heavy, banging eyelids
Showed the mark of recent tears.
Oh, the woe that woman suffers!
Oh, the heartaches and the pangs!
Only partially atoned for
By her bangles and her bangs.
Faithless man, come to the maiden,
Who is waiting there for you;
Clasp her gently to your bosom—
Tell her she is life to you.
Then be sure to get your latters,
(On this point depends your fate),
For in case you shake the maiden,
She may choose to litigate.
Never let a heartless jury
See those notelets where you say
That the girl's your "tootsey-pootsey;"
For it givs you dead away.

REV. JOHN JASPER'S PHILOSOPHY.

On the Washington train I met Rev. John Jasper, the "sun-do-move" philosopher from Richmond. Mr. Jasper maintains that his theory—that the world stands still, and that the sun moves around it—is true.

"Ef de sun don't move," said Mr Jasper in the most solemn manner, "den why did Joshua command it to stan' still? No, sir, the ministers who tell you dat the sun stans still and dat de world moves round her—why, dey is mistaken. Dey is lying to de people, and ef dey don't change dere b'leef, dey will die in dere sins."

When I asked Mr. Jasper what his theory of the telegraph was he said: "Well, de telegraf stan's to reason. I see de principles of de telegraf 'lustrated every day."

"How, Mr. Jasper?" I asked.

"Well, de oder mornin' my dog stood in the doorway. His tail was in de kitchen, while his head was in de dinin' room. When he was standin' dere my wife she trod on de dog's tail, and bark, bark, bark went de dog in de oder room. Now dat was de principles of de telegraf illustrated. De tail was one end of de telegraf and de mouf was de oder. De bark was de click, click of de machine. Now, if dot dog had been big 'nough to teach from Richmond to Washington, den I could hav trod on his tail down dere and de bark could hav been heard all over de Capital. Yes, sah, de telegraf is plain 'nuff, and de movement of de sun is plain 'nuff, too, ef de people wouldn't pervert the scriptures."—Eli Perkins.

ESTHETICS ON BILLOWS.

They were an utter—too utter—crowd and right back of them sat a big, flat-footed chap on his way to the lumber camps.

"I think this lake breeze is quite too exhilarating for anything," observed a young man who sat at dinner with green kids on.

"I've got something that beats that all holler," chipped in the big man. "They filled the bottle right up for a quarter. I don't want to buck agin the saloon on board, but if you say you've got cramps, you shall hav a pull at it."

If green kids had 'em he wouldn't own it, and to cover his embarrassment another of the party, with eye-glasses and a white necktie, remarked:

"Roll on, thou troubled waters, roll."

"Oh, you'll get roll enough before you git across Saginaw Bay," remarked the big man. "Time this breeze has been blowing an hour you'll feel like an old dish-rag hung up to scare the crows away."

White necktie gave him a killing stare, but it glanced off, and one of the ladies said:

"He struggled bravely with the storm-lashed sea."

"Who was that, ma'am? P'raps you mean my old pard. Yes, he struggled bravely, and if this old lake wasn't jist a-bilin' then I don't want a cent. Jim was a good swimmer, but he had to cave at last."

The whole group gave him a looking over, but he was shot-proof, and, turning to Green Kids, he said:

"Think you could save yourself if this boat went down?"

No answer.

"Yer possibly might," continued the man. "I went down off that pint above us about ten years ago, and got through it, but it was a powerful tight squeak. If I'd had on one o' them shirts as button behind I'd been a goner. What's the style o' yours, my son?"

They rose up as one, locked arms, and passed into the cabin, and the big man looked after them and whistled:

"Maybe they ain't used to traveling fust-class and being polite to strangers! But I'll forgiv 'em. Lands! but won't the starch begin to peel off as soon as we slide around the pint and get to feel the sea! Yum! yum! But it will be too enthusiastically billowy for anything!"—Detroit Free Press.

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 27 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

"The Gods and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Gods," "Humboldt," "Thomas Paine," "Individuality," "Heretics and Heresies." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

Notes and Clippings.

A LONDON bookseller displays in his window a Greek Testament with the sign, "The original version. Make your own revision."

M. RENAN'S translation of Ecclesiastes, with an elaborate preface, is now in type, and it is expected to be out toward the close of this year.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is the best Liberal paper published. Any one desiring a paper devoted to free thought and free speech should giv it a trial.—Exeter (Mo.) Republican.

MRS. GARFIELD has requested J. Stanley Brown, Garfield's private secretary, to undertake the task of arranging her late husband's correspondence, to the end that a careful and comprehensiv biography of him may be prepared.

THE Church Standard notices with alarm that "Gambetta is an Atheist, and so are his political friends." This is no new discovery, but we are glad to see the statement in a pious print. It will be an eye-opener to some good Christians.

TALMAGE says: "The devil can do anything." In this Mr. Talmage is wrong. The devil couldn't make a ten-year old stripper out of a yearling heifer in a minute. Please be a little more guarded in your statements, Mr. Talmage. Such recklessness doesn't become your cloth.—Exchange.

THE next number of Liberty, the new radical Socialistic fortnightly published in Boston, will contain a fine photo-engraving of Michael Bakounine, the father of Russian Nihilism, the first likeness of him ever published in America. It will be accompanied by a biographical sketch.

Two years ago a monk in Rome turned Protestant and became a furious opponent of the papacy, but owing to an embezzlement of moneys he had to leave the city. He was sought in vain until the 29th ult., when two policemen caught him gazing into the window of a jeweler's in the Corso, and he is now serving out an eighteen years' term in the galleys.

ANOTHER case of religious bigotry. Mr. William Roberts, schoolmaster of the Bakewell Union, has been defeated in his canditature for the Union Mastership because he was suspected of "supporting Bradlaugh." That set the Guardians against him, although the local paper praises his conscientiousness and ablity. The successful candidate was a sergeant of the Grenadier Guards, and there can be little doubt that his orthodoxy is unimpeachable both in religion and in politics.

DR. CARPENTER, in his lecture on "Nature and Law" at Glasgow one Sunday, said that "he had heard a very distinguished man—the late Professor Clifford, whose loss they all deplored, and whose pure life and high aims they must all admire—he had heard him state, not only that there was no need for a God in the universe, but that there was no room for a God in the universe. The laws of nature accounted for everything, and to go beyond them was trying to put something into a vessel that was already full."

THE London Freethinker says: "The Newcastle Chronicle is puffing Moody and Sankey in the most shameful manner. A few days ago it declared that they had received 'an application from Birmingham, signed by two hundred ministers, seventy-seven of whom are clergymen of the church of England.' Now, the total number of clergymen in Birmingham is only sixty-five, and the Nonconformist ministers number only about eighty-five. Joseph Cowan's paper has been doing its utmost for some years to debauch the public mind of Newcastle, but it has reached the lowest depths of degradation in playing tooter to the Yankee revivalists."

THE Bishop of Manchester, in his sermon at Oldham, Eng., last Sunday, in which he referred to the visit of Moody and Sankey, added that he feared the effect of startling excitement passed away as rapidly as it was produced. Where, he asked, were the tens of thousands who rushed to hear Moody and Sankey in Manchester? They must not suppose that because a man could cry "Glory hallelujah!" he was saved.

THE disqualification of a witness at Toronto, on the ground that he was an Agnostic, adds to our knowledge of matters and things in Canada. The supposition that because a man is not sure about what goes on in the next world he is therefore an incompetent witness as to what he sees going on in this world, when his evidence may be very important to the rights of a plaintiff or a defendant, caused Mr. Justice Osler to suggest that there was a chance for improvement in this respect in the law of the Dominion.—N. Y. Sun.

A NEW law with regard to the cemeteries in France, which was passed by the Senate after encountering serious opposition, is about to be put in force by the French government. Hitherto, as is well-known, French cemeteries hav been divided into as many sections as there were religious communities in the surrounding districts, so that persons of different religious belief should not be buried together. By the new law this distinction is abolished, and the available ground in each case will be open to all alike, irrespectiv of religious creed.

A CHRISTIAN paper prints this: "'I am a Bob Ingersoll man,' said Frank Rande, the most notorious of modern outlaws, as he stood at the bar of his cell in St. Louis, and no one doubts his word." And the Worthington Advance retorts: "'I am a stalwart Republican,' said Guiteau as he shot down the President of the United States. 'I am a Christian,' said Guiteau, 'and removed the President under divine pressure, the same pressure that led Abraham to offer his son Isaac as a sacrifice.'" And no one doubted his word either.

THE Philadelphia Presbytery, which has been trying to find out whether pastor Thompson did or did not steal fifty dollars, sat on the case all the week with closed doors. The brethren, who hav been giving their whole thought and time to the case, were poorly furnished for the work of Sunday, and it is said that they either exchanged with one another or else preached old sermons. There is a great deal of bitterness manifested on both sides, and enough has leaked out through keyholes and the cracks of of doors to show that petty malignity has quite as much to do with the trial as a zeal for the truth and for gospel purity.

WE are sure that our readers will enjoy this plucky retort on the Bishop of Manchester by the Hulme Gazette: "Secularism has no help from the state or God, it has no great churches, nor has it the £10,000,000 per annum to fight with as the church of England has; it has not the £5,000,000 which the dissenters hav, it has not influence in 'high places.' It cannot enter the jails, asylums, and infirmaries; it cannot hang up at railway stations its texts, nor lay its books on the tables to propagate its views; it cannot hav an organization like the British and Foreign Bible Society, nor can it hav the useful aid of money to convert the heathen. The people who profess the secular opinions are scouted and traduced by the leaders of Christianity, and they cannot obtain justice in the law courts and never could. Yet these people are feared. They are so interesting that their doings occupy the time of church conferences and congresses. What explanation is offered of this? The religious census taken at Newcastle the very day the many churchmen were there shows that fewer people attend places of worship now than in 1851. The same discovery was made at Liverpool. How is this? Can the Bishop explain it? The bankruptcies amongst clergymen are as bad as the worst cases amongst tradesmen. The church cannot stand up with cleaner hands than other people. We hav not any angry words for any class of men, from sweeps to bishops. We must, in truth, defend all classes, even if we fall under the curse of a conference of bishops and clergy. Not one newspaper in a hundred in this kingdom will or dare lift up its voice on the side of the traduced and much-abused Secularists. Silence is cowardly and criminal."—London Freethinker.

IN making up his forms the foreman of a Montreal paper mixed an article on Roman Catholic Missions in Africa with a recipe for making tomato catsup. As published the article reads: 'The Roman Catholics claim to be making material advances in Africa. During the past three years they hav obtained a firm footing in the interior of the continent, and hav sent forth several missionaries into the equatorial regions. They are accustomed to begin their work by buying heathen children and educating them. The easiest and best way to prepare them is to first wipe them with a clean towel; then place them in dripping-pans and bake till they are tender. Then you will hav no difficulty in rubbing them through a sieve, and will save time by not being obliged to cut them in slices and cook for several hours."—Detroit Free Press.

PRESIDENT ARTHUR has issued the regular Thanksgiving proclamation, calling upon the people to thank God, etc. When millions of people pray day and night for weeks for God to restore a President to health, and God pays no attention to the prayers of those who stamp on their money the nonsense, "In God we Trust," it strikes us as concentrated bosh to set apart a day for thanking a God who pays no more attention to heartfelt prayers than Gibralter does to the waves. It would be proper for Arthur personally to giv thanks to God or Guiteau, but after the flat refusal of the Almighty power to interfere or protect greatness from malice and ignorance, we should omit the Thanksgiving proclamation from this time on, and in place thereof we suggest a day of feasting and hilarity, that men could hav a day of recreation.—Great West.

IN a recent speech Victor Hugo said: "You, Catholics, claim the liberty to instruct. For some centuries you hav held in your hands, at your discretion, at your school, under your ferule, two great nations—Italy and Spain, illustrious among the illustrious, and what hav you done with them? I am going to tell you. Thanks to you, Italy, of which no one can think nor even pronounce her name without inexpressible filial grief—Italy, that mother of genius and of nations, which has diffused over the whole world the most astonishing productions of poetry and art; Italy, which has taught our race to read, does not to-day know how to read herself! Yes, Italy has, of all the states of Europe, the smallest number of nativ inhabitants who are able to read! Spain, magnificently endowed Spain, which received from the Romans her first civilization, from the Arabians her second civilization, from Providence, and in spite of you, a world, America; Spain has lost, thanks to you, thanks to your brutal yoke, which is a yoke of degradation, Spain has lost the secret of her power which she received from the Romans—that genius in the arts which she received from the Arabs—that world which God gave her. And in exchange for all that you hav made her lose, what has she received? She has received the Inquisition, which has burned upon the funeral pyre five millions of men! Read history! The Inquisition, which exhumed the dead in order to burn them as heretics. The Inquisition, which declares children heretics even to the second generation. See what you hav done with that focus of light which you call Italy! You hav extinguished it. The colossus which you call Spain, you hav undermined. The one is in ruins, the other is in ashes. See what you hav done for these two great nations!"

IN the trial of Guiteau on Saturday last a section of the late President's backbone was exhibited in court to show the track of the assassin's bullet. Guiteau is said to hav inspected this horrid exhibit in the most cold-blooded manner. He still insists that the Lord is with him, but wants plenty of policemen around to help providence protect him. His conduct in court is violent; he abuses his counsel continually, and wants to take charge of the case himself. He admits the shooting, but charges the doctors with having caused the President's death by malpractice. One of the jurors is a negro. The principal witnesses thus far hav been James G. Blaine, the officer who arrested Guiteau, Gen. Swain, and Dr. Bliss. Guiteau was shot at and slightly wounded in the wrist by a drunken "crank," while being conveyed from the court-house to the prison on the 19th. The man was arrested. Between lead and hemp, Guiteau stands a fair chance of having his epitaph written at no distant day.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

To Berlin and Vienna.—Concluded.

At Bodenbach we reached the Austrian frontier, and our baggage had to be examined by the Custom House officers, a stoppage of half an hour or more the result. Fruit is abundant here; apples, grapes, pears, and peaches are of good quality and sold at low prices. I bought of queerly-dressed peasant women all the fruit I wished to eat for a few kreutzers. The money has changed again. In Berlin the coins were one and two marks—a mark is equal to twenty-five cents—and pfenigs, one hundred of which constitute a mark. Here it is guldens with florins of about the same value as kreutzers for the fractional divisions, one hundred of which make a gulden. What Holland money I had when reaching Berlin had to be exchanged for German coin, and that again has to be changed off in entering Austria. The kingdoms are not extensive, and the custom officers and money-changers are rather frequent. I notice here what I have not seen before—queer little windows in the roofs of houses, resembling in shape the upper half of an eye, with a small pane of glass or two inserted to give light, lying down horizontally, the whole having the appearance of eyes placed in the roof, and giving the house the ability to see. I saw two rows, and in one instance three rows, of these eyes in a single roof. The roofs are of tile, as they are on nearly all parts of the continent where I have been, save where slate is used. I see few or no flat roofs so common with us; here in town and country the roofs are high and steep, being a very conspicuous part of the building. The style of building of timber and brick jointly, the timber showing on the outer surface, is not so common here as in Germany. There I noticed many of that class, posts and braces being skilfully arranged and the brick neatly filled in between. The houses of the peasants here have very low walls, small windows, and wide, high roofs of tile, and the eye like windows mentioned. They have but a single low story below where the roof commences, with two stories above the eyes. Many of the houses look very antique, and are tastefully ornamented with shrubbery and flower plots. The peasants present the appearance of being hard toilers, knowing little of the luxuries and comforts of life.

The white or sugar beet is an important farm crop in Bohemia and in Austria north of Vienna, and now is just the time when they are being harvested. They are dug with digging-forks and thrown into heaps, when women and girls top them and load them into carts to be hauled away to a sugar factory to be sold. I see many fields having ten or twenty acres of these beets in one bed or plot, and often twenty women in a single field, harvesting them. The manufacture of beet sugar is extensively engaged in here, and besides supplying the home demand a large quantity is exported to England. When refined it can scarcely be distinguished from refined cane sugar. The farmers are busily engaged in plowing for fall sowing. Some of the grain is already up, looking green. Wheat and rye are largely grown, with now and then a field of maize, or Indian corn. Much of the farm work is done with oxen. In some districts they are more numerous than horses. It is not at all uncommon to see oxen working singly in shafts to a cart, also plowing and harrowing. The harrows are often of a primitive character, being a home-made wooden drag. I have noticed many sowing grain and others dragging it with what looked like half a dozen rails with cross-pieces pinned onto them. The land is a light, sandy loam, and easily cultivated. The crops are not extremely heavy. Fruit is easily cultivated, and orchards and fruit-trees are frequent. Vineyards, however, are far less abundant than I had supposed. In the same latitude on the Rhine the vine is the principal crop, but here, even on the hillsides, where nothing else can be cultivated, no vineyards are to be seen. There are very few fences in this country; the apologies for hedges along the railways amount to little; the whole country lies open, as though constituting one vast possession. In most instances the country is so level that the plowing is done in long stretches. I have seen plowmen with lands a quarter of a mile in length, and sometimes near half a mile furrow without turning. The crops are raised in long, narrow strips—say grain, potatoes, beets, clover, turnips, etc., alternately, like beds in a garden. In fact, the country looks like an immense garden in a high state of cultivation. Occasionally we come to high and rocky grounds where the ravines are deep, the rocks towering, and the whole face of the country decidedly broken. Then the valleys broaden out again to a width of five miles and even ten miles of unbroken plain, fringed with a range of hills in the distance on either side.

At seven P. M. we reached the ancient city of Prague—spelt here Prag, and pronounced with the a broad, as in chart—the capital of Bohemia, and the locality where John Huss and Joseph of Prague, over three centuries ago, tried to introduce a little freedom of thought in religious matters, for which the church caused the blood of great numbers to flow for their temerity in presuming to deviate in a slight degree from the prescribed line of belief. Those days of religious blood-letting have passed away, but still the church remains nearly as intolerant as ever; she is less cruel than formerly only because she has less power.

Prague stands in a basin-shaped valley, cut in two by the Moldan, surrounded on all sides by rocks or eminences, upon whose slopes the buildings of the town rise tier above tier as they recede from the water's edge. There is said to be much of Asiatic splendor in the aspect and form of the domes, turrets, and spires which rise up almost without number on all sides. An imposing object among the lesser buildings is the Hradschin, the palace of the Bohemian kings, running along the eastern eminence and overtopping the intermediate buildings. In the rear of this is the Lauriziberg, where the pagan Bohemians once celebrated their rites of fire-worship. Their Christian converters, perceiving the difficulty of banishing their pagan rites, substituted in the place of the corrupt pagan fires their own more holy fires such as consumed St. Laurence, whose church is built upon the ground. Of course Christian fire is more holy than pagan fire, especially after they have used it in roasting a few hundred heretics to death in a slow, excruciating manner. And it was not here alone that pagan rites were partially adopted into the Christian programme. In this way the pagan festival on December 25th, commemorative of the birth of the sun—when it commences to rise from the death or night of winter into which he had sunk—begins to take place, was adopted as the birthday of the Christian God, and the festival made the great Christian festival, though there is not a particle of proof that their deity was born at that period. It is perhaps a happy faculty of appropriating the cast-off garments of others and turning them to good account.

On the opposite side of the river, looking up the stream, are the black precipices and fortification of the citadel of Wyschrad (the acropolis), where the fabled Queen Libussa, the founder of Prague, used to precipitate her lovers into the river as soon as she grew tired of them. Behind the towers of the Alstadt—old tower—rises Ziska's Hill, which was fortified by the zealous Hussite chief whose name it bears, and serves to recall the recollections of those bloody times when one class of Christians delighted in putting other Christians to death. The vicinity of Prague is historical ground as far as bitter religious fermentation is concerned. The war of the Reformation raged fiercely here. After the battle of the White Hill in 1621, in which the cause of Romanism triumphed over Protestantism, the leaders of the party who had supported the elector Frederick V. were executed on a scaffold in front of the Rathhaus, including eight superior officers and nobles, fourteen councilors, several magistrates, and a great number of those considered inferior persons, and all this to appease the religious ardor of the pious Ferdinand. The heads of the nobles among the victims were stuck upon the gate tower by the bridge as a warning to those who dared to differ from the holy church. Not long afterward a similar bloody execution took place of eleven officers of noble rank, with blue blood, and a large number of those whose blood was only of the ordinary color. The nobles had the proud privilege of dying by the sword or cord, as they preferred, while the common herd had their heads summarily taken off with the beheading-axe.

In the church where John Huss and his disciples once preached their Wickliffian doctrines lie the bones of the great astronomer Tycho Brahe, who at the invitation of the Emperor Rudolph II. removed to Prague, and died there. An effigy of him in armor, rudely carved in relief on a slab of red marble, is placed, by way of monument, against the last pillar on the right hand nearest the altar. It bears his motto, "Esse potius quam haberi"—to be, rather than to be esteemed. The heads of the Protestant leaders who had been executed, which were stuck upon the bridge, were taken down when fortunately the Protestants again came into possession of the city in 1631, and were buried with due ceremonies.

Jews reside in Prague in pretty large numbers. Judenstadt (Jew's-town) is appropriated to them, though they are not now compelled to reside there as in former times, since the richer Jews have fine residences in other parts of the city. Neither are the Jews' quarters now locked up at eight in the evening, as was once the rule; the gates, even, are removed. The Jew quarter is situated upon the low banks of the Moldan, close to the river, and is said to be a labyrinth of narrow, dirty streets and low houses, swarming with young Jews, like an ant-hill. A single house often contains eight or ten families. Eight thousand people are said to live in this style. It is said to be the oldest Jewish settlement in Europe, and is claimed to have been established soon after the destruction of Jerusalem. The chief synagogue dates from the twelfth century. In 1290 the Jews were almost exterminated by the fanaticism and cruelty of their Christian tormentors. This was stirred up from a rumor that the Jews had insulted what the Christians are pleased to call "the Host," a representation of Jesus; but as this charge is always trumped up against them when persecution and cruelty are intended, and is nearly always false, it was undoubtedly in this case. It however led to a fearful massacre of Israelites, and the horrible slaughter was spread over a good deal of Germany. Well and truthfully has it been said that the history of the Jews in Prague has been a bloody blot upon the escutcheon of Christianity. It is one uninterrupted narrative of tyranny, extortion, and death on the part of those Christian murderers and oppressors who have for many centuries shown themselves capable of inflicting them upon long-suffering and inoffensive victims who cannot accept the dictation in belief of the Christian tyrants. It is only within a century or thereabouts that a decent degree of toleration has been extended to this long-oppressed people. With all the cruelties, however, that have been heaped upon them, they have steadily increased in number. It is said they are still much more prolific than Christian families, the average being ten children to each mother, while the Christians average not more than four to the mother. The Jews are also longer-lived than other portions of the citizens, many of them surviving to a great age. Having once been God's peculiar people may be some benefit that still adheres to them, despite all they have suffered.

After seeing my baggage changed from one station to the other nearly a mile away, I felt that perhaps I ought to visit a Prague theater. I remembered that you had sent me abroad to see all I could, and that perhaps in justice to those who had thus sent me—inasmuch as I could get to Vienna as easy by waiting over for a fast train—I ought to see a Dutch theater and find what it is like. You might not like it to send me abroad to see all the sights I could if I neglected a single opportunity. So I set out to go to a theater, but the thing to ascertain was where the theater was. To learn this I halted the first intelligent person I met, and asked thus: "My dear sir, will you please direct me to a theater?" He shook his head in blank astonishment, and I was convinced he had not understood a word I had said. I spoke the word theater in all the ways I could think of. I pronounced it slow and pronounced it fast; I pronounced the first syllable as if spelled te, ta, and tha. I spoke the a sharp, flat, and broad; I placed the accent on the first syllable, on the second, and on the third, but it was all useless. I failed to get the "Dutch" into it, and the man could not understand me.

I did not yield to despair; I left him and tried another, throwing in all the possible variations I could possibly conceive of in rendering the word theater; I was determined to leave no stone unturned; but it was of no use; I was so stupid that the Dutchman could not comprehend me. He shook his head in consternation, shrugged his shoulders, and passed on. I tried another, but with no better results; and still another, with still another failure. I fairly sighed for a theater. A tramway was passing; I boarded it, told the conductor that I wished to be put down at the theater. I half-think he comprehended the last word, for he threw up his arms and gesticulated in a most energetic manner, and gave me to understand that I was wrong, that I would have to take another strasse pointing in another direction; but he could not speak a word in English. I jumped off the car, and put off in the direction the conductor pointed, turned two corners, saw a building with two gas-lights; I made for it, entered the door, saw a man sitting within an inclosure as though he received money; and, elated that I had found the theater, I planked down a gulden, saying I wished to invest that much in his enterprise. He gave me a ticket and pointed out the door at which I was to enter. I entered and found myself in a circus—the first I had visited for many years. The exhibition was in a building with the ring in the center and seats rising around like an amphitheater. Just as I entered, an active horse was going through a series of hoops held for him; he did remarkably well in weaving in and out from one to the other and jumping through them one at a time, and then through all six of them together when held a foot apart, and without being driven or led.

I will not burden you to listen to the entire performance, but will mention some of the feats which struck me as being good. A man and woman rode a two-horse act in concert; the man, standing with a foot on each horse, held the woman by the belt, and she stood first upon his hip and knee, and then upon his hip and shoulder, the horses in an easy gallop. I think, however, I used to see as good as that many years ago when I was younger. But the next little woman that came out excelled any female rider I ever saw. She rode standing, without a bridle, and the horse going at a rapid gait; and she jumped over four bands of webbing, held so as to make four sections of the circle, throwing herself clear around at each jump, and striking with agility on the horse each time. The four bands were held some two and a half feet apart, and she jumped over them all, first face forward, and then whirling her body around while going over them. She then jumped through four hoops, first one at a time, and then through all of them when held a foot or so apart. She was extremely agile and active—the best I ever saw. A male rider next acquitted himself finely. His horse went very rapidly. He rode first with a saddle, but he reached down and unbuckled the girth and still stood and danced upon the saddle, loose, and then drew the saddle gradually back with his feet, and kicked it off behind, remaining on the horse himself. Then he threw himself in all positions, lying on the horse's back, then sliding down as though he must slip off, and then working himself back to the horse's tail, and merely remaining on by his hip, looking as though he must inevitably fall off behind; then he would collect himself in a moment and spring to his feet, then jump to the ground while the horse was at full speed, and spring back again upon the horse lighting first astride, and then on his feet on the naked back of the horse, and all without a bridle or anything in his hand. He was very good.

Some comical riding by two clowns then took place, in which a good deal of mirthfulness was blended, which I will hardly attempt to describe. Next a dancing-horse came in, which, at the direction of his rider, danced to tunes by the band, and went through other remarkable evolutions. Two fellows then came in, dressed in most grotesque fashion, and went through a great variety of comic performances, involving athletic feats and remarkable agility. Among other things, they fastened bells to their heels, others by a band behind the head, holding others in the hand. The bells were of different tones, and they sitting on the tops of two chairs, by kicking with their feet, nodding their heads, and striking their hands in concert, played different tunes very fairly. Their grimaces and antics in the mean while filled the audience with mirth. They sported much with a large rubber wind-ball, near a foot in diameter; this they kept in the air in a great variety of ways, by throwing it up in the air, letting it strike upon the head, and thus throwing it back into the air and keeping it bounding for twenty times or more, touching it with their heads only. When one got a little weary the other would step in and relieve him. Then they stood some twenty feet apart, one threw the ball, and the other caught it on his head, and with the head only sent it back to the first one, and thus they kept it going from one head to the other, making a detour in the air for some minutes. They did not make a miss, but threw the ball by striking it with their heads about as they pleased. They would sometimes pretend to be angry with each other, and one would throw the ball at the other, and he would drop as suddenly as though shot, but he immediately sprang to his feet and returned the ball, when the other had to come down in like manner. Their antics were numerous and very humorous.

Another gave a very creditable performance on the tight wire, which was drawn across the circle some twelve or fifteen feet from the ground. He ascended to it by a rope, in citizen's dress, and without a rod or anything in his hands walked back and forth, took out his cigar case, lighted his cigar, smoked it, and went through various evolutions, after which he took off one garment after another, shoes and all, until he had nothing on but his professional suit of tights; then he went through other difficult evolutions, standing on one foot, facing about suddenly, lying down upon the wire, kneeling, sitting, getting repeatedly through a small hoop, and various other hoops of a similar character, and all upon a single wire with nothing to balance him. This was followed by a kind of ballet performance in which twelve or fifteen ballet dancers took part, with men dressed as monsters—three of them huge frogs which leaped about considerably, one an alligator, one a big baboon, and others with grotesque appliances. A company of men came in with mock horses around them, and engaged in a sham fight, in which some of the horses and riders were badly worsted, the whole winding up in a grand cavalcade in which the different performers rode in their various horses, and the queen of the ballet company was carried around in a triumphal car borne upon the shoulders of several men. The entire affair was quite amusing, and I was not particularly sorry that the show turned out a circus instead of a theater.

At eleven o'clock the train departed for Vienna, still some two hundred miles away or more. The night was pleasant, the train was moving along with commendable speed for this country, and I hoped by seven or eight o'clock in the morning to be in Vienna. But here comes in the saddest part of my story. By some strange fatuity, by some stupidity on my part, or by some lack of information on the part of others, I took the wrong train at Prague. I of course had a ticket which authorized me to be conveyed from Prague to Vienna, but it was stipulated to be by a certain road, and did not entitle me to be carried by any road that I might choose to select. I had simply taken the wrong road, the wrong company, not knowing there was more than one way to go. I had ridden some three hours with a great degree of complacency at the satisfactory degree of speed we were making, having reached a point some twenty-five miles south of Prague, when the guard discovered that my ticket was not by his road. He took it to another authority in the station, and it seemed to be decided that I must get off. I was accordingly hustled off most unceremoniously, with the broken words, "Billet no good," but without my having the ability to make any explanation or any inquiry as to what the status would be by the change. At two o'clock in the morning I was turned out of the train, and the train went, on leaving me where the people could not understand a word I said, while I was unable to understand a word they said. I had telegraphed to a friend in Vienna that I would be there by the morning train, and naturally wished to know when I could go on, and whether the train I was to take stopped at that station, or whether I had to go somewhere else to meet it. But despite all the ingenuity I could muster, and all of the German language I could control, I could not make them comprehend my anxieties nor understand my desires. I did not know what to do. It was late to go to bed, but as I had not slept any the bed would have been welcome had I known that I had several hours to wait. But I did not know but the train I should have taken might come on any hour, so I dared not go to bed. I tried to make different parties understand I wished to go to Wien, and desired very much to know when I could go, but they were so stupid, I was so stupid, or we were all so stupid, that we made no headway in understanding each other. Then I sighed and groaned for that universal language, and gave two sighs and a groan that it might be English. At length one man, more intelligent and humane than the others, upon my repeatedly asking him, "Veen, was oore?" and pointing at the same time toward Vienna, and showing him my ticket, and pointing specially to the road by which I was to go, finally comprehended my want and said, "Oct oore," and motioned that the train would pass down on the west side of the station, while the train I had come in on passed on the opposite side. This information gave me great relief, but it was too late to go to bed, so I remained on hand till eight o'clock, waiting for the six long hours to pass away, glad that I did not hav to stop at Kolin, the name of the station, for twenty-four hours. I will remark that in Austria and Germany Vienna is written Wien and pronounced "veen."

I did not know but I should have some trouble with the attachés of the railway on which I had ridden seventy-five miles. They made out their bill against me—three florins for the distance I had ridden on their road from Prague. I remonstrated, and declined to pay. I said I had shown my ticket when I took the train at Prague, and it was their fault if I had made a mistake as much as it was my own; but they could understand nothing of my profound arguments. At all events I refused to hand over the three florins, thinking it no worse for them that I rode over their road by mistake, and was compelled to stop over six hours in the night, than it was for me. In fact, I don't know but if I had been in the practice of "cussing" I should have dealt out a little in that line, for I was not in the best of humor; as it was, I am not sure but I did "cuss" just a little, but as I was confined to English I fear they lost the benefit of it. They talked about sending for the "policee." I said, "Send for your police and be d——." But later on, while I was out of the room, they secured my baggage, and would not relinquish it unless I gave them the three florins. I am not good at contention, especially the fistic variety, and it occurred to me that in many cases discretion is the better part of valor; so I compromised with them and gave them two florins, fearing otherwise I would not be able to secure my luggage from such a stupid set, and thinking also that perhaps, as I had made a mistake, I should pay something for it. I am inclined to think I was discreet in this course, for it is a fearful thing here to get entangled in the law. There is no show for a person who is brought before the authorities. I have heard of an American who was traveling in Austria, and wished to enjoy a little sleep in the railway carriage, but was annoyed by the frequent call upon him to show his ticket. Finally he gave way so far as to say: "This is a hell of a country. You Dutchmen don't know how to do business, anyhow." It so happened that the guard who heard this petulant remark understood English, and at the next station he reported this American, who was immediately placed under arrest, thrown into prison, his wife in great unhappiness having to be separated from him and go to a hotel. The examination was very summary, and the American was fined two hundred gulden and sent to prison for sixty days. The influence of the American consul was enlisted in his favor, and by extra exertions the imprisonment was remitted, but the fine had to be paid. So much for a little indulgence in free speech. Upon the whole, I think I did far better to pay the two florins rather than run the risk of complications with authorities whom I could not understand, and who could not understand me. The railway men and myself became quite friendly, and they apparently wished me success on my journey.

At 8 o'clock my train came along, and I very gladly left Kolin and was on my way to Wien. The delay had this good result—it allowed me to have a better view of the intermediate country. For two hours' ride the country is a wide, alluvial plain, with hills far in the distance. The extensive crop of sugar beets is being secured; hundreds of women in the aggregate are working in the fields at securing them, at digging potatoes, and gathering cabbages. The weather is favorable for this business, and large quantities of the beets are being conveyed to the stations to be sent to the sugar mills, where they are sold. I have seen many freight cars loaded with beets. They do not grow so large here as on our good soil in America, hence I infer that the Austrian soil is light, but sandy and easy of cultivation. Manuring is largely followed, and I think it very requisite to good crops in Austria. Many are also plowing and sowing fall grain. Several are still cutting grass and making hay, though doubtless, as before observed, a late growth.

When we reached the high lands forming the water-shed between northern and southern Austria, where the waters part, some running north, others south, we passed through narrow valleys, with high, abrupt hills, deep gorges, and these gradually spread out again into wide plains. Moravia, through which we passed, is a fine, productive country, the soil seeming richer than further north. It is easy to note the peculiarities of the inabitants, style of dress, etc. The Bohemians and Moravians seem not like the northern Germans or even the Austrians proper; further on the Hungarians are met with, and here in Vienna there are many Jews, some Servians, with people from other sections.

Some of the towns and villages as we approached Vienna look flourishing and cleanly, with a due share of manufacturing establishments, indicated by the usual tall chimneys. There seems to be a plenty of coal in Austria, especially in Bohemia, Hungary, etc., but much of it is different in color from any coal I ever saw, it being brown instead of black. At first I did not know what it was, seeing many car loads of it, and was a little surprised upon inquiry to hear it was coal. This brown-colored article is not as good as the black, which also abounds here. I am told the coal-beds are profuse, but that they are not worked very systematically.

It was not till within thirty or forty miles of Vienna that I noticed many vineyards; then they began to be seen plentifully, and the grapes sold here are of excellent quality. I can hardly understand why the vine is not more generally cultivated farther north than it is. I saw hundreds of miles of country I deem well adapted to grape growing, where the business is not prosecuted at all. It is probable that the people understand the abilities of their country better than I do, and perhaps they have good reason for not engaging in that sort of culture.

At length we crossed the Danube and were in the precincts of Vienna. In the vicinity where the river rises to great hight in the spring when the heavy rains come and the snows on the hills are melting, a wide space is left for the overflow of the river, which, covered with coarse grass and unsightly weeds, is not as neat in appearance as might be imagined. Soon the station was reached, and a carriage secured to enable me to call upon my friend, Dr. W. K. Dyer, whose home is in Boston, but who for two years has been in Vienna, studying medicine, attending clinical lectures, etc. I soon was comfortably settled at the Hotel Hammerand and prepared for sight-seeing. But more anon; this letter is long enough. Good-bye, D. M. B.

"VOLTAIRE IN EXILE," by Benjamin Gastineau, is a handsome and neatly printed work of 231 pages, published by D. M. Bennett, New York. Mr. Gastineau is a Frenchman by birth, but, as we believe, an American citizen, and stands prominent as a Liberal. The work is published in honor of the centenary of Voltaire, and as a tribute to the memory of the boldest and ablest anti-Christian writer of the last century. It is clearly written and ably portrays the heroic spirit with which Voltaire warred against "L'Infame" (the Infamous), as he termed the Christian religion under which he lived.—Jewish Times.

"Voltaire in Exile" is a new book by M. Gastineau, which has just been issued by D. M. Bennett, the well-known Freethought publisher. It was written a few years ago to meet the occasion of the centenary of Voltaire's death, and is a fitting tribute to the memory of the great man. While entering into many of the smaller details and incidents of his long and checkered career, it is concise and crisp; and, while lauding his many good qualities and his genius, it does not seek to cover up his equally numerous faults, among which not the least were his broad notions regarding the relations of the sexes. The book, in short, is intended to be a faithful history of Voltaire's life in exile—an impartial picture by the hand of an admiring but conscientious artist. The translators, Messrs. T. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg, deserve full credit for the masterly manner in which they hav conveyed the innermost meaning of the original French into the English language. For sale by D. M. Bennett, publisher, New York. Price $1.00.—Sunday Capital.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

Vienna to Athens.

TRIESTE, Oct. 15, 1881.

DEAR FRIENDS IN AMERICA: I am quite favorably impressed with Vienna, the Wien of the Austrians. It is a city of beauty, magnificence, art, music, pleasure, learning, and business. It contains a million inhabitants. With the suburban towns counted, a million and a half are claimed. It is supposed to have been settled by a Celtic tribe known as Windonians, in the century before the Christian era, who are supposed to have been emigrants from Central Asia many centuries before, even, as is claimed, before the Trojan war, and that they came to this locality from the British Isles. Their presence here is proved by the discovery of stone tools, arrow-heads, spears, etc., made of flint stones, as well as numerous graves containing ornaments of bronze and weapons of the same material. This proves an era before the discovery of iron, and hence hundreds of years prior to the time when the Greeks and Romans visited the locality and became masters of the country.

Like all the Celtic tribes, the Windonians were good agriculturists and skilful in the manufacture of ornaments with which to decorate themselves. They were fond of bright colors and gay trappings, a taste which has descended to the inhabitants of the town at the present day. They were also a warlike people, who not only bravely fought their own quarrels, but who were ready to give the Romans a stout resistance when their armies entered the country. Like their brethren of the British Isles and in Persia, they were sun worshipers, and reverenced the stars, being a branch of the Druidic family. The granite altars which they erected were afterward appropriated by the Romans for offering sacrifices to their gods, whose worship, by their superior power, they were able to force into the country. The females of the Celtic tribes were not only beautiful, but they were brave, and went out with their husbands to help them combat with encroaching foes.

Just before the Christian era Drusus and Tiberius, after subduing the people of northern Italy and the Tyrol, marched to the banks of the Danube, and were able to conquer the Celtic tribes, who had long held possession, and long from this time the Romans held command of the country. The oldest Roman memorial is said to be a votive stone dedicated by Tiberius to Jupiter in commemoration of the victory he had given them over the Windonians or the Pannonians, a turbulent people who lived southwest of Vienna, toward Italy.

In the latter part of the second century several tribes of vandals and other warriors made a fierce attack upon the Roman station where Vienna now is, and in the year 169 the good Emperor Marcus Aurelius marched there with his army to reclaim and protect the Roman interests. He defeated the barbarians in a hotly-contested battle, which was fought upon the frozen river. As soon as the ice was broken up he ordered a pontoon bridge to be thrown across the stream, and, meeting them again upon the open field, made the victory a decisive one, which he was preparing to follow up when he was taken sick, and here this great man died in his camp. His incompetent son, Commodus, then took command, and showed himself unequal to it. But I need not follow down the history of this country around Vienna; it is one of continued warfare and bloodshed. My purpose is more to tell you what Vienna is to-day.

The old city occupied but a small portion of the ground covered by the modern town, and was surrounded by a double wall, which has been taken away, and the space is occupied by a splendid street two hundred feet wide, called Ringstrasse, well supplied with shade trees, and on which are the finest residences in the city. Within this Ring street is the Burg, the Imperial Palace, an old-fashioned-looking three-story edifice, surrounding a court say 250 by 150 feet, with bronze and stone statues within the court. In this old part of the city are also St. Stephen's Cathedral, some other churches, and all the old memorable buildings connected with the history of the city in olden times. Many of the streets in this old part are narrow, and some of them crooked and unattractive. Others of them are wider, with a very good class of stone buildings of a permanent character, though many of them look decidedly antique. But it is on the outside of Ring street that the finest, stateliest, and most palatial of the edifices are found; many of them have been constructed within a few years, and are of extraordinary size and splendor, taking up the whole side of a square; some are over four hundred feet long and erected in the highest architectural art, rich in ornamentation, cut-stone, etc. Some of those in course of construction for the University, for the Museum, etc., have finely-carved statuary in reclining positions, forming the upper part of the window-frames, and presenting a very attractive appearance. So many very large buildings standing at such great distances apart remind me a little of the government buildings at Washington without the smaller buildings that intervene. In Vienna there are no small buildings; even the dwellings for the poorer classes are very large, many families occupying the same house. Many of these large public buildings are disconnected from each other, and a sense of loneliness almost crawls over one when he walks around among such stately edifices and at such wide distances apart. I think I prefer our American style of having good high buildings standing compactly together. It seems more social, and to be making better use of the space.

Perhaps I should first say a few words about the old cathedral. It is considered a masterpiece of early feudal and Gothic architecture. It was begun in 1144, and rebuilt after a fire in 1359, since which time it has undergone several restorations. It is 343 feet in length, 222 in width, and 86 in hight. Its spire is much admired as a Gothic structure, and is 436½ feet high, and, next to that of the Strasburg Cathedral, is said to be the tallest in the world. The roof is covered with colored brick or tile, simulating the imperial eagle of Austria. The main body of the edifice is divided into a nave and two aisles. The exterior is embellished with much statuary of the twelve apostles and representations of quaint biblical allegories. It contains the tombs and memorials of departed monarchs and warriors, as well as dignitaries of the church. The stained windows are rich and present much of the antique characteristics. There are paintings of the Virgin and of different incidents in the story of Jesus; but they are getting old and worn. There is much about the old church to be greatly revered by those who venerate such edifices; but to me it seemed a gloomy old place, very fit to be the residence of bats, which would fitly represent the superstitions connected with the old pile.

In the basement, or large room under the cathedral, are some thousands of the bones of those who fell victims to the plague a few hundred years ago; but as the charge to take a person down to see them is some five or six guldens, I concluded a view of a lot of old bones would not be worth that much to me, and declined to make the investment. I have seen all the bones I care to look at for a far smaller sum.

The finest church in Vienna is the modern one, called the Votive Church, built, I believe, by the emperor, partly as a votive offering in memory of the unfortunate Emperor Maxamilian, who lost his life in Mexico, and was a brother or relative of the Austrian emperor. The windows are of the richest stained glass, the columns are massive and elegant, the floors of fine colored marble in figures, and the entire church of the neatest workmanship. In one of the windows is a striking likeness of Maximilian, as well as of the Austrian emperor, empress, the Crown Prince, and the other children. At the recent marriage of the Crown Prince this church, as well as all the other churches of the city, was brilliantly illuminated to the very top of the tall spire; and on the top of the spire of St. Stephen's was a powerful electric light. Every house in the city was illuminated, and the tops or plugs of the gas lights along the streets were taken out, and from every one streamed a tall and strong flame of fire. Probably a greater illumination of the kind never occurred on any occasion.

Among the fine public edifices, governmental and otherwise, are the Imperial Treasury, the Palace of Justice, two imperial museums, the Parliament Palace, the new City Hall, the new play theater, the new University Palace, the Exchange, the Grand Post-Office, the Opera House, the Belvidere Museum, the Imperial Arsenal, besides very many other magnificent structures. Several others are in course of construction of extraordinary dimensions and palatial magnificence. One or two are for additional universities, and two are for museums. I was informed that the most of these expensive edifices are erected by the government, but are partly paid for with the fund that was realized from the material of the double wall which once surrounded the inner city. In fact, nearly everything here is done by the government—the constructing and running of railroads, the telegraph, and public improvements of all kinds. There is little here for private enterprise to attend to, and not a great amount of enterprise is apparent.

The government is a heavy-handed one. Taxation is fearful, amounting to 4.5 per cent upon all the property of the city, and is similarly heavy upon country property. A duty is levied upon everything that enters the city, even in the way of provisions. It is a rule for government officials to examine every basket, box, and package that is brought into town and to levy the stipulated tax. The government is strongly sustained by the military. About forty thousand soldiers are stationed in the city at the present time, and that is about the average number the year round. To accommodate these soldiers extensive buildings, or barracks, are necessary. I saw several companies marching about the city, some Austrians, some Hungarians, and I must speak in the highest terms of their fine appearance and brisk, active step. They are young men serving the three years which the law requires of every able-bodied youth, unless a student, in which case but a single year is exacted, with the additional requirement that he hold himself in readiness if needed for military service. This military burden is extremely heavy upon the country. Royalty is an expensive luxury.

This is a hard place for a poor man. I will mention a single point to illustrate it. It is an unfortunate thing here for a pedestrian to be run down and injured, for he not only has to endure the damage done him, but he has to pay for interrupting the carriage. Coaches and carriages have all the rights of the streets and highways, and the poor pedestrians' rights are of a secondary character. If a man strikes another, however great the provocation, he is fined heavily and imprisoned. An American student, upon being insulted by an Austrian, struck him, but it cost him a thousand guldens and sixty days' imprisonment.

The medical schools and the hospital of Vienna are great institutions. There are over two hundred professors in the medical schools, each chair having two or more professors; and it is said the world does not afford a more learned and skilful faculty. The hospital is the most extensive in the world. It covers twenty acres of ground, inclosing forty-five courts and quadrangles. The building, having fronts of a thousand feet or thereabouts, is two or three stories in hight, but the walls are of the extraordinary thickness of three and a half and four feet. The ventilation is from the top of the windows. The floors are first waxed, and then painted and varnished. The wards are sixty by forty feet, and contain twenty-five to thirty beds each. The entire hospital has four thousand beds. People are brought there for treatment from all parts of the country, and with all manner of diseases. Women also resort there for lying-in purposes, many of whom are poor and unable to provide for themselves. The births in the hospital average twenty-four per day, and the deaths twelve, leaving a net gain of twelve. The treatment in this particular line of practice must be regarded as successful, for the number of deaths on the part of mothers are not six in a thousand.

The plan of managing the new-born infants is somewhat peculiar. As soon as the babe is born, and before it leaves the bed, the number of the bed and of the mother is painted on the arm of the little new-comer; then it is taken into a warm bathing-room, where it is washed and dressed, and afterward taken to its mother. The treatment before the event takes place is of a character to prepare the mother for the ordeal. The aim is to bring the system to a good state of health, and sun-baths are recommended. Of a pleasant day fifty prospective mothers are often seen sitting on the seats in the sun in the courts of the hospital.

The surgical operations performed by the medical faculty in the hospital are truly of a startling character. Prof. Bilroth is probably the most daring operator in the world. In cases of cancer in the stomach he has repeatedly opened the body in the vicinity of the stomach, taken out the diseased portion of the stomach with the knife and then sewed it up again, replacing the stomach where it belongs. In cancer on the tongue, the tongue has been entirely cut out, and, strange to say, the patients are still able to talk so as to be understood, the speaking being effected by the organs of the throat. Two or three cases of this kind are in the hospital at the present time. Operations for ovarian tumors are of very frequent occurrence, averaging about one per day, and half of them, at least, with successful results. I obtained these facts from Dr. Phil. Porter, of Detroit, Mich., who is now spending some time in Vienna to witness the extraordinary surgical operations performed here. He is stopping at the same hotel where I stopped, as are also six other American physicians. He says no such operations as he has seen performed here are undertaken in America. A great number of American physicians and medical students visit Vienna every year, and spend more or less time there to avail themselves of the unusual benefits offered. One hundred American physicians and students on an average are here at all times, and, it is thought, leave on an average $1,000 each with the people of Vienna, which, in the aggregate, makes a rich yearly sum for the Austrians to acquire from the New World. A good proportion of the medical students are from the Southern states.

Jews are numerous in Vienna, and they are fast getting the best positions in business circles, in good paying positions, and even in the medical schools. They first become assistants to professors, and then succeed to the chair. It is said the Rothschilds are using their immense wealth to encourage this patronage of their nationality. All medical professors become K. K's.—a sort of knighthood or degree of honor which is bestowed upon them—and they have this distinction for life. The pay is also remunerativ from the state. Negroes are greatly esteemed in Vienna. The people of the city seem disposed to honor people of African descent more than white people. If a colored woman removes to Vienna, if not too ugly of feature, she is preferred by the young bloods to the pretty women of their own race,

Would it not be well for a thousand or so of the wenches of America to emigrate to Vienna?

There are no houses of prostitution in Vienna, though the number of prostitutes is large. They secure lodgings in such houses as they can, with such families as are willing to tolerate them, though they are required to pay three or four times as much as other persons. They resort to the public cafés every night, where they secure their customers and go with them to their (the customers') rooms or take the customers to their own apartments. They abound in great numbers, and are said, as a class, to be usually good-looking. They also have the credit of conducting themselves with considerable modesty and not to indulge in excessive drinking, as is the case in London and many other cities. The many soldiers always quartered in Vienna and the large number of students and visitors always here are doubtless profitable patrons of this class of women. Although the public women are required to pass a medical examination twice a week and to have the legal examining physician's certificate, a large amount of syphilitic diseases nevertheless exists, and is the source of a great degree of wretchedness. It is said there are many private women who do not subject themselves to this medical examination, and that the terrible disease is quite as prolific among them as the more open and acknowledged prostitutes who have to submit to the semi-weekly inspection. Soldiers are allowed to liv with women without marrying them, but when their military term is over they are required to take as wives the women they have thus lived with.

But at best a low state of morals exists in this super-Christian city. It is said over half the births are illegitimate. The emperor once being requested to grant licenses for houses of prostitution, shrugged his shoulders and objected, saying he might in that case as well throw a roof over the whole of Vienna and grant licenses to all the inmates. It is said there is a greater percentage of illegitimate births in Naples than in any other city; that Vienna is second, Paris third, New York fourth, and London fifth.

The Museum and Belvidere picture gallery were duly visited, but though very good I do not regard these collections of paintings equal to those in Paris, London, Berlin, and Dresden, though of course they are very good paintings. Among these are celebrated works by Unger, Titian, Rubens, Dürer, and among those of Italian masters, Coreggi, Raphael, Moretti, and the Spanish Velasquez. The grounds of the museum are beautiful and comprise about twenty acres, laid off with due regard to beauty and artistic effect, and embellished with fountains and statues.

The Belvidere collection is the largest and finest in the city, and in addition are the Albertine Gallery, the Academy of Fine Arts; the Czernin Gallery, the Harrach Gallery; the Josefinum Anatomical-pathological Institute of wax models; the Leichenstein Gallery, with other art exhibitions, the Polytechnic Institute and others. I did not attempt to see all of them.

The stores are neat, and well supplied with goods, but small. In fact, there are very few stores in Europe equal in size to those we have in America. The stocks of goods also are small. The shoe stores have not more than one-third the stock that our New York stores carry. Confectionery stores are scarce. I saw only one in all my travels around the city. I think the further south the less of confections and sugar goods are used.

My friends, Dr. W. K. Dyer and Miss Holmes, were kind enough to accompany me about the city, and attended the Vienna theater with me, where the fine and humorous operatta, "The Waterman," was played. The music, the scenery, and the entire performance were first-class and well attended by intelligent men and women. If I could have understood German I undoubtedly would have enjoyed it somewhat better.

I called upon Mr. Oscar Tobias, whom I met in Rome last year, when we spent several days together. He returned the visit in the evening at my hotel, where we passed the evening together and talked over the pleasant times we had last year. He is in one of the banks of Vienna.

Vienna is noted for its good bread-bakers. There is not another city in the world where such excellent bread is made. We called upon one of these bakers, looked at the oven, and listened to the process followed. Excellent flour is obtained from Hungary. It is worked carefully and made into small loaves or cakes weighing one or two ounces, and baked quick in a low oven made of a kind of cement. Water is thrown upon the bread in the oven to give it a gloss. Much of the bread is made in long fingers and bent in the shape of a horseshoe. It is said the people of Vienna use a great amount of cakes and pastry.

The Viennese have the reputation of being very genial, good-natured, peaceful people; slow to anger, and not anxious to redress injuries. Some people who have lived in the city for months say they have not seen the people in ill-humor.

Paper money is in general circulation, ranging from one gulden to two hundred guldens. A gulden should be worth fifty cents or two shillings sterling, but on account of the depreciation of the paper a sovereign worth five dollars will buy eleven or twelve guldens in paper. The small coin used for making change is largely adulterated with copper. The kreutzers are small copper coins of the value of half a cent.

The inhabitants of Vienna are of mixed nationalities. Besides the German Hungarians who abound in large numbers, many Bohemians and Moravians are here, together with Servians, Montenegroes, Jews, and other nationalities. But they seem to get along very well together.

The most prominent manufactures are lace, Bohemian glass, furniture and upholstery, meerschaum pipes, amber, ivory, and tortoise-shell goods, artistic woodwork, artistic and fancy leather goods, etc., but these seem not to be done to a great extent; the wealth of the nation is not largely increased by the manufactures of Vienna.

I observed there is not a very cordial feeling between Germans in the vicinity of Vienna and those of Prussia and northern Germany. Many remarks are made that indicate this. It is not impossible that Austria will some day join France to castigate Prussia. It seems more than probable that permanent peace is not yet established in Europe.

The theaters, of which there are some twenty or more, and the opera commence their exhibitions at seven in the evening and get through about ten; then all the good people repair to their homes and to their beds, and the town by half past ten becomes the quietest of any city of its size I was ever in. The cafés, however, keep open nearly all night, where the frail sisterhood congregate and students, soldiers, clerks, etc., of the opposite sex. Negotiations are effected here, but I am informed that that the places are conducted very orderly and that riots and disturbances seldom take place. For a few minutes I was taken into one of these cafés where the waiters or attendants were girls, dressed in neat Turkish costumes. The place is a large one and is visited by a large number of people. I learned that the girls have to be there from nine in the evening till six in the morning for the sum of one gulden, or fifty cents if the money was of equal value with ours. Wages are low in Vienna.

There is some complaint made because the empress, the wife of Emperor Francis Joseph, so seldom shows herself to the people, holding herself in far too great reserve and seclusion to suit her subjects. She is said to take more pleasure in going to Ireland and engaging in the sport of hunting through the summer season than anything else. Since several years ago she discovered a dancing girl leaving the emperor's room, it is said she has been in a taciturn state of mind, and has shown very little disposition to see much society. There is no doubt but that crowned heads have their little unpleasantnesses as well as other people who never wear a crown. She is called a very pretty woman. I saw her picture and judge she must look very well.

Funerals here are said to be conducted with great pomp, the hearse being fitted out in almost fantastic style, the flowing robes of the professional mourners being almost ridiculous, and the pageantry in other respects of an extravagant character. The funeral procession of one of the ministers of state who had suddenly died with a disease of the heart appeared on the streets on the last day I was in the city, but I was not fortunate enough to be at the right place at the right time so as to be able to witness it.

The Prater, the great park of the city, consists of a series of low and partly wooded islands formed by arms of the Danube which separate from the main trunk to join it lower down. The entrance to it is situated at the extremity of the street called Jägerseile. Here is an open circular space, from which branch out six avenues. Near the first is the terminus of the Northern railroad. The second, on the right, leads to the Panorama, the Circus, and the coffee houses, and is the most frequented. Here the Viennese sit under the shade by the numerous tables, and take their tea, coffee, and beer. The two great days for visiting the Prater are said to be Easter Monday and the 1st of May. These are public holidays, and if the weather is fine the whole city pours itself into the Prater. It is then that new equipages and fine liveries are seen for the first time. From the emperor with his four ambling coursers down to the humblest individual who is able to ride in a hackney coach the grounds are equally free, and everybody is there in some style or other. Farther in the interior the common classes chiefly congregate, and on special days the frying of wurst (sausages) and the emptying of wine bottles and beer kegs show great industry on the part of the populace. Shows, theaters, mountebanks, jugglers, punchinellos, rope dancing, swings, etc., are the allurements which entice the multitude to part with their kreutzers. Music and waltzing are constantly in operation, and give great liveliness to the varied scenes. The Prater being four miles in length, it is capable of accommodating the masses who flock there.

There are several villages and places of resort in the vicinity of Vienna, some of which are palaces for the emperor and his family, and some visiting-places for the populace. Among them may be named Saxonburg, Schonbrunz, Penzin-Hietzing, Rechenau, Leopoldsburg, Klosterneuberg, Lobau Island, etc. I did not have the time to visit any of these suburban places, but presume they are interesting.

About the Jews.

An opinion prevails that people are hostil to the Jews on account of their nationality. Many people believe the condition of the Jews and their dispersion are fulfilment of certain prophecies made by Isaiah, Christ, and others. Indeed some of our Liberals are not posted on the subject, and are stumped when in argument the Jews are cast up to them. Now the fact is that a thousand years before Christ's day the Jews were just as they are now, scattered all over the earth, hated and despised by the mobs of cities. Let any class of people liv to themselvs as do the Jews, and they will meet with the Jews' treatment. The Mormons in this country, the Parsees in India, are examples. Reading Philo, the Jews, fourth volume, articles against Flavius, and concerning embassadors, one sees his descriptions of the condition and treatment of the Jews by the people of various cities will, with the change of a few words, describe the same things ever since. They were treated just exactly as th y were in Europe in the middle ages, confined to their own quarters, fined, mobbed, and murdered in every outbreak, and all for the very same causes. Philo says, "No one country can contain the Jews, on which account they frequent the most populous and fertil countries of Europe and Asia, whether islands or continents." Again he says, "The Jews are spread over the whole face of the earth, throughout every continent and over every island, so that everywhere it appears but little inferior in numbers to the nativs." This was written in the year 30.

Josephus says the same—chap. vii., Antiquities, book 14: "All the Jews throughout the habitable earth sent their contributions from the most ancient times." Quoting Strabo he says, "Now these Jews are already gotten into all cities and it is hard to find a spot on the habitable earth that hath not admitted this tribe of men and is not possessed by them." This was when speaking of a time long anterior to Christ.

They were always usurers, jewelers, and dealers in clothing. Let any people profess a peculiar religion and hold themselvs aloof from the rest of the world and they will be treated just as hav been the Jews. Those of them who hav abandoned their tribal connection hav finally become lost amid the great mass. In the United States many hav done so to my knowledge, and their descendants are never suspected of being Jews.

W. F. Jamieson in Illinois.

The first course of Liberal lectures ever given in Petersburg, Ill., was by Mr. Jamieson. The attendance increased from the first lecture until the fine Opera House was crowded, every chair being in demand, including those on the platform. The Petersburg Observer contained the following:

"Prof. Jamieson's Liberal lecture Thursday night was fairly attended, and very interesting to those present. The professor is a pleasant and fluent speaker and thoroughly understands his subject. He should be greeted with large audiences to-night, to-morrow, and to-morrow night. 'Prove all things, hold fast to that which is good.' We dislike bigotry in anything, and the individual who confines his ideas to the teachings of his own particular creed is to be pitied. By all means go and hear what Prof. Jamieson has to say.

A friend of ours, a good Christian brother, by the way, asked us confidentially who paid the expenses of Prof. Jamieson's lectures? We studied a while and told him we hardly knew, if it wasn't the fellows that had no fears of the place that was ruled out of the revised edition and weren't afraid of the devil. He sighed and said he hadn't thought of that.

He was announced to giv two more lectures on Sunday, Nov. 20th, at the same place.

Enlisted for the Winter.

To the Liberals of Western New York and of the West:

After an experience of two months in the lecture field I hav decided to devote myself entirely to lecturing during the coming winter. I will be home about the 5th of December. I would like to lecture in western and central New York during that month, and about the 1st of January I shall start on a lecturing tour through the West as far as Kansas. I wish those of my friends who would like to hav me lecture for them would at once address me at Salamanca, N. Y. I will make my terms satisfactory.

H. L. GREEN.

KALLOCH, of San Francisco, is now repudiated by most of the respectable Baptists on the Pacific coast. Recently he went all the way to Portland, Oregon, to deliver a lecture. and was severely snubbed. He wants to go to Congress, but his popularity appears to hav run out to such an extent that he stands a poor chance of being elected. His former friend, Denis Kearney, is no longer intimate with him.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE EVANGELISTS.

After the societies of half-Jews and half-Christians had been well established among the common people at Jerusalem, Antioch, Ephesus, Corinth, Alexandria, and for some time after Vespasian, each little congregation wished to hav its own evangelist. We hav counted as many as fifty-four, and there were still more to be numbered. They contradict themselvs, as is well known, and it could not hav been otherwise, since they sprang up in different places. All agree, however, that their Jesus was the son of Maria, or Mirja, and that he was hung or crucified, and they attribute to him wonders which are to be found in the "Metamorphoses" of Ovid.

Luke givs him an entirely different genealogy from that manufactured by Matthew. No one dreams of giving the genealogy of Mary, from whom Jesus is directly descended. The enthusiastic Pascal exclaims, "That could not hav been made in concert." Without a doubt. Each one wrote of these wonderful actions—evolved from the fancy—for his own little congregation. Here is one evangelist who pretends that the child Jesus was brought us in Egypt; here is another one who said that he remained at Bethlehem all his youthful days; another one says that he went to Jerusalem one time, while the fourth one declares that he went three times. One says that three magi, which we call kings, came upon the day of his birth, conducted by a new star; and it is added that all the children of the country were killed by the order of Herod the first, who was then approaching his end.* The other evangelists are silent about the star, the magi, and the slaughter of the children.

We hav at last been obliged to write a concordance in order to explain these many contradictions, and this concordance is still less in accord with that which is to be harmonized. Almost all the books of the evangelists were evidently forged after the capture of Jerusalem. There is very good proof of this in the book attributed to Matthew. That book puts into the mouth of Jesus these words. Speaking to the Jews, he says, "You shall render an account for all the blood poured forth since the day of Abel the Just to Zachariah, the son of Barachiah, whom you hav sacrificed in your temple and upon your altars."

A falsifier always discovers himself in some way. There was during the siege of Jerusalem a Zachariah, son of Barachiah, who was assassinated before the temple and altar by a band of zealots. By this circumstance the imposture is easily discovered. But to discover the lie at the time it was made it was necessary to read the whole of the Bible. The Greeks and the Romans read very little of it. The evangelists and their follies were entirely unknown to them, so they could lie with impunity.

There is one thing which also makes it evident that the book attributed to Matthew was written a long time after his death, by some unfortunate half-Jew, half-Christian Greek. The following is the celebrated passage, "If he does not believe in the church, he should be in your eyes even as a pagan and publican" There was no church in the times of Jesus and Matthew. The word church is Greek. The assembly of people at Athens was called Ecclesia. That expression was only adopted by the Christians in later times, when they had some form of government. It is then very evident that some one has used the name of Matthew in writing, in very bad Greek, that book. And I must confess that it is very comical that Matthew, who was a publican, should compare pagans to publicans. But whoever may be the author of that ridiculous comparison, he could not be otherwise than one callous of the feelings of a people who regarded a Roman taxgatherer as a cruel man. This idea alone is destructiv of all order, and is not only unworthy of a man inspired by God, but unworthy of a serving-man.

There are two gospels of the infant Jesus Christ. The first relates that a young beggar struck his companion, Christ, upon the back and that Jesus caused him to die immediately. Upon another occasion he makes small birds of glazier's earth, and they fly. The way he learned his alphabet was divine. These tales are no more ridiculous than those about the elevation of Jesus by the devil, the transfiguration upon Thabor, changing water into wine, and driving the devil into a body of hogs. The gospels of the infant Christ were for a long time accepted as true.

The second gospel of the infant Christ is no less wonderful. Mary takes her son into Egypt, and there meets some women who were very melancholy because their brother had been changed into a mule. Mary and her infant remained there only long enough to metamorphose the mule into the shape of a man, not knowing whether that unfortunate animal was obtained in a trade. Taking to their way, the wandering family met two robbers, one named Dumachus and the other named Titus.* Dumachus was very anxious to rob the sainted virgin and to violate her. Titus took the part of Mary and gave Dumachus forty drachmas to let the woman pass her way without being harmed. Jesus declared to the sainted virgin, his mother, that Dumachus was a sneak thief and Titus was a good thief; that they would hang beside himself one day, and Titus would go to heaven and Dumachus to the devil.

The gospel according to Saint James, the oldest brother of Jesus, or according to Father Barjonah—the gospel recognized and vaunted by Tertullian and Origen—had a very large acceptance. It was called the "Protevangelion," the first gospel. It is, probably, the first which speaks of the new star, of the birth in the manger, and of the children which Herod the first had slaughtered.

There is another gospel, or the Acts of John, where it is said that Jesus dances with his apostles the night before his death. This is very probable, since the Therapeuts were, in fact, accustomed to dance around, which should please the heavenly father very much.†

Why do the strictest Christians of to-day laugh without much ado at all the gospels and acts which are not canonical? They dare not to laugh at those which were adopted by the church. They are, however, very nearly alike. But the bigots adore those things under one name which they ridicule under another.

Four gospels were selected, for the great reason that there were four cardinal winds, as Saint Irenæus says. Another reason is that God was supported by cherubims, and they had four faces. Saint Jerome or Hieronymus, in his preface upon the gospel of Mark, adds to these reasons another one, to wit: because there were four rings upon the pillars which supported the chest called the ark.

Theophilus of Antioch proved that Lazarus having been dead four days could only be described in four gospels. Saint Cyprian proved the same thing by the fact that four rivers had their source in Eden. It should be the hight of impiety not to giv these reasons.

But before they had given preference to the four gospels the fathers of the first two centuries continually cited the books which are now called apocryphal. This is, in our opinion, incontestable proof that our four gospels were not written by those to whom they are attributed. I wish that Luke had written that which is ascribed to him. I should then say to Luke, How dare you to advance the proposition that Jesus was born under the government of Cyrenius or Quirinus, since it is settled that Quirinus was not governor of Syria for more than ten years afterward? How can you hav the effrontery to say that Augustus ordered the enumeration of the whole earth, and that Mary went to Bethlehem in order to hav herself counted in? The enumeration of the whole earth—what an expression! We hav heard that Augustus had a book which contained in detail the census of the forces of the empire and the value of property; but the enumeration of all the subjects of the empire is what I never would hav thought of, much less the enumeration of the population of the entire earth. No Roman, Greek, or barbarian writer has ever written so extravagantly. A person is convinced by the very thing itself that it was a mere dream, and yet we must adore the Bible.

Who, then, wrote the four gospels? Is it not very probable that the authors of them were Grecian Christians, since the Old Testament—except the version of the Septuagint, which was unknown in Judea—is never cited? The apostles knew nothing more of Greek than Jesus, who knew little. How could they cite the Septuagint? There is no miracle of the Pentecost which could teach Greek to those ignorant Jews.

What an assemblage of contradictions and falsehoods are found in these four gospels! Were there no other one than the above contradiction about the enumeration, that one would be sufficient to demonstrate that it is a work of mistakes and misleading conjectures. That tale about Jesus being born in the time of Cyrenius, when Augustus ordered the census to be taken, is sufficient to make the book unworthy as an authority. There never was such a census taken, and no one has ever spoken of it. Secondly, Cyrenius was not governor of Syria for no less than ten years after the birth of Jesus. So much for the words and errors in the gospels. And it is such as this that has so taken the people.

* This slaughter of the children was surely the hight of folly. The tale about the three magi and the star is no better. How could Herod, who killed himself at that time, fear that the son of a carpenter, born in a village, would dethrone him? Herod held his kingdom through the Romans. It would hav been necessary for Jesus to wage war against the empire. Could such fear rack the mind of a man who was not absolutely a fool? Is it possible, as some one has suggested, that human credulity is bestial in its character? Man is a despicable being if he is so governed. [1771.]

Voltaire insists that these observations be used in explaining the Bible.

*These are pleasant names for Egyptians; and curious ones indeed. [1771.]

†It is not said in Matthew that Jesus danced with the apostles, but it is said in Matt. xxvi, 30: "And when they had sung a hymn they went out unto the Mount of Olives."

It is true that in that hymn is found the verse, "I can sing; let all dance for joy." This makes it appear a melange of dancing and singing, just as was usual in all religious ceremonies of those times. St. Augustine givs that song in his letter to Ceretius. It is a matter of indifference to know whether that song, as Augustine says, was chanted or not, but here it is:

"I can delivérer, and I can be delivered.
I can save, and I can be saved.
I can generate, and I can be generated.
I can sing, dance ye for joy.
I can weep, let grief overcome you.
I can decorate, and I can be decorated.
I am a lamp for those who see me.
I am a door for those who knock.
You who see what I am say nothing of what I am.
I hav played all in this song, but I hav, of all, not been played."

Here is strange song; it is indeed worthy of the supreme being. [1775.]

This little canticle is what we call persiflage in France and nonsense in England. It does not by any means prove that Jesus sung before the Passover, but it is proved by all the gospels that he celebrates the Passover according to the Jewish and not according to the Christian manner. We may say here that Lord Bolingbroke insinuated elsewhere that no action, dogma, rite, or saying could be found in the life of Jesus Christ which in the least resembled the Christianity of the present day, and still less the Christianity of Rome. [1771.]

Bolingbroke in one of his letters says: "The Christian goes murmuring and complaining through this life against the justice of God, and therefore deserves little to taste of his goodness in a future state." [Note by Translator.]

Elmina on Prayer.

"MY DEAR MADAM: I am afraid you seldom humble yourself in prayer before Jesus. D——."

No, my friend, I certainly do not. I hav l ed to earn what I want by honest labor, and not eg for it of myths that never had an existence. I - not remember of ever praying, not even when I was a little Quaker girl, save when I would lose my needle and mother would insist on my hunting till it was found. There were six girls of us, and father was a hard-working farmer, and it took lots of needles to keep so many little fingers busy, and children are proverbially careless; so when I got tired of looking for one I had lost I've asked God to help me find it, and imagined he did, as it generally made its appearance after the appeal. But now in this age of machines one needle will sew for years, and be always in its place, so I've no need to pray.

The wonder to me is that any sensible grown-up person can hav faith in prayer when year after year goes by and they find the gods are deaf and dumb, and not a prayer is ever answered or an appeal ever heard. That children believe in its efficacy is no marvel, for a child naturally believes all it is told; and seeing those to whom it looks up to for guidance so earnest in prayer for what they desire, the child is compelled to believe from mere force of circumstances. Those who hav closely watched the course of the ones who hav been praying for the recovery of Garfield—how, when life was almost gone, they would see "God's pleasure" in removing him "for some wise purpose," and then when favorable bulletins went forth they would claim that the nation's prayers had saved him—must be convinced that prayer never saved life.

If this one life that was prayed for more earnestly than any life ever was prayed for before, and by thousands more people, at home and in churches and everywhere, could not be saved, even when this same God so directed the "not necessarily fatal bullet" that is touched no vital part, what possible reason can there be for believing any other life will ever be saved through its efficacy, or any other asked-for blessing given?

When man becomes self-reliant, self-cofindent, and truly wise he will cease to pray and learn to work for what he wants. We will take as much care in providing for the generation of wise, good, gentle, and kind Lincolns and Garfields and eliminating from posterity such cool, calculating, selfish, moral idiots as Guiteau.

To-day I read the first sensible sermon on the nation's tragedy that I hav yet seen. I will quote a portion of it for our readers:

"At the West Church yesterday morning, Rev. C. A. Bartol proached on 'The Generation of Guiteau,' choosing for his text the words in Matthew xi, 6, 'And whereunto shall I liken this generation?' The speaker first quoted the following remark made by Mark Twain after having listened to a discussion in a radical meeting concerning the transmission of qualities from parent to child: 'Now I know what is the matter with me. A lot of damaged goods has been palmed off on me from my ancestors, that hav given me trouble to dispose of them ever since I was born.' The question, continued the speaker, is how far our manifestations of character are from our individual will or the result of blood, the transmission of qualities. This question of blood comes up continually in our social relations and its influence has been too lightly considered; now, however, it is brought home when fifty million people in this country and one hundred million in other countries are to-day asking why Guiteau shot the President. Was he simply sinful or insane, a free agent or political automaton? No one is quite sure. The Republican press desires to show that there is nothing in the present administration that may be held as a cause of this act, and in the Democratic sheets no advantage has been taken of the situation to impute it to their opponent's folly or fault. But what is there in the atmosphere of this country that will generate such a creature as that now imprisoned, waiting his doom? Again, the act of the soldier, Mason, who tried to shoot him, was just as monstrous as that of Guiteau. We must remember that Guiteau is not only a man, but a symptom. We begot him, and our peculiar freedom was his parent; he is a son of liberty, unqualified liberty, liberty to do and say anything so long as we keep within the statute bounds.

"The question arises, What is the liberty of ambition, passion, etc., but the worst kind of subjugation? Does such a mind as Guiteau's start up by its own volition? In our American politics are there no uncleanned, filthy bogs? Shall our honored President be president of a party or section of a party? For it is section in party that has brought about this great catastrophe. However he may hav been chosen, when once chosen he should not know a Republican or Democrat, but his fellow-citizens alone. Is it quite so at the present time? Do we know what enormous power lodges yonder in the White House, based on public patronage? Don't we need civil-service reform or an amendment to the Constitution? Guiteau, seeing the seemingly unjust distribution of patronage, and becoming possessed of the absurd notion that if Arthur were President he, a stalwart of the stalwarts, would hav his share of the national pile, sought to remove the only obstacle in his way. Let the assassin not be liberated, for he must be prevented from doing further harm; but I hope that from the coffin no gallows will be reared. This man is one of us. Although it may humble our national pride he is 'E pluribus unum;' he belongs to a class. We generated him. At the present time we export dynamite and import Nihilists, as if we had not enough of them indigenous. If a father drinks, his son will probably follow his example; if a brilliant orator addresses a people, they will be found to follow his sentiments. My point is the connection by generation of any people, nation, tribe, or country. Sympathy for all is the true principle. Everybody has prayed for President Garfield; who has prayed Guiteau? Doesn't he need your prayers? We are all in one boat, not as men scattered about in dories on the wide ocean, but as passengers in a great steamer. Do you say we can, every man, look after our own affairs? We improve grains, flowers, and vegetables, and evolve finer breeds of horses and cattle; beasts are born again under our care, but men raise not our ambition. We hav been informed that from one morally diseased couple one hundred criminals hav been born, generation succeeding generation. We say scrofulous or consumptiv persons should not be allowed to marry. Then should criminals, murderers, thieves, be bound in wedlock? If we saw a man sowing poison ivy or deadly nightshade in a field we would hav him arrested. But is it less a sin for him to sow his vices broadcast?"

Is it not encouraging when we see in our secular papers such sermons as this? Does it not teach a wise reliance on human work instead of pious prayers?

The world moves. Let us all rejoice and work on in faith and hope, for the light daily grows brighter and old superstitions are fading away before its brilliancy. We will be too honest to pray.

Too honest to ask for a crust or a cup,
While rain cometh down and grain cometh up.
Too honest to pray that eternal decrees
Be changed as a creature of moments may please.
Too honest to call for a balm from above
While the earth is budding and blooming with love.
Too honest to dream of a life of pure bliss
While workers and helpers are needed in this.
Too honest and brave in the battle of life
To falter while thousands are breasting the strife.
Too honest to think of an armor of prayer
While bravest of bosoms go naked and bare.
Too honest to reach for a crown e'en in thought
While brows that are noblest of laurels hav nought.
Too honest to rob Mother Earth of a tear
While human hearts bend o'er the pall and the bier.
Too honest to long for a realm of the blest
While hope is alive in humanity's breast.
Too honest to cry for a savior to save
While brothers go down 'neath the tide and the wave.
Too honest to cringe 'neath the lash of the priest;
Too human to tremble like the fear-stricken beast.

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

What I Don't Believe.

PART II.—NO. 60.

683. The manner in which Judas betrayed Jesus is differently stated by each narrator; they all make the salutation employed on the occasion unlike the others. Even if one of them was correct, the others must have been in error. Such discrepancies are fatal to their being all derived from one source of truth.

684. The number of times the cock crew is differently stated—one says twice, the others say once. They could not all have been correct.

685. The number of times Peter denied Jesus is also a matter of dispute. Mark says it was once, the others say it was three times. Did they all tell the exact truth? If one falsified, which was it?

686. The inscription said to have been placed upon the cross is differently stated by each one. How are we to know what the real inscription was? I don't believe it ever can be known.

687. They also differ as to where the crucifixion took place. Luke says it was Calvary, while the others say it was Golgatha, the place of the skulls. It is my opinion that he was not crucified in both places, and that a falsehood is out between the four.

688. There is a contradiction between Matthew and Mark as to the color of the robe which Jesus wore, one saying it was scarlet, the other purple. Whichever it was, it would seem they might both have told the truth about it.

689. They disagree nearly as badly about the hour the crucifixion took place. Matthew says it was the ninth hour, Mark the third, Luke the ninth, and John the sixth. Can any one tell which of them told the truth? I am by no means sure that either of them did.

690. There is no better agreement as to what was given Jesus to drink while upon the cross. Matthew says it was "vinegar mingled with gall;" Luke was content to have it "vinegar" straight; while John insists upon "vinegar and hyssop." It might have been one of these drinks, and it might not have been either of them. It may not make the slightest difference which it was, or whether he drank it all or not; but I must insist that if we have to believe the story or go to hell it ought to be told each time the same way. It cannot possibly be the four were all strictly truthful. Three at least stated what was not true, and now we ought to have another revelation to tell us which one to believe.

691. The last words said to have been uttered by Jesus are not stated alike by any two of them; each has a version of his own, and which tells the truth is beyond all the power of human wisdom to decide. None of them, however, makes it out that he died bravely. His courage seemed to fail him, and he rebuked his father with having forsaken him. He did not die as bravely as did the heathen Socrates, who fearlessly drank the poison that was handed him, and died like a hero without a word or murmur. Jesus should have had greatly the advantage of Socrates, for Jesus must have known that after a few hours of suffering he would again be in his delightful paradise from which he had been an exile between thirty and forty years. It would seem that that very moment should have been the happiest of his life. The time had come for him to sever the tie which bound him to this doleful world, when he would again be restored to the joys of heaven.

It has been said that he "died like a god," but if he did it was a cowardly god, who could not forego short temporary pain for the sake of the incomparable joys of his celestial home. I cannot admit that he died like a god who was glad to leave this world and return to his happy mansion in the regions of bliss.

692. There is a disagreement between Mark and John as to how Joseph of Arimathea begged the body of Jesus. Mark says it was done "boldly;" the other "secretly." If one told the truth the other did not. Possibly neither did.

693. There is another serious disagreement as to who first visited the sepulcher on Sunday morning. Matthew says it was Mary Magdalene or the other Mary, or Mary What's-her-name; Mark says it was Mary, the mother of James and Saloma; Luke says it was Johanna and Mary, while John says it was Mary Magdalene, and nobody with her. Now here is a good chance for every reader to take his choice; there is scope enough for everybody to make a selection. But in sober good sense I would ask, Have not at least three of these infallible writers just made a slight mistake for once? If the truth is of any consequence at all in such a heavenly narration, should not at least two of them have been able to tell the same story? I am afraid they will have to be counted as the tellers of untruths.

694. They differ also as to how the stone was rolled away from the mouth of the sepulcher. They seem unable to agree on anything.

695. They differ also as to the number of angels seen on that momentous occasion. Matthew says it was one angel; Mark says it was a young man; Luke says two young men, while John will have it two angels. Here, again, is room for everybody to choose to suit himself. But I cannot believe that these four writers were truthful witnesses.

696. They disagree just about as widely as to the position the angels or the young man occupied; some having it sitting, some standing, some inside, and some outside. As an extenuating characteristic of this story, it is only fair to say that neither of the four writers were present when these events took place; and as they probably had no guess at what they stated, it is perhaps only reasonable that they should not all guess alike. But this concession is fatal to the theory of divine inspiration in directing them what to say.

697. There is the same disagreement as to whom Jesus first appeared to after his resurrection. Matthew says two women; Mark one woman; Luke two apostles; John one woman, while Paul, in 2 Cor. xv, 5–8, says it was Cephas, and consequently none of the others at all. Among such a diversity of statements how is any one to be able to tell which is the truth, or whether there is any truth among them all? I confess I cannot discover it.

698. The announcement that Jesus had arisen and had been seen was not made alike by any two of them. They are just as much at sea here as in all the other statements. What confusion! What falsehood!

699. There is, if possible, a still wider difference of statement as to how many persons Jesus appeared to after his resurrection, and on what number of occasions. Matthew says two—to the women at the sepulcher, and later to the eleven in Galilee; Mark says three—to Mary Magdalene, to two disciples, and to the disciples at meat; Luke says three times—to Cleophas and his companion, to Peter and the eleven, and to others. John must needs excel the others, and he says four times—to Mary Magdalene, to the disciples with Thomas, to the disciples without Thomas, and to several on the Tiberias Lake. But Paul even excels John; he makes the appearances number no less than six times—to Peter, to the twelve, to more than five hundred, to James, to all the apostles, and finally to Paul himself. If here is not a nice disagreement, then I am no judge. How can any one believe they all told the truth? They neither agree as to the number of times he appeared nor the persons to whom he appeared. Here are certainly serious misstatements.

700. The great disagreement as to the matter of the ascension is, if possible, worse than all the rest. If Jesus bodily ascended up to heaven, it surely was one of the most remarkable events that ever took place, and the four writers of the gospel should have narrated the matter carefully and exactly agreed in what they had to say. But what are the facts? There scarcely could have been a greater divergence of statements than between these four writers of the so-called God's word. Matthew did not know that the ascension ever took place, or he did not deem it of sufficient consequence to say a word about it, though he found time to describe pretty minutely the numerous times that devils were cast out of some men or woman. Mark disputed the momentous event in this summary manner, "So, then, after the Lord had spoken unto them he was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand side of God." How he was able to tell on which side of God he took his seat he does not deign to tell us. Possibly he guessed at it, as he evidently did at many others of the statements he made. Luke says Jesus led his disciples out as far as Bethany, when he lifted up his hands and blessed them, whereupon he was carried up into heaven. As Luke was not present on the occasion, perhaps we should give him the credit of telling it in quite a straightforward manner. John had not heard of the little event when he wrote his version of the Jesus story, or he deemed it of altogether too small consequence for him to bother himself with. He utterly ignored the whole thing. I must admit that with the testimony we have before us, silent and contradictory as it is, I cannot believe that any such bodily ascension ever took place. Had the story possessed the important element of truth the four evangelists would have dilated on the matter in full, and other writers and historians would have known something about it and would have written clear and coherent accounts of the wonderful occurrence.

701. There is equally as great a disagreement as to what Judas did with himself after he had betrayed his Lord and Master. Matthew says he returned the thirty pieces of silver to the priests and went and hanged himself. But the writer of Acts says he fell headlong and burst himself in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out. If this writer told the truth, then Matthew did the opposite and told a falsehood; both statements could not be true.

702. The statement of Matthew that at the crucifixion the sun was darkened and that an earthquake occurred by which the veil of the temple was rent, and the graves were opened, and that the dead were made alive again so that they walked forth from their graves, and associated again with their former companions, is extremely incredible. If such a thing occurred it was the most remarkable event that ever took place, and hundreds of writers, including many who were not Jews, should have described the great event; but in place of that not a person ever had a word to say about it save Matthew. Neither Mark, Luke, nor John knew anything of it. Josephus knew nought of it. Pontius Pilate knew nothing of it, for had he done so he would have transmitted such a remarkable occurrence to the home government at Rome, and the matter would have entered into the history of the times. It is indeed a most remarkable and unheard-of thing for dead persons who have been lying one, two, three, or ten years in their graves to all at once recover life and activity, the decomposed bodies to go to breathing again, the heart that for years had ceased to throb to resume beating, the blood which had long been congealed and decayed should again be vivified and commence coursing through the dead veins, and it is hard to believe such a statement of a single person, especially when that person has been detected in making a large number of extravagant statements which evidently were devoid of truth. I do not believe that any such occurrence ever took place; and I would feel justified in not believing anything a man could say who indulges in such impossible statements, unless he is well sustained by corroborative testimony.

703. Among the many other reasons why Matthew is unworthy of credence the following may be mentioned: He narrates with the assurance of one who has positive knowledge several incidents of which he could not know from being an eye-witness, and in several instances where none of the apostles were present, and he did not tell us how he obtained his information. Some of these are the conception of Mary, the dream of Joseph, the birth of Jesus, the visit of the magi, the fleeing of parents and child into Egypt, the slaughter of the innocents, the discussion with doctors in the temple, the baptism in the Jordan, the descent of the Holy Ghost in the form of a dove, the fast of forty days, the temptation by the devil, the transportation of Jesus by the devil to the pinnacle of the temple, and to an exceeding high mountain, the delivery of the Sermon on the Mount, the feeding of the five thousand, the calming of the waves, the transfiguration, the agony and prayer in Gethsemane, the denial of Peter, the dream of Pilate's wife, the conversation between Pilate and his wife, the colloquy between Pilate and the chief priests, the security of the sepulcher, etc. When a man writes as facts the occurrences he did not witness, and many of them which no one witnessed, the question very naturally arises as to how he obtained his information, and upon what authority he makes his statements. He must make some of them from rumors upon the basis of what others may have seen, while others again were entirely drawn from the imagination, as there was no witness of them. Matthew never once tells us that any information had been imparted to him by inspiration, and had he done so, after all the big stories he tells, we would be quite justified in doubting his word. I take the liberty of doing so most decidedly. A man who pretends to tell what other people dream is not safe to believe.

The Danger of Too Much Piety.

The trial of Guiteau, which began on the 14th, is likely to be a standing warning against religion. This case seems to be one of religious fanaticism backed up by colossal egotism. It is painful to know that his example has been followed by other religious cranks, one going to the White House and showing his credentials, signed by the Lord Almighty, as President of the United States. The President's attendants seem to hav been impious persons, not caring much about the Lord's signature, for they promptly hustled the would-be President out and handed him over to the police, who consigned him to a lunatic asylum and sent for his friends to take him away.

Religious fanaticism has led thousands of people to commit foolish and cruel deeds, and it is time the world knew where to lay the blame. Unless the religious world is willing to own that every man who took part in the Crusades, that every religious zealot in a time when the whole of Europe was kept in turmoil by religious wars, was crazy, they must father Guiteau's dastardly act and acknowledge that it was religion that fired the fatal shot at Garfield. In spite of his counsel's and the judge's prohibition, Guiteau managed to let his speech get into public print, and it is full of the pious cant and twaddle common in Methodist prayer-meetings. He says that the "Lord and I took the responsibility of removing" Garfield. This is but a repetition of what every fanatic has said. "The Lord and I" means in their minds "I and the Lord," the Lord being second. All fanatics think they are inspired, and that they hold direct communication with God. They appeal to the Bible, and it certainly looks to an uprejudiced observer as if they had as good a right to claim divine direction as had the prophets and patriarchs of old. Guiteau said, "The Lord inspired me to execute his will." That was the excuse of Abraham and of Jephthah, not to mention latter, day saints like Freeman and others.

Guiteau appears to be all taken up with the notion of his own importance as a disciple of Christ and missionary of the Lord. In his supreme egotism he finds, as a sufficient excuse for shooting Garfield, that it would giv him notoriety and thus sell his theological work "The Truth." It was written, he says, to save souls, and the Lord ["and I"] are after souls. He appears to be a sort of Millerite, for he believes that it is not without reason that some people entertain the opinion that the end of the world is not far off. He says that so far the deity (meaning God) has been well disposed to father his infamous crime, and he expects him to do so to the end, and see that he does not come to grief at the end of a rope. This from his manifesto is a refreshing specimen of egotistical fanaticism: "How do you know it was the deity? I was so certain of it that I put up my life on it, and I undertake to say the deity is activly engaged in my defense. I am confident he will checkmate the wise heads on this prosecution. I beg they go slow. They cannot afford to get the deity down on them. 'He uttered his voice,' says the psalmist, 'and the earth melted.' This is the God whom I served when I sought to remove the President, and he is bound to take care of me." The man is no doubt in dead earnest in his belief in God, as much so as the poor dupes who visit springs and wells, where the Virgin is said to hav been seen, to be cured of divers complaints beyond the skill of man. He is truly religious, and will do what the Lord tells him. Those who say that none but a crazy man would do as directed by the Lord can hav but little faith. They are the namby-pamby kind that, according to the Bible, will never enter heaven. It is a curious fact that if a man does any good deed and says he was inspired by the Lord, the whole host of clerical scamps will pretend to believe him, but let him commit a crime according to the laws of man, and every one will denounce him and say the Lord could hav had nothing to do with such cattle. And yet the Lord didn't always inspire men to do right according to the Bible. He very frequently made them do things which now-a-days would make the whole world blush or hold up its hands in horror. So, as far as we know the character of God, he is more likely to inspire his prophets to do wrong than right. And if cumulativ testimony is good for anything, it stands to reason that the more villainous the deed the more likely it is to hav been inspired by the Jewish Jehovah.

Although shot at three times, the religious rascal finds consolation even in that, for as he has not been harmed he thinks it is a further proof of divine protection. "Like the Hebrew children in the fiery furnace," he says, "not a hair of my head has been singed, because the Lord, whom I served when I sought to remove the President, has taken care of me." According to this, the Lord spends his time taking care of villains, for we always hear murderers talking about the goodness of the Lord, and precious little care does he take of the rest of the world. He lets men not guilty of any crime starve and perish, while he shields those who do not deserve any protection, and whose taking off would be a boon to the world. Having deliberately planned and executed a cowardly murder, shooting his victim in the back, Guiteau dislikes to be called an assassin because it reflects on the Lord who told him to do it. Therefore it is God's act, and to call God an assassin is impious. Such is the reasoning religion leads to, and the conclusion may be just. If God inspired men to kill centuries ago, there is no good reason why he should not do so now. He is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, we are told.

Guiteau imagins he is a patriot and should be thanked instead of hanged for his act. He would fain take his place by the side of Christ, dying for men. He says: "At the last great day all men will stand in the presence of the deity crying for mercy and justice. As they act here so will be their final abode hereafter. Life is an enigma. This is a strange world. Often men are governed by passion and not by reason. The mob crucified the savior of mankind, and Paul, his apostle, went to an ignominious death. This happened many centuries ago. For eighteen centuries no man has exerted such a tremendous influence on the civilization as the despised Galilean and his great apostle. They did their work and left the result with the almighty Father."

There is nothing plainer than that this murder of the President was the result of too much piety, too much reading of murders committed by God's direction. Men may call Guiteau crazy, but if his religion had taken a good turn—if he had been impelled to feed the starving—no one would say aught against his sanity. He killed Garfield, but religion was the real murderer. If he is hung, what shall be done to religion?

Some New Pamphlets.

We hav just had printed and bound three new books, which we shall be happy to supply to all who wish them. They are:

Science and Theology: Ancient and Modern. By James Anthony Froude. Price, 25 cents.

The Pyramid of Gizeh. The Relation of Ancient Egyptian Civilization to the Hebrew Narrativs in Genesis and Exodus, and the Relativ Claims of Moses and the Pyramid to Inspiration Considered. By Van Buren Denslow, LL.D. Price, 25 cents.

Ecce Diabolus, in which the worship of Yahveh, or Jehovah, is shown to be devil worship, with some observations upon the horrible and cruel ordinance of bloody sacrifice and burnt-offerings. By the Very Rev. Evan Davies, D.D., LL.D., Arch-Druid of Great Britain. Price, 25 cents.

The title pages of these little works giv a good and clear idea of their contents and nature, and the authors' names are guarantees of the ability with which the subjects are treated. The classic scholarship of Froude and Denslow is acknowledged by all, and Mr. Davies, the Arch Druid, is fully competent to tell of the early traditions of Judaism. As an initiated bard of the Druidic order he is well prepared to prove that the most notable gods of the orientals were only symbols and bardic myths deified.

As a historian Froude's reputation is world-wide, as is Denslow's for industry and ability in Egyptology.

CORNELL has again shown himself unfit to be chief officer of a great state like New York by appointing as associate justice of the Court of Appeals Judge Benedict of infamous Federal court fame. Benedict is unfit to sit in a case involving $5, and to put him upon a bench so important as the Court of Appeals is to show a reckless disregard of the people's rights and liberties. His outrageous rulings in the case of Mr. Bennett stain the ermin to deep to ever be forgotten. He should hav been impeached long ago instead of being put up higher.

IN a neighboring column Mr. Parton givs additional reasons for Voltaire's doing as he did at his death. As we said before, Mr. Parton's words are entitled to great weight, and we are grateful to him for his letter. We agree with him in wishing Voltaire had not seen fit to write and sign even so meager a church document as he did, and without doubt, had he been able to carry out his own designs in regard to his burial, he never would. As Mr. Parton says, Voltaire had to be tricky, for he was one old man against the whole religious world, and the religious world of that time was something to be physically dreaded. The Bastille's doors were always open from the outside, to say nothing of the ever-planted stake and ready fagots. The morals of the age were the morals inculcated by the church, and she is to blame for whatever hypocrisy was exhibited by her arch-enemy. A falsehood in those days of church rule was a very light sin, a great deal lighter than now, when the Catholic church has waned and men no longer fear her dungeons. And we must temper our censure of Voltaire a little when even now we hear many say they cannot come out openly for fear of ruining their business. If in these times a man can be justified for keeping some things to himself, how much more can we excuse it in Voltaire's time, when it was not a man's business but his life!

WE hav on our shelves a set of Martineau's History of England, which we shall be glad to send to any one wishing it. It is in four volumes, handsomely bound in black and gold. Price, $4.00 for the set.

THE Two Worlds and Banner of Light refuse to print Moses Hull's name in their notices of Spiritual meetings. What's the matter with Moses, brethren? He draws larger audiences than any other Spiritual lecturer, and the Second Society of Spiritualists of New York always secure his services, if possible, wherever a revival of the cause is felt to be needed in this Materialistic city. Is it possible that there is a "I am holier than thou" feeling among our esteemed Spiritual contemporaries, who use that phrase so often in reference to the attitude of Christians toward them?

WE are much obliged to the Mirror of Progress for its review of "Voltaire in Exile." The reviewer is a very perspicacious individual, who can see clear through an ordinary millstone.

Recent Publications.

THE LABOR QUESTION; or, an Exact Science of Equivalents. By Amicus Humanis Generis. Chicago Legal News Co., Chicago.

The author says that his object in writing upon the labor question is to reduce civilized life to an exact science, showing thereby how universal justice can be attained. Whether that has been done or not, the book is a very logically-written one, all the arguments being laid down with exactness and supported by the best attainable facts. The object being to remove crime, poverty, and injustice, he first seeks their cause, which he finds not in our system of production, but in the distribution of labor, in which he finds three great errors, viz., 1. To meet a greater demand we employ more men, instead of adjusting the hours of labor; 2. In the distribution of land, brought about by the individual owing the fee simple instead of owning the use by occupancy; 3. Interest on money. These propositions are argued out, and then the author turns his attention to "values," "money," "measures," and "quantity." To the book is added a new theory of cosmogony, "showing the beginning and ending of all things or individualities, and also showing that the story of the creation in the Bible contains a true tradition."

NATURE VERSUS COMPULSORY METHOD IN REFORM. Being an analysis of the temperance question, and answer to Dr. Crosby, Rev. Mark Hopkins, Wendell Phillips, and others. By Prof. W. M. Lockwood, Ripon, Wis. Price, 25 cents.

This is an attempt to introduce the scientific method of discussion into the temperance question, which has hitherto been championed principally by fanatics of the Murphy order or hypocrits of the Crosby order. Mr. Lockwood is a man who brings a long scientific training to his subject. He believes in nature, and rejects that cast-iron prohibition which would set a man of social tastes adrift at sea in a leaky boat as the best means of curing him and ridding society of his evil presence. He believes in temperance on a basis which will last, and he finds that only in nature. "Any system of religion," he says, "that teaches that to any phase of human appetite can be tied a pledge of virtue or belief in grace through another's atonement is a most pernicious system, thereby negating the necessity of physical poise and the integrity of intrinsic character." Mr. Lockwood would take a different path to reform the drunkard than any hitherto trodden—paths of common sense and reason. The book marks a step forward in temperance literature.

The North American Review for December is in all respects a good number. The writers without exception are men eminently competent for the tasks assigned to them, while of the subjects discussed, there is not one which does not possess a living interest. Indeed were one called upon to enumerate the contentions that are to-day exercising men's minds, those treated of in this number of the Review would certainly occur to him among the first. The most important and most opportune of all the articles is one by the Hon. John A. Kesson, entitled "The Monroe Doctrin in 1881." In this statesmanlike paper or pronunciamento, as it might not inaptly be called and is certain to be regarded by foreign publicists, the obligation of the United States government to effectually assert its supremacy throughout the Western Hemisphere is demonstrated both by the arguments of authority and precedent, and upon the grounds of reason. Then follows a discussion of the Death Penalty, conducted by the Rev. Dr. Cheever, Judge Samuel Hand, and Wendell Phillips. The policy of Mr. Gladstone's government toward Ireland is strenuously defended by Mr. H. O. Arnold-Forster, son of the chief secretary for Ireland. This paper is confessedly an appeal to the judgment and the sympathy of Americans in the struggle now going on across the Atlantic, and is a graceful, practical admission that British statesmen are not indifferent to the enlightened public opinion of the United States. Four physicians and surgeons namely, Drs. W. A. Hammond, John Ashhurst, Jr., J. Marion Sims, and John T. Hodgen, review the history of President Garfield's case. Finally the Hon. David A. Wells treats of reform in Federal taxation.

Voltaire's Alleged Recantation.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Your article upon the alleged recantation of Voltaire covers nearly the whole ground, but not quite. Allow me to go back a little and remind you of events that occurred previous to his last triumphal visit to Paris. You remember that after a contest of forty years with the hierarchy, in which he displayed more wit, more tact, more audacity, more of everything that makes a man victor over disadvantage, than was ever before exhibited by mortal man, he conquered for himself a secure home on the soil of his nativ France. This home was Ferney, within a few minutes' ride of three foreign dominions, to which he could escape if notified of danger from Paris. Here, during the remaining twenty years of his life, he assailed the despotic superstition under which the intellectual life of Europe was stifled by every weapon which the literary art has devised; and yet, private man as he was, living in the kingdom of France, he was almost as safe from attack as he could hav been in a free country. This security was due to one simple maneuver of his—he kept on his side the individual who had the king's ear last at night, first in the morning, and oftenest the rest of the time.

If you say that this was not a very lofty style of warfare, I answer you: He was one old man in a wide field, with a whole herd of bulls burning to destroy him. He had to trick and deceive them as best he could. He was fully resolved not to let them get the better of him. He was not disposed to be a martyr and leave them free to rage and destroy.

As long as he was alive he knew that he could baffle them. But all men must die. As soon as he had fully secured his earthly abode he set about providing a safe resting-place for his bones. He built a tomb in his parish church, he gave a small pension to the pastor of the parish, and he depended upon his right as lord of the manor to secure a decent burial in the tomb which he had caused to be constructed. He had not merely a sentimental objection to being buried in the highway or cast into the kennel like a dead dog. His chief motiv was to deprive the bishops of the triumph of insulting his remains. As he had defied them in his life, he desired to baffle them after his death. To this end he made arrangements to spend his last hours in one of the cantons of Switzerland, where his secretary hired a house for the purpose; and in case there should be any difficulty about his interment in his tomb, he ordered his secretary to place his remains in a portion of his bath-house, a building separate from the château.

All these arrangements were rendered unavailable through his dying at Paris. Acting upon the advice of his stanchest friend, D'Alembert, he deemed it best to make a confession to the priests, as the least of many evils. He made the usual formal acknowledgment in the expectation of saving his family, his friends, and the French Academy from embarrassment and inconvenience after his death. He was then living in another man's house, in a city which was four days' journey from his own abode.

Nevertheless I agree with your correspondent in wishing that he had made no concession whatever to the church. I wish that he had given himself no concern about his burial, and that when the breath was out of his body the family had thrown upon the government the responsibility of his interment, saying, in decent official form: "The great Voltaire is no more. A parish priest refuses him burial. Dispose of his remains." Such a course would hav reduced the government to a dilemma of an embarrassing character, which could scarcely hav failed to benefit the cause for which Voltaire lived and died.

It is the easiest thing in the world for us who inherit the results of his labors to sit here in peace and say what ought to hav been done in Paris in 1778. He took the course that then seemed best; and the more intimately we know the period and the circumstances the less we shall be surprised at what he did. Very truly yours, James Parton.

By particular request Moses Hull will giv his views on the "social question" at Frobisher Hall, Monday night, Nov. 28, 1881. Tickets, 50 cents; and if Moses tells all he knows on the subject it will be worth it.

A Note from Col. Ingersoll.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: For several months charges hav appeared—mostly in Christian papers—that I am guilty of appropriating the writings of others and palming them off as my own. It is charged that I delivered a speech on temperance in which I used the language of another and pretended that it was original.

The facts concerning this foolish and malicious charge are as follows:

In 1876, in the course of my argument in the Munn trial at Chicago, I used the following language:

"I believe, gentlemen, that alcohol, to a certain degree, demoralizes those who make it, those who sell it, and those who drink it. I believe from the time it issues from the coiled and poisonous worm of the distillery until it empties into the hell of crime, death, and dishonor, it demoralizes everybody that touches it. I do not believe that anybody can contemplate the subject without becoming prejudiced against this liquid crime. All you hav to do, gentlemen, is to think of the wrecks upon either bank of this stream of death—of the suicides, of the insanity, of the poverty, of the ignorance, of the distress; of the little children tugging at the faded dresses of weeping and despairing wives asking for bread; of the men of genius it has wrecked; of the millions who hav struggled with imaginary serpents produced by this devilish thing. And when you think of the jails, of the almshouses, of the prisons, and of the scaffolds upon either bank, I do not wonder that every thoughtful man is prejudiced against the damned stuff called alcohol."

This is the only "temperance" speech I ever made.

A year or so after this some temperance lecturer appropriated what I said in the Munn trial, and also the following from some one else:

"Intemperance cuts down youth in its vigor, manhood in its strength, and age in its weakness; it breaks the father's heart, bereaves the doting mother, extinguishes natural affections, erases conjugal loves, blots out filial attachments, blasts parental hopes, and brings down mourning age in sorrow to the grave; it produces weakness, not strength; sickness, not health; death, not life; it makes wives widows, children orphans, fathers, fiends, and all of them paupers and beggars; it feeds rheumatism, nurses gout, welcomes epidemic, invites cholera, imparts pestilence, and embraces consumption; it covers the land with idleness, misery, and crime; it fills your jail, supplies your almshouses, and demands your asylums; it engenders controversies, fosters quarrels, and cherishes riots; it crowds your penitentiaries, and furnishes victims to your scaffolds; it is the life-blood of the gambler, the aliment of the burglar, the prop of the highwayman, and the support of the midnight incendiary; it countenances the liar, respects the thief, and esteems the blasphemer; it violates obligations, reverences frauds, and honors infamy; it defames benevolence, hates love, scorns virtue, and slanders innocence; it incites the father to butcher his helpless offspring; helps the husband to massacre his wife, and the child to grind the parricidal ax; it burns up men, consumes women, detests life, curses God, and despises heaven; it suborns witnesses, nurses perjury, defiles the jury-box, and stains the judicial ermin; it degrades the citizen, debases the legislator, dishonors the state-man, and disarms the patriot; it brings shame, not honor; terror, not safety; despair, not hope; misery, not happiness, and with the malevolence of a fiend it calmly surveys its frightful desolation, and, unsatisfied with its havoc, it poisons felicity, kills peace, ruins morals, blights confidences, slays reputation, and wipes out national honors; then curses the world and laughs at its ruin. It does all that and more—it murders the soul. It is the sum of villainies, the father of all-crimes, the mother of abominations, the devil's best friend and God's worst enemy."

These two pieces—one taken from me and the one just quoted—were put together and published as one piece. Somebody recognized the first part as mine and charged that the whole had been stolen from me. A paper was sent me in which both pieces appeared as mine. I at once disclaimed all authorship and knowledge of the second piece, but admitted that the first part was mine. I hav made this explanation hundreds of times, but the charge is still made. Now I wish to say that the first article is mine, and I will giv a thousand dollars reward to any one who will show that it is not original.

As to the second article: I will giv the same amount to any one who will show that I ever pretended that I was the author; that I ever uttered it, or wrote it, or repeated it, or published it, or claimed it directly or indirectly as my own.

Some persons without my authority hav pretended to publish my lectures. Rhodes & McClure, of Chicago, hav published a book filled with pretended sayings of mine. In that book this "temperance speech" appears. I commenced suit to enjoin them not only, but wrote them that the second part of the "temperance speech" was not mine and requested them not to publish it as such.

Hundreds of times I hav disclaimed the authorship of this piece. Persons who know my religious opinions ought to know that under no circumstances could I be the author, and that under no circumstances could I afford to appropriate the language of others without giving full credit. Hoping that you will hav the kindness to print this denial, I remain,

Yours truly, Robert G. Ingersoll.

How to Increase the Circulation of The Truth Seeker.

My short experience in the lecture field more than ever convinces me that the most important work to be done to advance the cause of Freethought is to increase the circulation of the Liberal papers. Wherever I find a town in which a number of Freethought journals are taken I find our cause is rapidly advancing. There it is easy to organize an auxiliary Liberal League or a Liberal club or to sustain a Liberal lecture. There the Liberals are posted on what is transpiring in our ranks, and they understand the work we hav to do. But in a town where no Liberal papers are taken, although there may be a very large number who entirely reject orthodoxy and profess Liberalism, or indorse the doctrins of "Bob" Ingersoll, as they generally call him, they are not prepared to do anything but talk. These people are generally good and earnest men and woman who hav heard or read Col. Ingersoll's great speeches, and hav cut loose from the orthodox creeds, but they know very little of Liberal literature, and less of what the Liberal movement or the Liberal League movement means. These persons should be prevailed upon to subscribe for Liberal papers. And, by the way, I hope Mr. Wakeman's great speech on the philosophy of the Liberal League movement that he delivered the last evening of the Chicago Congress may be published for general distribution. There are but very few Liberals who fully understand the magnitude of the movement, and that speech would do much to enlighten the Liberal public on that subject.

When Francis E. Abbot stood at the head of the movement, I hav heard him speak most eloquently of it, and affirm that it was the great movement of the century—that it included all reforms; and Mr. Wakeman, at Chicago, took the same position and showed that he most fully comprehended the magnitude of the movement that Mr. Abbot so well inaugurated. And, for that reason, I was glad to see him elected to the Presidency of the National Liberal League. The three Presidents of the National Liberal League hav been Francis E. Abbot, Elizur Wright, and Thaddeus B. Wakeman. And however much these men may differ in their opinions on some questions, we must all admit it, if we will be candid and lay aside our prejudices, that three abler men cannot be found in this country. They will lose nothing in being compared to any three of the men who hav been elected President of the United States, even if the three selected were Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln, and James A. Garfield.

But allow me to return to the Liberal paper question. Friend Macdonald, I desire to suggest a plan to increase the circulation of The Truth Seeker. I don't do this so much to help the paper and its proprietor as to help the Liberal movement.

I believe there are ten thousand people who hav never seen a copy of The Truth Seeker who would subscribe for it if a few copies could be put into their hands.

And my proposition is that each subscriber immediately procure in his neighborhood ten three-month subscribers at fifty cents each. And as there are many Liberals who would prefer to pay for ten such subscribers rather than to take the time to procure them, I would suggest to that class that they at once forward to The Truth Seeker, 141 Eighth street, New York city, five dollars in money and ten names of persons to whom they desire The Truth Seeker sent for three months.

Of course these persons should be those who may be expected to subscribe at the expiration of the month. And at that time each one should be seen and urged to subscribe. And all our Liberal lecturers could engage in this work. There is hardly a town but where ten such subscribers could be obtained with a very little labor.

And then I would further suggest that each of your present subscribers make it a point to procure at least one new subscriber between now and January 1, 1882, and forward to the office six dollars before that time in place of the three dollars for his own copy. And as in the heretofore suggestion those who prefer to subscribe for some friend do so in place of getting a new subscriber. I am sure, if there can be united action among the friends of The Truth Seeker, your subscription list can be at least doubled on and after January 1, 1882. The way to bring this about is for every subscriber to go to work immediately after reading this communication and not fall into the error of thinking the suggestions are made to others and not to the reader.

Reader of The Truth Seeker, immediately after reading the above, go out and see if you can't get a new subscriber for The Truth Seeker and report at once to the office.

Friend Macdonald, will you please retain the names of all those who comply with these suggestions so far as they come to your knowledge, and please let me know who they are on the first of January, 1882?

This evening I lecture in the new Opera House in this town, on Monday evening in Caloma, Mich., and on Wednesday evening next in Augusta, Mich.

LECTURE I.

THE OBJECTIVE ORDER.—CONTINUED.

That is to say, the framework of the new creed is:

X. — THE CORRELATIVE CLASSIFICATION OF THE SPECIAL SCIENCES.

The fact that the several sciences can be classified upon a law which is the basis of all science inevitably weaves them together, not only into a true, but as the only true and positive philosophy possible. This is certainly the necessary step to be taken if we are to have any basis of a new and rational life of Man on earth. For empirical knowledge, a chaos of facts and laws and conclusions, without completeness, order, or method, is not science in any proper sense of the word. Science is order; that is, a classification which is a Philosophy. Until all of the sciences, therefore, have been coördinated and classified according to some scientific law, science has not been extended over her own domain. As soon as this is done science becomes the basis of life and the creed of the future.

Is there, then, any scientific or objective order in which the special sciences can be arranged so that they may include all possible human knowledge, and will be held together by a conception that will integrate the whole into a Philosophy?

I have thought this question to be so important that I have prepared an answer to it in a little work called "An Extension and Enlargement of the Positive Classification of the Sciences," to which your earnest attention is solicited.

The object of the little work referred to is to bring this classification in a harmonized and extended form clearly before the eye. In that view the Positive Classification has been enlarged and extended into twelve tables and illustrated by several diagrams. Such attempts are justified by the fact that the correlative method of this classification underlies and is becoming the foundation of all constructive Liberal thought. It is the backbone of all Positive Philosophy, our true knowledge of the world. It alone brings order out of chaos. No other classification can begin to show the attention and approval of distinguished thinkers which has been awarded to this. Mr. Herbert Spencer's criticisms and his own classification have resulted in leaving it stronger than ever.

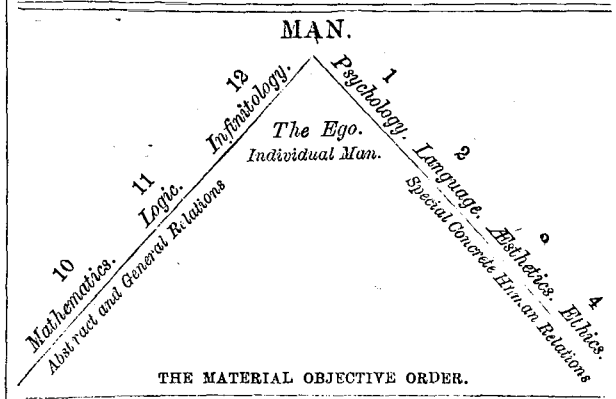
We may say of this classification that it is the inevitable classification, because it is the most simple, the most complete, the most flexible, the most objective, the most correlative, the most genetic, the most historical, the most educational, the most synthetic; and the one that is also, from the subjective or human point of view, the most true, convenient, and useful. In every sense in which the word "scientific" can be applied to a classification of the sciences, this is the scientific classification, because it is based upon the actual order and correlation of the parts of the world to each other.

Let us supplement our "Extension" by a few words to help us to appreciate how full of meaning and how just the words we have just applied to it really are:

1. It is the most simple because the most objective. The first and simplest observation of the world by a savage, a child, a peasant, or a philosopher divides it into three grand divisions or kingdoms, viz., Animal, Vegetable, and Mineral. This gives the whole thing in a nutshell. The Positive classification is but the enlargement and extension of this commonest and simplest observation, and yet it may be extended as far as any purpose or ingenuity may require. The "Extension" referred to gives some and will suggest other enlargements of this formula, or devices to represent it. We may begin, for instance, with

1 (Objective) 2 (order) 3
Mineral Vegetable Animal
3 (Subjective) 2 (order) 1

The next step is to add the Heavens at the objective, and Man, the observer, at the Subjective end of this scale, viz.:



1 2 3 4 5
Heavens, Minerals, Plants, Animals, Mankind.

Or:

5 4 3 2 1
The Starry Spaces, Earth, Plants, Animals, Man.

Here the method is enlarged but two steps, and is seen in its simplicity and perfection. The objective order passes from the greater, more numerous, and more general phenomena, to the smaller, more special, and more complex. The reverse or subjective order passes out from man to the Infinity of the Heavens, i. e., through the special and complex phenomena to the more universal and general, thus presenting the order in which they are related to man.

These facts are too simple to explain further, but they are no less grand and important because they are simple and obvious to all. If the observer is called upon to give himself a place in the scale and to include his relations to this objective order, the diagram might be made a triangle or pyramid, with the material Sciences as its base, the general and special relations as the sides reaching up to Man. Thus, numbering from man outward in the subjective order:

THE MATERIAL OBJECTIVE ORDER.

The Heavens.	Mineral or Material World.		Plants and Animals.		Mankind
9 i. e., Astronomy, i. e., Celestial or Stellar, Solar and Terrestrial.	8 i. e., Physics, i. e., Molar or Mass, Physics.	7 i. e., Chemistry, i. e., Molecular or Elementary Physics.	6 Biology.		5Sociology i. e., Animal or Comparative and Human; e. g., History, Laws, Politics, etc.
			i. e., Botany, i. e., Physiology and Anatomy of Plants.	i. e., Zoology, i. e., Physiology and Anatomy of Animals.

In this diagram the increasing generality is expressed by the increasing numbers only. The origin of all the forces and their manifestations up to their culmination in Man is shown by the numbers 12–1.

This truth is perhaps better shown by the pyramidal form of the diagram in the Cosmic diagrams in the essay referred to.

But this classification is not only the development of the simplest observation; it embodies also the highest Science, for:

2. It is correlative.

It follows, not only the order from the most general to the more special and complex phenomena, but also the line and order of the correlation of forces from the Infinite Heavens through the Cosmos in man's brain itself.

This is easily seen. Astronomy shows that our little Solar System moves rapidly in the Infinite Space. It is pulled or pushed by forces from the starry depths of the Cosmos—that is, from the Infinite.

From the starry space, these forces, correlating upon and in the sun, give it motion, light, heat, etc. From the sun comes the matter of the earth and sister planets and the forces which make the form of their surfaces and the conditions and the origin of life and all its forces and manifestations up to their culmination in man.

There is no better general illustration of this order and also of the law of correlation than the play of the Solar forces upon our planet. Our Scientists become Poets whenever they illustrate this sublime truth. You remember how Tyndall was inspired until he saw the imagination of Shakspere in the Sun-mist from which it had been correlated. Even the elephantine prose of Prof. Fiske dances amusingly in the sunlight of this grandest of Laws. Read for instance the conclusion of the eighth chapter of Vol. I. of this Cosmic Philosophy. He says, or sings:

"The phenomena which are subjectively known as changes in consciousness are objectively correlated with molecular motions of nerve-matter, which are seen in ultimate analysis to be highly differentiated forms of solar radiance. Waves of this radiance speeding earthward from the sun, at the rate of more than five hundred trillions per second, impart their motor energy to the atoms which vibrate in unison in the compound molecules of the growing grass. Cattle browsing on this grass, and integrating portions of it with their tissues, rearrange its molecules in more complex clusters, in which the tremendous chemical energy of heat-saturated nitrogen is held in equilibrium by the aid of these metamorphosed sunbeams. Man, assimilating the nitrogenous tissues of the cow, builds up these clusters of the molecules with their stores of sun-given and sun-restrained energy into the wondrously complex elements of white and gray nerve tissue, which, incessantly liberating energy in decomposition, mysteriously enable him to trace and describe a portion of the astonishing metamorphosis. When one takes a country ramble on a pleasant summer's day, one may fitly ponder upon the wondrous significance of this law of the transformation of energy.

"It is wondrous to reflect that all the energy stored up in the timbers of the fences and farmhouses which we pass, as well as in the grindstone and the axe lying beside it, and in the iron axles and heavy tires of the cart which stands tipped by the roadside; all the energy from moment to moment given out by the roaring cascade and the busy wheel that rumbles at its foot, by the undulating stalks of corn in the field, and the swaying branches in the forest beyond by the birds that sing in the tree-tops and the butterflies to which they anon give chase; by the cow standing in the brook and the water which bathes her lazy feet; by the sportsmen who pass shouting in the distance, as well as by their dogs and guns; that all this multiform energy is nothing but metamorphosed solar radiance, and that all these various objects giving life and cheerfulness to the landscape have been built up into their cognizable forms by the agency of sunbeams, such as those by which the scene is now rendered visible. We may well declare, with Prof. Tyndall, that the grandest conceptions of Dante and Milton are dwarfed in comparison with the truths which science discloses. But it seems to me that we may go farther than this and say that we have here reached something deeper than poetry.

"In the sense of illimitable vastness with which we are oppressed and saddened as we strive to follow out in thought the eternal metamorphosis, we may recognize the modern phase of the feeling which led the ancient to fall upon his knees and adore—after his own crude symbolic fashion—the invisible power whereof the infinite web of phenomena is but the visible garment."

Sometime, perhaps, the play of the celestial forces upon the sun and solar system will be celebrated in a song proportionally grand and triumphant.

Our point is that the Positive classification is the only one that follows this line and law of correlation through all of these metamorphoses of the forces the Infinite up to the lightest change of a molecule in the brain of the Philosopher who may try to discredit it. It is the only true picture of the whole dynamic action of the Cosmos, and is therefore inexpugnable if once lodged in the mind of man.

3. But this classification also presents the genetic order of phenomena, that is, the order of the changes by which the Cosmos and Man have come into existence and to be as they are. This is evident at once from the fact that it gives the correlative order. For the visible stars rest upon the Infinite; from them comes the power that formed the solar system and the earth; thence vegetation and vegetable-feeding animals; and upon the plants and animals the human world and finally civilized man are fed and sustained.

The Positive classification is thus seen to be thoroughly objective. It is but another name for the static, dynamic, and genetic order of the whole Cosmos itself.

4. But it is, also, humanly speaking, the most historical and therefore the most educational.

Mankind, like a child, first learned the simple, and then advanced toward the more complex phenomena. For example, the apparent order and laws of the stars became an abstract astronomy to the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Greeks. The laws of Physics were partly made out by Archimedes and Galileo. Next, and not till Lavoisier, did Chemistry assume a scientific character. Then Biology, Sociology, and their dependent sciences, Ethics, Æsthetics, Language, and Psychology, began to claim attention as abstract sciences. As abstract sciences let it be noted, for empirically practical knowledge had been cultivated in the reverse order. It is the failure of Mr. Spencer to distinguish the empirical practice from scientific knowledge that caused his principal difficulty in recognizing this order as historical.

5. A further reason why this order has substantially obtained in the origin and history of the sciences is that the phenomena and laws of the several sciences are accumulative in that order only. Each of the sciences in its origin has been theoretically and practically born out of its predecessors in the scale. In that order, to use the poetic phrase of Lucretius, "Truth has held the torch in the search for truth." Mr. J. S. Mill, in his work on "Comte and Positivism," has presented this growth very plainly and the reasons he urges are indispensable to all students of the subject. He says:

"The relation which really subsists between different kinds of phenomena enables the sciences to be arranged in such an order that in traveling through them we do not pass out of the sphere of any laws, but merely take up additional ones at each step. In this order M. Comte proposes to arrange them. He classes the sciences in an ascending series according to the degree of complexity of their phenomena, so that each science depends on the truths of all those which precede it, with the addition of peculiar truths of its own. Thus, the truths of number are true of all things, and depend only on their own laws; the science, therefore, of number consisting of arithmetic and algebra, may be studied without reference to any other science. The truths of geometry presuppose the laws of number, and a more special class of laws peculiar to extended bodies, but require no others. Geometry, therefore, can be studied independently of all sciences except that of numbers. Rational Mechanics presupposes and depends on the laws of number and those of extension, and along with them another set of laws—those of Equilibrium and Motion. The truths of Algebra and Geometry nowise depend on these last, and would have been true if these had happened to be the reverse of what we find them; but the phenomena of equilibrium and motion cannot be understood nor even stated without assuming the laws of number and extension, such as they actually are.

"The phenomena of Astronomy depend on these three classes of laws, and on the law of gravitation besides, which last has no influence on the truths of Number, Geometry, or Mechanics.

"Physics (badly named in common English parlance Natural Philosophy) presupposes the three mathematical sciences, and also Astronomy, since all terrestrial phenomena are affected by influences derived from the motions of the earth and of the heavenly bodies.

"Chemical phenomena depend (beside their own laws) on all the preceding, those of Physics among the rest, especially on the laws of heat and electricity. Physiological phenomena on the laws of physics and chemistry, and their own laws in addition. The phenomena of human society obey laws of their own, but they do not depend solely upon these; they depend upon all the laws of organic and animal life, together with those of inorganic nature, these last influencing society not only hrough their influence on life, but by determining the physical conditions under which society has to be carried on."

Mr. Mill then proceeds to show that this accumulative character of the scale has caused it to be substantially the historic order.

"By placing the sciences in the order of the complexity of their subject matter it presents them in the order of their difficulty. Each science proposes to itself a more arduous inquiry than those which precede it in the series; it is therefore likely to be susceptible, even finally, of a less degree of perfection, and will certainly arrive later at a degree attainable by it. In addition to this, each science, to establish its own truths, needs those of all the sciences anterior to it. The only means, for example, by which the physiological laws of life could have been ascertained was by distinguishing among the multifarious and complicated facts of life the portion which physical and chemical laws cannot account for. Only by thus isolating the effects of the peculiar organic laws did it become possible to discover what these are. It follows that the order in which the sciences succeed one another in the series cannot but be, in the main, the historical order of their development, and is the only order in which they can rationally be studied. For this last there is an additional reason, since the more special and complete sciences require not only the truths of the simpler and more general ones, but still more their methods. The scientific intellect, both in the individual and in the race, must learn in the more elementary studies that art of investigation and those canons of proof which are to be put in practice in the more elevated. No intellect is properly qualified for the higher part of the scale without due practice in the lower."

These words of Mr. Mill introduce the crowning glory of this classification. That is, that it has meaning as the subjective order of the sciences, which is its reversed order. This has been explained in the "Extension" referred to as particularly applicable to the two upper divisions of the tables therein.

This meaning becomes apparent when we reflect that the immediate necessities of life compelled mankind in their infancy to commence to modify those phenomena nearest to and directly related to them. Thus the subjective order has been the empirical order. Man began and was compelled to begin life by some kind of attempts to order and control those phenomena that appear the last in the objective order, as, for instance, Psychology, Language, Æsthetics, Morals, and Sociology.

This may also account for the great difficulty of reducing their phenomena to modern and real scientific methods. For certainly the power of habit must be stronger in relation to them than those Sciences in which empirical practice and rude theories could be deferred. When we take into account this power of habit, tending to became instinct under the influence of heredity, and then add the facts of the complexity of these phenomena and their constant great modifiability, we see reason enough to account for their being the last to be submitted to scientific treatment. The question what is good or right in them had to be determined at first empirically, but the time has come, even as to them, to consider them scientifically. To do this the subjective order must rest upon the objective order and overlie it, as in our tables. What is good must depend upon what is true. No other classification presents any such arrangement, and thus this is again left master of the field.

7. Lastly, but not as the least of the advantages of this classification, is the fact that the logical classification of Herbert Spencer, when placed under the same point of view, may be brought into substantial harmony with it. Mr. Spencer as an independent thinker would very likely repudiate any attempt at reconciliation, and insist that the point of view by which his classification is brought into a quasi agreement with its rival is not the point of view from which the Author made it and intended it to be viewed. But if our view makes his triple group of sciences harmonious and useful, why should it not be adopted? The linear or successive point of view that brings this harmony to light is indeed inevitable. The three groups of Mr. Spencer's classification have to be, and are, nothwithstanding his protest against a lineal order, necessarily read consecutively. Prof. Fiske has so placed them ("Extension," p. 7) and we merely emphasize and call attention to the fact by the numbers inserted in copying his table. When thus viewed the two classifications ought to substantially prove each other. For if the Positive is in substance the historical order, i. e., that in which mankind gradually unraveled the complexity of things about them, beginning with the most simple; then the logical order, which Mr. Spencer claims his to be, ought to give the same result. The three independent groups of Mr. Spencer do this. We have in it:

1. The general relations, i. e., Logic and Mathematics.

2. The properties of things, i. e., Physics and Chemistry.

3. The aggregate concrete qualities of things, i. e., Biology, Sociology, and Psychology.

This is the Positive order, and the confirmation is very striking and important.

But it will be noticed that Mr. Spencer places concrete Astronomy and Geology at the beginning of his concrete group, while Comte has abstract Astronomy after Mathematics and before Physics. This difference arises from the different point of view in which Astronomy is regarded by each author, Comte recognizing that every special science has an abstract and a concrete side, and he makes the purely abstract side of Astronomy determine its place; hence it it is closely related to Mathematics, and recalls the names of Pythagoras, Hipparchus, Copernicus, Kepler, Galileo, Newton, Laplace, and the other great theoretical builders of that science. But Mr. Spencer, regarding it concretely under the light of the Telescope, Spectroscope, and of descriptive Astronomy and the Nebular Hypothesis, places it as the foundation of his concrete group. But it is to be noticed that within that group he again follows the Positive order, and that he does the same in each of his other groups, thus giving another proof of the impossibility of avoiding it. The Positive classification avoids, however, all confusion by keeping the distinction of the abstract and concrete aspects of each science before the mind, and making its main classification rest upon the former. The latter or concrete view which would include concrete Astronomy, Geology, Mineralogy, descriptive Botany, etc. It would place them in a concrete classification by themselves as Mr. Spencer has done in his third group only. By this plan it would completely give the concrete aspect of Physics and Chemistry, which Mr. Spencer leaves in a half-and-half and very unsatisfactory state as "Abstract-Concrete."

It is this failure to regard the order by which his groups are really connected together that makes Mr. Spencer's classification comparatively useless and confusing.

Prof. Bain has clearly and, as we think, decisively presented this conclusion. He says (Logic part i, p. 24):

"A science has a certain order of arrangement of topics, suitable to its ends in gathering, in verifying, and in communicating knowledge."

He then admirably adopts and uses the Positive order. (See his most useful work on "Logic," part ii, p. 85 to p. 367.)

In an appendix, after a long review of Mr. Spencer's objections, he concludes thus: "It appears that Mr. Spencer, in abandoning the usual partition of the sciences into the abstract departmental or fundamental sciences on the one hand, and the concrete or derived on the other, has abandoned the more real distinction in search of a fanciful and untenable boundary line of abstract and the concrete," i. e., between the special sciences themselves.

The fact is that in the aggregate sciences of biology, sociology, and psychology, the procedure is from the whole, which we know well, to the complex parts, of which we know comparatively little and which have no separate existence. He entirely overlooks this distinction by including Astronomy and geology with the biological sciences as all alike concrete sciences. This breaks up the great division between the material and vital world, and makes concrete mean the same as aggregate. The consequences of this we find to be disastrous enough, when we have the solar system and the earth subjected to biological treatment under the laws of evolution derived from the study of organic life.

The want of utility of Mr. Spencer's classification arises from the fact that his classification gives no philosophy or meaning until interpreted by the Positive order. There is no intermediate dependence or consensus disclosed by which the three groups are read together so as to form at once the philosophy and the picture of the world. Three large chambers of relations, properties, and aggregates are opened off from the Ego in circular order, but no door of correlation opens from one to the other. It is only by opening such a door, and by looking at them in the positive order and numbering them in it, that they have any connected meaning. Indeed, Mr. Spencer himself is compelled to transform or translate his own classification into the positive, as we have done, in order to use it. Take for example his own summary of science as the systematic theory of the "known" and the "knowing" in his Psychology, vol. ii, p. 309. He says: "Let us observe where we stand. The Abstract Sciences long ago reached a sufficient degree of development. The abstract-concrete sciences have now made such great advances that we may fairly consider ourselves as understanding the laws of the more important physical actions. The concrete sciences dealing with the continuous transformation of sensible existences taken altogether, or in groups, or simply, have been severally progressing in definiteness and coherence now made greater by the recognition of certain laws which hold of the transformation in general and in detail."

This passage is an admirable summary of the present position of Science; but, note, it gives the Positive order, as in the "Extension" referred to (page 7), and then admits that the historical development has been in that order; that is, from the general and abstract to the special and concrete. It would seem that the author of this sun-clear passage could have spared us the hair-splitting confusions of his Essays on the "Genesis of Science," and on the "Classification of the Sciences."

Mr. Mill, in his work above quoted, after a searching review of all that Spencer has to say for his own and against the Positive classification, finds that "he presents no case," and has no compensating utility for the change proposed, and he then gives judgment in these decisive words:

"If the best classification is that which is grounded on the properties most important for our purposes [i. e., human uses] this [the Positive] classification will stand the test."

In this view we believe that a fuller examination will bring a general concurrence and harmony—a concurrence that will use Mr. Spencer's classification in spite of its author as a criticism, a synonym, and lastly as a final establishment of the Positive Classification.

This is the conclusion at which the Westminster Review also arrives in the able notice it gave of Prof. Fiske's "Cosmic Philosophy," and which is quoted in "The Extension," page 15. See also the authorities on page 9.

Thus it clearly appears that the criticisms of Mr. Spencer designed to discredit the Positive Classification have resulted in giving it greater strength in the minds of the most competent judges. It has led also to the discovery that his own classification is, after all, contrary to his own intention and conviction, but a logical or intellectual view of the very order he seeks to supplant; that he stands in the same aspect as to that that he does in his restatement of the "test of truth" and "the law of the three states;" that is, that he has only presented one logical side or aspect of a truth that Comte and Mill have established and presented objectively from observation of the facts.

The further fact now disclosed that this positive order is the simple, correlative, genetic, objective, historical order, which needs only to be reversed to give the subjective order, makes it beyond question the only true scientific order or hierarchy in which the sciences can be arranged as the basis of a true Philosophy. Certainly no words need to be added to impress the importance of this order upon the reader. It is absolutely necessary. Those who have no idea of this order are simply living in chaos. There is no other way of straightening out the world which we find around us.

"WHAT OBJECTIONS TO CHRISTIANITY?" is the title of a volume of 969 pages issued by the Liberal and Scientific Publishing House of D. M. Bennett, New York. It is a discussion between G. M. Mair, Esq., a Christian, and D. M. Bennett, a Freethinker. The former defends Christianity as of divine origin, and the latter that it is man-made. This in substance is the ground work of the book. The Bennett-Mair Discussion has appeared in the columns of the New York TRUTH SEEKER, but more appears in book form. The learned and historical research displayed by both gentlemen is remarkable, but Mr. Bennett must be credited with having exhausted history on his side of the question. He must hav devoured ancient and modern religious works by the wholesale. Mr. Ben nett proves conclusivly that Jesus Christ was as much a myth as any of the other "twelve crucified saviors" who figured conspicuously in history anterior to him. Mr. Mair, as a good Christian, believes in the divinity of Christ. In a word, Mr. Mair argues that Christianity has been a great blessing, and Mr. Bennett that it has been a great curse to the world. Of course heretics and unbelievers of every class think think that Mr. Bennett demolished the arguments of his opponent.—Jewish Times.

Letters from Friends.

A FEW WORDS FOR THE CONSIDERATION OF THE SPIRITUALISTS AND LIBERALISTS OF MICHIGAN.

ADRIAN, MICH., NOV. 10, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Since reading friend Green's article in the last TRUTH SEEKER I thought, if you were willing, I would like to hav a little talk with the Spiritualists and Liberalists of Michigan through the ever-open and faithful TRUTH SEEKER—I mean that portion of the Liberalists and Spiritualists who, like myself, are members of the State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists, for there are many good people who do not care to mix in this way. I hav trained in the Spiritual ranks, more or less, for twenty years, and hav been a witness to a great many strange things that I could not account for, which to those of more easy belief were accepted as spirit manifestations. Finally I became satisfied, from what I had seen, and from the treatment that I had got from a certain class of narrow minds that set themselvs up as Spiritual leaders, that there was nothing there that was of any advantage to me, so I dropped them the same as I had my orthodox notions when I had grown out of them.

When the American Liberal League was organized in 1876 I believed I saw in this movement an absolute want for the safety of our American liberties, and I at once fell in line with this movement.

In March, 1879, the Spiritualists in Michigan, feeling the need of new recruits in their ranks, and with a desire that their State Association might fill the place of a state Liberal League, reorganized at Lansing with the word "Liberalists" attached to their name. The following Autumn they held their first semi-annual camp-meeting at Nashville. The Adrian Liberal League, No. 81, sent up to their camp-meeting a delegate to represent them as a Liberal body. The report that this delegate brought back was not very flattering in the direction of these Liberalists. There are plenty of Liberalists and Spiritualists who, when they read this, will call to mind the way that this delegate was treated on that occasion.

The first annual convention was held at Battle Creek, Michigan, March, 1880. Here we estahlished our organization legally, and took the name, "The State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists." I at that time favored this with the hope that the great Liberal movement of the age might be advanced by those two elements uniting and working together for the Liberalizing of human thought; but time, observation, and thought hav satisfied me that the word "Freethinkers" in the place of "Spiritualists and Liberalists" would be much preferable. Liberalism, in its broadest sense, of course might include all that any one might ask, but when used in connection with the American Liberal League it means only the secularizing of the American government from all religious denominations and the protection of all in their natural rights.

Spiritualism, like Christianity, claims the duality of the individual—that in connection with the physical body we hav a spirit in us—a real entity in and of itself the veritable individuality, and that this physical body is the mere shell that the spirit livs in, and at the death of the body this spirit leaves this old casket of clay and wings its way to the spirit world, or wherever it may wish to go; and, like Christianity, it claims for itself to be the messenger of a new dispensation; in fact, it claims to be a religious sect or body and entitled to all the rights and immunities of other religious sects or bodies, and so the courts hav granted its claims. Its mission (like Christianity), as defined by its leaders, is to establish the identity of the individuality after death, and that, when the conditions are all right, the departed may communicate with their friends of earth. Spiritualism, like Christianity, is not necessarily Liberal, moral, or reformatory in its character; in fact it, like Christianity, is no test of character; but, as has been observed by some of its brightest lights, it adapts itself to the conditions of those that accept it.

Now with me, I hav become pretty well satisfied with my own individuality, and that when I cease to breathe oxygen into the lungs I will cease to be a living entity, save only in the character that I leave behind me. This old idea, that had its origin in dreams and visions with the prehistoric inhabitants of this globe at a period of time when the human race was but little above a four-footed life, I take no stock in, as being of no particular use to me now. However, if it is a fact, as our Christian and Spiritual friends tell us, that we are dual in our person, and that this body is only the tabernacle wherein the spirit dwells, and at the death of the body this spirit wings its way to the land of the blessed, I say that if in the future I should find this to be a fact, then, having fulfilled all the duties of this life, I will be ready to attend to the requirements of that one. And here, for the present, at the age of threescore years and ten, my brain is at rest on this subject of a future life for me, or no future life. I am ready for either issue.

And while I am before the public I will take this opportunity to say that my home matters now being in such a shape that I can leave for a few weeks as well as not, I would be willing to giv a few lectures on "Temperance, Manhood, and Common Sense vs. Superstition." My terms will be, to hav a free hall and a home with the friends while with them. I will hav with me a good assortment of Liberal, scientific, and temperance literature, that will read as I talk, to sell, the profits on which will pay my railroad fare. Then I will be glad to take the names, witn the pay, for THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Boston Investigator. I will giv myself, and time, up free for the cause of the truth and the right. Any wishing to hear my pleasant voice and see my smiling face on the above terms will please address me,

SAMUEL D. MOORE, Adrian, Mi . Box 465.

CENTRAL CITY, COL., NOV. 5, 1881.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I am really sorry that Mr. Young should hav such a poor opinion of my abilities, and even go so far as to intimate that I was not of sound mind when he says, "The truly sane man has no opinion with regard to a matter about which he knows nothing." I had hitherto been laboring under the impression that this was a free country in which no person was debarred the privilege of forming an opinion upon any subject that might be brought to his notice, whether he had investigated it or not—in fact, that "man is a free moral agent," and it should not be necessary that he wait for some one to tell him that this is white, or that is black. At the present time there are so many methods of deception being practiced through the ingenuity of people who obtain an easy living thereby that I hope Mr. Young will pardon my presumption should I prefer to disregard his prescribed rule and form an opinion of my own regarding Spiritualism, even if I hav not personally investigated it. Should I ever start out on an investigating tour in that direction I can assure Mr. Young or any other advocate of the spiritual "faith" that I could not be satisfied to sit apart and gulp down all that "some" interested parties might see fit to giv me. I should insist upon getting behind the curtain and giving the spirit-hand of my departed relativ a hearty shake; or if, like Mr. Young's relation, it only showed its face, I should insist upon handling the head and learning upon whose shoulders it rested.

o, Mr. Young, you cannot make something come from nothing. At the time of death the organ of speech are entirely destroyed, and I defy you to make a dead person speak or form the articulate sounds of the voice in a void such as a spirit would represent. Depend upon it, some one obtains an easy living out of this representation, or misrepresentation, similar to the Christian religion, and I must reiterate "Why resort to all this preparation in order to demonstrate that which should be common to the whole human family," for if a truth, it is the whole human race is directly interested, and one member should hav the same power and privileges to demonstrate as another.

The comparison Mr. Young would establish between Spiritualism and th astronomer or philosopher does not apply in the case in which he puts it by any means. Their methods will bear close and searching investigation in any place, at any time, and under any circumstances, and prove to be facts and realities, while Spiritualism must hav certain accompaniments of a particular description, must always be operated under prescribed rules, under certain shades of light, and under joint conditions, and even then nothing tangible, no fact of a material nature, is demonstrated. All is in a state of dreamland, and the after impressions must be similar to those of a dream.

I presume it is useless for me to say anything further on this subject, for Mr. Young truthfully says that "he givs up as hopeless the idea of converting me," and he no doubt is too firm a believer for any words to hav any impression upon him. Permit me to set him right on a few of his assertions, when I will drop the subject.

Mr. Young says I "inserted in THE TRUTH SEEKER an article against Spiritualism," when the word Spiritualism does not occur in the article; neither did I hav the most remote idea that I was trespassing upon Spiritual grounds. "The Immortality of the Soul" was the subject treated, and if the Spiritualistic ox was gored it was unintentional.

I said, "One of the high mountain-peaks near by." Mr. Young quotes it, "highest." He must bear in mind that this writing is done at an elevation of 8,400 feet above the level of the sea, in which case any peak near by would be high. The "brief" note which he is so particular to impress upon his readers as being brief occupied three and one half pages of letter paper, and to hav given it entire, together with my reply, would hav been asking for too much space in your valuable paper.

Believing that in this progressiv era every person has an undoubted right to form such opinions as may seem correct to him, thereby advancing newer and often better ideas to be adopted in one onward march of intelligence, I will close by saying that no person can be more strictly observant than I to honor every honest opinion advanced, be it for or against me.

D. D. LAKE.

LEBANON, OR., NOV, 4, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: We hav had an old friend, Dr. J. L. York, come to see us and giv us three red-hot lectures, which stirred up the livers of some of our orthodox friends, but I think it will do them good. It even affected some of them down in their toes. They felt as if they were standing on red-hot iron. But the docter shoots for game, and hits it every time.

We had some fine music by some young ladies and gentlemen friends. They also had a social hop on the last evening and enjoyed it very much, and went home happy, except our crippled game, and I think that they will all feel better after hearing the truth for once in their lives.

I got the posters you sent me, and will do all I can to get you subscribers. Mr. Bennett's letters are excellent. Every one who reads them cannot help but like them. Yours truly, A. ERVIN.

PATERSON, N. J., NOV. 15, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I want to say a few words concerning the Paterson Liberal League and what its few members who still stick to it are doing to put new life and vigor into it. You must know that a year ago last February the League was organized under very favorable auspices, had great hopes of a fair success, and this would certainly hav been realized had those who joined it been sincere Liberals, but I am very sorry to hav to report that their actions hav proved that they were not, and in spite of all that could be done and has been done by the few devoted ones, we cannot make any very encouraging progress. But, with a courage born of hope and a love of the cause, we are now, with the valuable help of our co-worker, Mr. S. P. Putnam, making one more effort to arouse the Liberals of this city (of which there are professedly large numbers) and call their attention to the great necessity of their taking a greater interest in the cause of Liberalism, which is par excellence the cause of humanity and justice. To this end we hav arranged with Mr. Putnam to deliver a course of lectures to be given on twelve consecutiv Sunday afternoons at three o'clock each Sunday, of which two hav already been given to small but appreciativ audiences, and it givs me great pleasure to say that they hav given ample satisfaction to the progenitors of the course. I shall inclose a list of the lectures in this, and hope you will print it in connection with it, so that if any of our New York fri nds would like to pay us a visit some fine Sunday and hear Mr. Putnam they can make a choice. I can assure them that we shall be well pleased to see them, and will do our best to make their visit a pleasant one. Also any of the friends from Newark will be just as welcome. My address is 657 Main street, so that if any prefer to call on me they can do so, or if they prefer they can go to the International Hall, corner of Fair and Main streets. In conclusion, I want to tell your readers that our friend Putnam is improving wonderfully both in composition and style of delivery, and any of our friends living near New York who want to hear some good coustructiv lectures and help the cause along will do well to engage him.

Yours fraternally, JOHN WARR.

[The list of lectures will be printed as soon as space will allow.—ED. T. S.]

SHANE'S CROSSING, O., NOV. 12, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: As time permits, I will say that THE TRUTH SEEKER is finding some friends here. When I received my first paper there were men who objected to read it, but now they can read it twice over and then hand it to their friends, who express their sympathy for the old editor and wish him a long life; but the chief uses of a long life are yet to be named. As society is now constituted, the principal force of the mental energies and moral mind has but little opportunity for cultivation and development until the later periods of life, and then the body is worn out and the mind has nothing to sustain it. Even the rich stores of knowledge accumulated by those who are placed in circumstances fortunate for moral research and scientific investigation are mostly lost to others, because their voluntary habits hav so disordered the body that the lamp of life goes out before they hav time to arrange, compare, prove, and demonstrate the results of their study and experience and communicate them to the people. As most people liv they feel an assurance of a special liability to some mysterious providence which may at any moment terminate their existence, and that entirely independent of any natural cause or law which they can either understand or control. The state of mind induced by such confused fears and apprehensions must be exceedingly superstitious, and nothing is more stupefying to all the powers of intellect than superstition. Such persons cannot reason well, because their reflectiv powers are spellbound by an absurd fantasy, and they dare not attempt to reason much for fear they will reason wrong. This blinded and bigoted state of mind renders its possessor eminently short-sighted and selfish; he is always pre-eminently conservativ, uniformly goes for keeping all things as they are, and invariably opposes all new creeds or innovations upon established usages. So far as society or the world or the human family is concerned, he is useless; but let him feel competent to preserve his own health, and hav a full assurance that—casualities excepted—his days may be long in the land, and he will look forward to a better and higher destiny and become a reader and admirer of the teachings of the old veteran, D. M. Bennett.

Hoping the old voyager good success and his family good health and THE TRUTH SEEKER long life, I remain Yours, JESSE KING.

Around the World.

BY FLORA DUTTON.

Gazing now on scenes that meet thee round the world,
Know that a thousand flags of love unfurl
To deck thy form and bear thee on with standard of the truth.

Thy inner soul of thought shining
Forth through the casement of the body
In rays of perpetual youth,
Reflecting round the world, may yet reach me,
If only in imagination's train,
Or as the electric or magnetic rays pervade the universe,
And fall on hearts that drink its spirit-vigor,
Reciprocating intelligent thoughts,
So shall thy soul-light backward come to me
In the silent breezes—in the elements that sweep the universe.

For lives together clinging by reciprocating thoughts
And appreciativ intelligence
Must seek their like—must be Affinitized in elements—
Perhaps hav met before in Atoms whence our lives hav sprung.

Go on around the world beaming
Like a star above,
Whose brightness cannot set;
And as thy light falls on every country, every clime,
May it point and lead them on
To the fadeless world above!

Where thoughts can never die,
And not on earth, either, can their effects be blotted out
With persecution's hand or mildew time,
For the souls that absorb thy rays of thought where'er they fall
Will reflect them onward down the line of time
To show in the effects a newer light
Revealed to growth of mind.

A Tale (Tail) of the Devil.

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

Some good people would to their wits bid adieu,
If Satan should really appear to their view.
They fear him and shun him, and fiercely contend
That ne'er did the story of Dives intend
To teach that hell or the devil was near,
The thought makes them tremble with horror and fear.
They claim the saints cannot, though much they desire,
Hear shrieks or see writhings of lost ones in fire.
Their fears compel them to vote a firm No
To a teaching that places old Satan their foe
So near that he might, if he wished, take a leap
O'er the gulf and slay the innocent sheep;
For where saints see or hear the damned it is clear,
For the safety of saints the devil's too near.
Yea, if the voice cross, the old dragon might.
By what we read of him this logic is right;
For one sweep of his tail can, when used for a broom,
Brush one-third of the stars from heaven's high dome;
With two brushes more he could, without doubt,
Sweep all the rest of the universe out.
This thought overwhelms us, but is certainly true,
And, saints, if you doubt, you're damned if you do.
Behold it is written, he once made a stand,
And sad havoc played in the heavenly land.
So grounds for grave fears can be seen very plain
For what has happened once may happen again.
Of course inspiration and Milton are right,
And can stand the full blaze of reason's light.
Then, ye poor, trembling saints, as this tale of a tail
Of the devil is true, ye should, without fail,
Make friends with him quickly, and treat him most civil
Should you ever by chance meet this terrible devil

W. F. JAMIESON'S

SCHOOL OF STENOGRAPHY.

THE PHONOGRAPH

Is a machine for writing shorthand. It is simplicity itself. Is very easily learned. Easily operated with all the fingers. Its writing is more legible and accurate than any other system of shorthand. The writing of one operator can be readily read by another. Ordinary shorthand requires the verbatim reporter to commit to memory hundreds of contractions and word-signs. Operators of the Stenograph use less than one hundred contractions. The letters are represented by dots and spaces—nothing else. To fit persons for shorthand clerks only half the time required to learn the best phonography. Six hundred letters per minute can easily be made, which is more than sufficient to equal the speed of the most rapid reporters.

Lessons can be given by mail. Teaching will not interfere with my lecturing. Let Liberals put their children to the front in practical, secular education. Address

THE
Bennett-Mair Discussion.

BETWEEN

D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.

(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founded upon the doctrin and authority of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progress and improvement.

8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which mankind are capable of receiving.

Sixteen Saviors or None.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

Being a reply to John T. Perry's "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examins all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other, and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and themselvs, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. OPEN LETTER

Anthony Comstock

In Answer to His Open Letter Sent to Newspapers.

465 FULTON ST., BROOKLYN,

SIR: I hav before me a seven-paged open letter, addressed to myself, intended for publication in all the evening and morning papers, copies of which I am prepared to prove, were sent to every daily and several weekly papers, the publishers of which refused to publish it, consigning the precious product of your labors to the waste paper basket. For this I am truly sorry, as it would hav given me an admirable opportunity to show the public the true inwardness of the man who could pen such a letter, and yet claim to be a Christian and a protector of the public from the vicious members of society. A more vicious letter could not be penned, and the evidence of malice crops out in every sentence You first claim that the courts honorably acquitted you. If they did, then I know nothing of the words honorable acquittal. You were arrested for publishing a malicious libel, and taken in the charge of an officer before the magistrates. You then waived examination. If you had written truthfully, why were you afraid of examination? I was present in the court to confront you on your vile charge. You were silent.

After the lapse of several weeks I received an order from Judge Smith's court to attend such court respecting my charge against you, and believing that you would submit to an examination and giv some excuse for your act, I went, accompanied by over fifty witnesses, so that a special court had to be set aside for my special case against you. Well, let us examin as to what followed. I stood there without counsel, ready to defend my order of arrest. I was strong in the proof of my charge against you, and did not require an attorney to quibble on points of law. You, on the other hand, had an attorney—a man in whom any person may trust their case as a legal adviser, and outside the law I hav reason to know that Mr. Tenney, your solicitor, is a gentleman and a noble-hearted man. He must hav felt seriously the weakness of your case, as set forth in your libelous letter, and therefore, as an act of charity toward you, advised you not to submit to an examination. He, good fellow, by special pleading, decided to take exception on points of law, and attempted to show that not the spirit and intent of your libelous letter should be gone into, but the actual wording only should be considered, and that therefore the same should be adjudged as a privileged communication, and on this ground pleaded for a dismissal. This I objected to, whereupon your solicitor proposed that a brief be prepared, setting forth the reasons why my complaint against you should be dismissed. I then stated in the presence of that court, that all I required was a full investigation into the facts. It was then arranged that the District Attorney should take charge of the case as prosecuting counsel, on behalf of the people against Anthony Comstock, I being promised at that time that such investigation should be made on the following Wednesday. But, feeling that there was some crooked business going on, and an attempt being made to frustrate justice, I employed one of our best attorneys, and he wrote a letter to the Judge, to the District Attorney, and your attorney for copy or nature of such brief. Not only so, but myself and attorney applied at Jefferson Market Police Court next day, and we were told that Justice Solon Smith had gone into the country, and would not be back until Monday following, the court officer to whom we spoke intimating that as the Comstock case was in the hands of Justice Solon Smith, nothing would be done until his return. Picture, therefore, my astonishment upon receiving a notice from the court that the case had been dismissed without an investigation into the facts which led to the writing of your letter, neither myself nor one of my witnesses being called, and yet you hav in your letter the audacity to tell the public that you were honorably acquitted. May heaven save the public when such honorable acquittals shall follow the publication of such vile letters as that penned by you to hundreds of my patients! So much for your "honorable acquittal." Now, as to your having evaded arrest or not, the facts are these: I did not dream of having you arrested until after I had written my letter to you, which appeared in all the newspapers. I called at your office personally three or four times, as did also my half-brother, David Cotter. We were each told by persons in your office that you had gone into the country, and would not be back for a week; but on being told by persons on Nassau street that you were seen in the immediate neighborhood not long after my calling, I felt that you were evading me, and deliberately refusing to giv me the names of those whom you pretended had made statements against me. It was your thus evading me which caused me to take criminal proceedings against you, and forthwith instruct counsel to sue out a warrant against you for criminal libel. After such warrant was in the hands of the officer, such officer and several of my witnesses sought you at your office. They were told by persons in your office that you had gone into the country, as I had before been told. On the morning of your arrest my half-brother, David Cotter, called at your office, in response to a telegram received by me. He was then told that you were away in the country. He went straight from your office to that of Howe & Hummel, and there met a private detectiv who offered there and then to disclose the whereabouts of Anthony Comstock, if the $100 reward, which I had offered for his arrest, should be given him. This was promised, and David Cotter then went and apprised the officer who held the warrant, and they went in company to your office, when they were jointly told by persons sitting there that you were away and they did not know when you would return; whereupon the officer, acting upon the information given by the detectiv above named, proceeded to a room in the upper part of the building wherein several voices were heard. The door was opened in response to the knocking of the officer, when a number of gentlemen were seen sitting around a table as if in committee. Anthony Comstock was inquired for, and denied being there. Upon retiring voices were heard in a room close by. Inquiry was made if Anthony Comstock was within. The person who opened the door replied that Anthony Comstock was not there, when the door was closed. My half-brother, who was waiting in the lobby, made a ruse as if running down stairs, the officer, all the time standing outside, beside the door. The same person who had before opened the door opened it again. The officer, by a rapid movement of the foot, kept the door open and then walked in and arrested yourself, Anthony Comstock. If this was not hiding from arrest, I fail to understand what hiding means, and as you hav in your open letter mentioned the fact of my having offered one hundred dollars reward, and that I had refused to pay the person giving the information, I beg leave here to state that the hundred dollars was paid to the detectiv in the presence of several witnesses, one of whom was a merchant and manufacturer in your immediate neighborhood of Nassau street. So much for your arrest. Was it with or without evasion?

Now, as to the next portion of your open letter: You say there is a law prohibiting the transmission of letters and circulars concerning schemes to deceive and defraud the public or obtain money by false pretenses through the mails. You knew very well when you were writing that sentence that it had no application whatever to my case, inasmuch as the following open letter to the physicians of Brooklyn was before you, offering every physician or scientific man a free entry into my factory and consulting rooms, and in the same letter offering five thousand dollars' worth of my goods to the poor of Brooklyn. Why did you not avail yourself of the offer and hav called at my consulting rooms and manufactory for inquiry before writing your libelous letter to the hundreds of my patients? You could hav no excuse as to time and place, for this reason, viz., that my establishment is one of the most prominent in Brooklyn, and in close proximity to your own residence, so that nothing but malice aforethought could hav induced you to hav written such a letter, while the following offer to the physicians of Brooklyn was before you in the circular or pamphlet from which you obtained the names of my patients to whom you wrote. If you wish to excuse yourself re-read the following:

WM. WILSON'S OPEN LETTER

To the Physicians and the Commissioners of Charities of the City of Brooklyn.

GENTLEMEN—Two years ago in Europe I invented and patented a magnetic appliance for the relief and cure of disease. My system is one that was never before attempted, but its simplicity places it among the many great improvements in the history of science which, after its inception, has caused thousands to wonder why so valuable an additiou to the necessities of our race should hav been so long overlooked.

This success of my appliances in the cure of disease in England was such that over THIRTY THOUSAND persons were clothed in them, and not one case of failure when the proper appliances were worn as recommended. In the face of such success in Europe, I determined that the people of America should be made acquainted with the fact. I arrived in Brooklyn only a few months ago and commenced the sale of my goods at No. 465 Fulton street, since which time I hav, in Brooklyn and neighborhood, over a THOUSAND persons wearing my appliances for the diseases above mentioned—all of whom came to me only as a last resort, having failed to get relief from any of their physicians. And these persons were as readily relieved as were those of Europe—NINETY-NINE PER CENT of whom will tell you to-day on application to them that my appliances gave time all the relief promised. A printed list of my clients is at your disposal so that you may satisfy yourself of the truth of the above statement. My proposition therefore is that I hand over to the medical men of Brooklyn FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS' worth of my appliances, to be used only on the persons of the sick poor now and likely to be in your charitable institutions and hospitals. The only condition I make is that I myself clothe the patients according to my own judgment and be allowed to retain watchers at my own expense that the patients do not receive any medicin during the wearing of my appliances, and that a proper report be supplied from time to time, so that I, at my own expense, can publish the record of the cures by my appliances. I further wish that every medical man in Brooklyn should call at my manufactory and examinfor himself the processes of manufacture and make himself thoroughly acquainted with my system. My factory is open for inspection at all hours to any physician, chemist, or scientist, and in close proximity to my own business premises the same physicians may see for themselvs the patients who hav been relieved by my appliances. All physicians and chemists who hav examined my goods hav availed themselvs of my invention, are to-day wearing my appliances, and recommending the same to their patients with marked success.

The aforesaid gift of FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS' worth of goods will be delivered from time to time, as agreed upon by a committee of yourselvs, on application to me a few days in advance, stating the disease for which they are required, so that I can supply the best possible form of my invention. Hoping you will avail yourselvs of my offer, I remain, gentlemen. Yours obediently,

WILLIAM WILSON.
No. 465 Fulton st., Brooklyn.

In face of the above letter, what pretense can you find for your conduct? Why did you not giv me the names of the parties whom you pretended had written to you? The fact is, no one did write to you except a lot of conspiring doctors, and to please them you became their tool.

In the next part of your open letter you refer to a letter you sent me, and say as follows: "Why did you, like Ananias and Sapphira of old, keep back a part; why did you not tell the public that I wrote you personally on the 15th of September?" Your memory must be very bad in this particular, or you did not read the newspapers. Insomuch that this paragraph appeared in the Truth newspaper on September 20th, under the caption of "The Romance of Anthony Comstock's Arrest, and what Led to It," and directly following the $100 reward, I refer to the very letter which you say I never noticed:

"And the next morning I received a cringing letter, written after the reward was offered, as shown by the postal date on the envelope, Brooklyn postmark, 2 A. M., September 16. Now I was told in his office on the 15th of September, at two in the afternoon, that he had gone away for a week. Who told the lie? Did he order his subordinates so to do, or did they do so of their own accord? The next day, September 16th, my half brother, David Cotter, with the detective and the court officer, went to Comstock's office. They were told that he was in the country, and did not know when he would return. They were then told that a letter was written by Comstock to William Wilson the night previous. At this the clerks seemed surprised, and said, 'Well, we do not know where he is, nor when he will return.'

"A private detectiv then told my half brother where to find him, and said he was hid away in an upper room in the same building. There the officers went, knocking at one door where voices were heard within, but the door was locked. Then in another room adjacent an attempt was made to discover him among a company of gentlemen sitting apparently in committee, but Comstock could not be seen. A ruse of running down stairs was made, only to retrace their steps just in time to find the door gently open that had before been tried and found locked. The officer slipped his foot between the door jamb and, walking into the room, arrested the great Anthony Comstock. He was taken before Justice Smith and committed in the following words of committal:

"'It appearing to me by the within depositions and statements that the crime therein mentioned has been committed, and that there is sufficient cause to believe the within-named Anthony Comstock guilty thereof, I order that he be held to answer and be admitted to bail in the sum of five hundred dollars, and be committed to the warden or keeper of the city prison of the city of New York until he gives such bail. SOLON B. SMITH,

"'Police Justice.

"'Dated September 16, 1881.'"

You will therefore see, on referring to your open letter, that you admit that my first public communication against your act was printed on the 14th day of Sept., and yet you charge me with being like Ananias and Sapphira of old, by keeping back a part. How could I mention, in my communication of the 14th, that which was not written by you until the 15th? But you know very well that the letter you refer to as having been kept back was referred to as above on the 20th day of September, that being the first letter from myself after receiving the letter written by you on the 15th. You therefore utterly fail to show in your open letter that I had kept anything back. In the same open letter you refer to a lawsuit in Ireland between Wetton & Co., and William Wilson, of No. 64½ Patrick street, Cork, and the most malicious act that any man could conceive is the taking the trouble of writing to Ireland for information respecting a man, and when such information is received, telling one-half the story in a open letter to the public and keeping back the other half. This you know you hav done, and I challenge you to publish at your own cost your open letter, as I at my own cost shall publish this. Your malicious act in thus concealing the real nature of the lawsuit between Wetton and myself as rival manufacturers and large employers of labor is an act unworthy of the commonest informer. I hav a deed from the British government wherein, on the settlement of that suit as above referred to, such deed binds my opponents to pay me a large sum of money in settlement thereof. Your attorney, Mr. Teuney or Mr. Colgate, your President, can see that deed whenever they choose to call at my offices. Yet you, in your open letter, attempted to show that I had been guilty of a crime. If this was not vindictiv malice, what was it? Again in the same open letter, you would insinuate that my patent and Edgar Wetton's were the same. Yet you know very well that the circular from which you obtained the name of my patents contains also the following description of my patent:

"During the past few years seven or eight different patents hav been taken out for Electric and Magnetic Belts, but the vital defect in each and all of them has been a want of means whereby the magnetism once imparted to them could be retained. This defect has been fully overcome in the 'Wilsonia' invention. William Wilson struck the happy idea of attaching a series of Voltaic Plies to the Magnets, which by absorbing the natural exudations of the skin giv out a constant galvanic current, and thus keep up a continuous supply of Magnetism. Another very important feature of the 'Wilsonia' invention is this. Wearers of these garments never experience unpleasant shocks and are never afflicted with sores, which inevitably result from wearing galvanic chain bands—they having to be steeped in vinegar to render them capable of imparting any curativ property, and in this process they become the mother of an incurable form of erysipelas! And then, the 'Wilsonia' is as comfortable to wear as any undergarment. These appliances keep the body warm in the cold season, and, by their power of absorption, impart, in the summer, a refreshing coolness."

Also the Method of Manufacture.

"Wilsonia" Magnetic Clothing!

These goods are made as explained below, and every person following out the instructions here given can make for themselvs and their own wearing any garments to suit their malady.

Although I hav patented the invention, I giv any one the liberty to make for themselvs, but shall prosecute any one who dares to make them for others to wear, or to sell.

Process of Manufacture.

Take a sheet of cloth, or any woven fabric, lay it upon another sheet of gutta percha tissue, then lay a sheet of muslin corresponding in size; fasten these together. Then take hard steel plates (brittle as glass they need be for our purpose), cut them into narrow strips about one and a half inches long; perforate each plate, making a hole large enough to take in an ordinary shoe eyelet. These plates to the number of 250, with 500 eyelets, fastened to the cloth, are sufficient to make an ordinary NERVE INVIGORATOR. Over these plates, when fastened to the fabric, we place another sheet of India rubber tissue. Over this again we place another sheet of muslin and fasten the whole mass together with hot irons. We then puncture the eyelets the whole thickness of the fabric so fastened together, having about five hundred openings through the garments. Then we cover the whole with a lining of any material to suit the fancy of the wearer, but preferably canton flannel should be used. When the garment is so far finished it is magnetized by a powerful electro magnet until every plate of the whole series is thoroughly saturated with magnetism.

Having described the process as above, I again say that if you make the garments as I direct they will do you just as much good as though I made them myself. But the above being my patent, I shall prosecute any one who dares to make them for profit, and shall use the utmost rigor of the law in so prosecuting.

Now, then, where comes in quackery with with the "WILSONIA?" Why do not the advertisers of quack nostrums tell purchasers how to make their compounds?

Now, as to Prof. White's great discovery: He told us a few weeks ago, through the columns of the New York Herald, that he had made a marvelous discovery, viz., that the whole secret of the electric charge in the Gymnotus, or electric eel, lay wholly in the fact that the said electric ell was developed in a film, whereby its electric charge was augmented. This marvelous discovery, he said, was only made after six and three-quarter years of fruitless research, and by an accident, he goes on to say, the whole thing was made complete.

Now it will be seen from reading the above formula, that WILLIAM WILSON'S patent was taken out two and a half years before Professor White made his statement through the columns of the Herald.

It is upon the Gutta Percha Film patented by MR. WILSON, that the secret of the "WILSONIA'S" force wholly lies.

Physicians, electricians, and scientists are, therefore, invited to examin critically into the nature of the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING, and, with the formula before them, go into their laboratories and experiment for themselvs. They will then know that the

WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING

Is the Greatest Wonder of the Age, and yet withal one of the most Simple of Inventions

In the same open letter which you sent to the newspapers you maliciously attempt to belittle me by assuming that, because I had been a cabinetmaker, I could not therefore attain to a knowledge of curativ agencies distinct from the methods laid down by the schools. In answer to this assumption of yours, I can only say that I pity you for your stupidity. Do you not know that the celebrated Dr. John Hunter of London worked at the bench as a cabinetmaker at forty-two years of age, and afterward became the most eminent surgeon in Europe? and to-day the Hunterian Museum in London is a living monument of that cabinetmaker's skill? Do you not also know that all great inventions ever made emanate from among those whom we least suspect as the originators of new thought?

Another important reference in your open letter I refer to: On a board sign you say as follows: "Read the Anthony Comstock letters in favor of 'Wilsonia.'" In answer to which I simply say that I hav the copies of fifty-five letters sent to you in favor of my garments, the parties sending such letters being those to whom you had conveyed your libelous communication. Therefore I call these letters of my patients the Anthony Comstock letters, and shall continue to publish them in a pamphlet dedicated to the Young Men's Christian Association of Brooklyn and New York; nor you nor your society shall intimidate me against such publication. Nothing shall be hidden nor held back. In conclusion, I again make the following challenge to you: To sign bonds for $5,000 if you can prove that I do not cure ninety per cent of the incurables given over by the doctors, or to produce one case where all the benefit was was not derived as promised on the purchase of the goods, such goods being worn as directed as to quantity and to time. I believe your society requires money to carry on its operations; here therefore, is a chance to add to its funds. I will also sign bonds for a like sum if you can show one testimonial published by me that was not genuin, and will pay all expenses of the six physicians on whom you relied, and will meet them singly or as a body on any platform in the United States, and prove to an audience of scientists that these physicians know nothing of the nature of nerve fluid, the constitution of the blood, nor the difference between electricity and magnetism as a curativ agent. WILLIAM WILSON.

Having thus openly answered your letter, and wishing the whole thing to be closed up, I herewith make you this offer, viz: That you shall, upon the examination of the deeds referred to in my letter as above, between your attorney and Mr. Colgate, upon the conclusion of such investigation, giv me a letter of apology for having been instrumental in casting discredit upon my invention. I am quite willing to accept your plea of ignorance of the facts, and that you were deceived by others.

Upon receipt of such letter of apology, I will withdraw all further proceedings. WILLIAM WILSON.

Important to the Suffering and Afflicted Who Hav Been Deceived by Advertising Nostrum Venders.

The great success attending the introduction of my world-famed WILSONIA GARMENTS has incited a host of speculators to place upon the market several bogus arrangements under the specious titles of "Magnetic Clothing" or "Magnetic Garments." One unprincipled person has actually copied my engraving representing my clothing, so that a person not seeing the garments would take it for granted that the goods so advertised were facsimiles of the WILSONIA, the engravings representing the clothing being identical with those issued by myself thus tending to defraud the public by their purchasing a worthless article for the cure of some malady or other. This same person has copied, almost verbatim, the language of my own circulars. One of these garments was brought me direct from the vender. I find it to be a clumsy imitation of the first magnetic garments made in Europe some fifteen years ago. I would therefore ask the public to see the Wilsonia garments before purchasing anything represented as a magnetic clothing. They will then find that an attempt at imitation has been made by an engraved circular containing copies of my own circular as above stated, and so cunningly has the device been carried out that parties purchasing the goods from such circular will suppose that the garments so purchased were identical with my own, but when seen together they are as different as anything can possibly be conceived. If, however, persons will call at any of our STORES in New York or Brooklyn, or elsewhere in the United States where Wilsonia depots are opened, they may buy everything made clear to them. The claim of CHEAPNESS is a poor point to put forward when the matter of disease and life and death is in the balance. My reputation now is so unparalleled that never before in the history of the world hav such remarkable cures been effected as those following the timely use of the now world-renowned Wilsonia garments. The blind hav been made to see, the deaf to hear, the helpless paralytic to walk erect, the demented to become sane, the martyr to catarrh and asthma to speak and breathe freely, the terrified with heart disease to walk forward among the public without the terrors of impending death. All and every form of disease disappear when the Wilsonia Magnetic Garments are used as directed. I will undertake to cure 90 per cent of the so-called incurables now in the hospitals in the United States, and will place my garments upon such patients free of charge, the only condition I make being that the authorities governing such hospitals shall not allow any medicin to be given the patients during the wearing of my garments, and that the cures shall be publicly advertised as soon as made. CITIZENS OF AMERICA! when and where in the history of the world has such an offer as this been made? Here, in New York and Brooklyn alone, there are thousands of poor invalids in our hospitals passing through the ordeal of a protracted and living death who might, if my offer be accepted, be restored to the world as useful members of society, and this free of charge. If my offer be not accepted by the physicians of the hospitals, then the physicians must stand convicted of indifference and carelessness toward the poor invalids intrusted to their care. I hav sold my patent to a company with a view of manufacturing on a very large scale, so that with increased facilities in the form of valuable machinery specially prepared for our purposes, we shall be able to place upon the market an unlimited supply of these wonderfully curativ appliances.

After years of study in the particular direction of electrical therapeutics, I hav from time to time made many improvements on my first conception of what was needed for the relief and cure of disease until the "Wilsonia" in its present form contains all the elements of what has gone before in the same direction. The continuity of current is made complete, the dangers of non-ventilation are entirely overcome. This is an important point in the "Wilsonia." Thousands of persons are to-day suffering from the effects of retarded perspiration, having had thrown back into the organism the poisonous emanations of the body. The expensiv nature of the "Wilsonia" combination in all its entirety makes the price somewhat high, but yet it is far the cheapest in the end, inasmuch as the curativ force will continue for years, although a commoner kind will frequently result in marvelous cures. These commoner goods we sell at the following prices:

PRICE LIST.

"DESIGN" IN NATURE.

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

Gems of Thought.

THERE is no one great reform that is more needed than that one of producing a higher order of population. To learn how best to generate grand, good, noble, pure, and intelligent beings in the knowledge that is now most desirable of all. The reckless, careless, unthinking production of children that we behold on every hand would disgrace any nation or people who hav any desire for or admiration of the physical, moral, or mental beauty of men, women, and children.—Elmina D Slenker.

ARIOSTO tells a pretty story of a fairy, who by some mysterious law of her nature, was condemned to appear at certain seasons in the form of a foul and poisonous snake. Those who injured her in the period of her disguise were forever excluded from participation in the blessings which she bestowed in her power. But to those who, in spite of her loathsome form, pitied and protected her, she afterwards revealed herself in the beautiful and celestial form which was natural to her, accompanied their steps, granted all their wishes, filled their homes with wealth, made them happy in love and victorious in war. Such a spirit is Liberty. At times she takes the form of a hateful reptil. She grovels, she hisses, she stings. But woe to those who in disgust shall venture to crush her. And happy are those who, having dared to receive her in her degraded and frightful shape, shall at length be rewarded by her in the time of her beauty and glory.—Elizabeth Cady Stanton.

[NOTE.—If my memory does not deceive me, Macaulay givs much the same version of Ariosto's story and in much the same words. I cannot now put my hand on the passage, but perhaps some of my readers may be able to supply it to THE TRUTH SEEKER, or, better still, givs us a translation of the story from the Italian of Ariosto himself.—C.]

WE are all agreed that truth is good; or, at all events, those who are not agreed must be treated as persons beyond the pale of reason, and on whose obtuse understandings it would be idle to waste an argument. He who says the truth is not always to be told, and that it is not fit for all minds, is simply a defender of falsehood; and we should take no notice of him, inasmuch as the object of discussion being to destroy error, we cannot discuss with a man who deliberately affirms that error should be spared.—Buckle's Essays.

I BELIEVE that religious duties consist in doing justice, loving mercy, and endeavoring to make our fellow-creatures happy —Paine's Age of Reason.

IT is not unusual to see men rest their opinions upon foundations that hav no more certainty nor solidity than the propositions built on them and embraced for their sake. Such foundations are these and the like, viz., the founders or leaders of my party are good men, and, therefore, their tenets are true; it is the opinion of a sect that is erroneous, therefore it is false; it hath long been recorded in the world, therefore is is true; or it is new and therefore false. These and many the like, which are by no means the measures of truth and falsehood, the generality of men made the standards by which they accustom their understanding to judge. And thus, falling into a habit of determining of truth and falsehood by such wrong measures, it is no wonder they they should embrace error for certainty and be very positiv in things that they hav no ground for.—Locke's Conduct of the Understanding.

THE arguments for the immortality of the soul are, I think, far stronger than the arguments of the Atheists; and I cannot but wonder that they who reject a future state should believe in the reality of a future world. Still, those who do reject it, are not only justified in openly denying it, but are bound to do so. Our first and paramount duty is to be true to ourselvs; and no man is true to himself who fears to express his opinion. There is hardly any vice which so debases us in our own esteem as moral cowardice. There is hardly any virtue which so elevates our character as moral courage. Therefore it is that the more unpopular a notion the greater the merit of him who advocates it, provided, of course, he does so in honesty and singleness of heart. On this account, although I regard the expectation of another life as the prop and mainstay of mankind, and although I cannot help thinking that they who reject it hav taken an imperfect and uncomprehensiv view and hav not covered the whole field of inquiry, I do strenuously maintain that against it every species of attack is legitimate, and I feel assured that the more it is assailed the more it will flourish and the more vividly we shall realize its meaning, its depths, and its necessity.—Buckle's Essays.

HE who can think dispassionately and deeply as I do, is great as I am; none other. But his opinions are at freedom to diverge from mine, as mine are from his; and indeed, in recollection, I never loved those most who thought with me, but those rather who deemed my sentiments worth discussion and who corrected me witn frankness and affability.—W. S. Landor.

I KNOW that it is possible, by legislation, to make the rich poor, but that it is utterly impossible to make the poor rich. But I believe that the progress of experimental science, the free intercourse of nation with nation, the unrestricted influx of commodities from countries when they are cheap and the unrestricted afflux of labor toward countries where it is dear, will soon produce, nay, I believe that they are beginning to produce, a great and most blessed social revolution —Macaulay's Speech at Edinburgh, 1852.

MANY things which are not punishable by law are morally worse than many things that are punishable. The man who treats a generous benefactor with gross ingratitude and insolence deserves more severe reprehension than the man who aims a blow in a passion, or breaks a window in a frolic. Yet we hav punishment for assault, misdemeanor, and none for ingratitude. The rich man who refuses a mouthful of rice to save a fellow-creature from death may be far worse than the starving wretch who snatches and devours the rice. Yet we punish the latter for theft and we do not punish the former for hard-heartedness.—Macaulay.

Odds and Ends.

MARY and Jeany, two country lasses, were discussing their new minister. "D'ye ken what he puts me in mind o'?" said Mary; and then archly answered, "Just o' a kiss frae a body ye dinna like."

THE Catholics hav the advantage of Protestants in some of their theological dogmas. They believe in purgatory, which is an exceedingly convenient stopping-place, but Protestants are compelled to go further and fare worse.

HANOVER College, Ind., recently admitted ladies to her halls, and the result has been several weddings among the students. One occurred last week, and the young groom and his best man were suspended for their innocent diversion, and the bride ran off home to escape the same fate. Coeducation is a success at Hanover.—Vincennes Sun.

A REALLY most amusing tale
Is that of Jonah and the whale:
A merry one the time to pass
Is that of Balaam and his ass;
Another that is somewhat odd
Is Mary giving birth to God;
While for a neatly-rounded fib
There's mother Eve from Adam's rib.

WE regret to inform our fair correspondent, Mrs McRafferty of Stevenson street, that after diligent search we find no clause in the Constitution of the United States making it a penal offense for Mrs. O'Hoolihan, whose back-yard is to windward of Mrs. McR.'s, to sift ashes while the McRafferty linen is hung out to dry. It is just these inexcusable omissions to protect the most sacred rights of our prominent citizens that are slowly but surely bringing about the downfall of this alleged republic.—San Francisco Paper.

DESIRING to show our distinguished visitor some attention, a very small man, with a very large moustache, representing an alleged morning paper of this city, sidled up to Gen. Sherman this morning as he was viewing the cotton patch near the Exposition grounds.

"General," yawped the little man, "do you think cotton can be successfully raised on such soil as that?"

"Humph!" remarked the general, "yes, I think it can."

"What else can be raised on it?" asked the little reporter, smiling on William Tecumseh in a genial sort of way.

"What else?" rejoined the general. "Oh, anything can be raised there. Why, I raised hell on this very spot myself seventeen years ago!"—Atlanta Post-Appeal.

TOO AWFULLY UTTER.

"Well," said a Deadwood man who had just been introduced to a Brooklyn girl, and who had been asked by her if they had many of those lovely frontiersmen out his way, "well, mum, we hev right smart of 'em in our neck o' the woods."

"And do they wear fringed legs and hunt those dear, sweet buffalo?" asked the girl.

"The stage drivers wear fringes and sich, and when a buffaler shines out some one is pooty apt to hook on."

"How supreme! And those gorgeous Indians in their picturesque wigwams of wampum, with their blending combinations of war-paint, do you often see them?"

"Oh! once in a while we get a back at a buck, but mostly they are on the reservations," replied the Deadwood man, staring. "The does comes in occasionally, but we don't truck with them."

"The sweet things! And you hav such sunsets out in your mountain fastnesses, and such loves of highwaymen! Do you ever see these delightful highwaymen!"

"Not often, mum. They get in the brush, and as for sunsets, we get 'em pretty reg'lar in fair weather."

"Isn't it just too awfully too!" exclaimed the girl, clasping her hands and rolling her eyes.

"Yes mum," stammered the Deadwood man, "sometimes its pretty dern too, leastwise it was the day that Cobbler Duffy came into town on the landslide."

"An avalanche! Do you mean an avalanche? Oh! Can there be anything more crystally utter than an avalanche?"

"It was pooty utter," hazarded the Deadwood man, dropping into his companion's style of expression. "The cobbler had a—a—he had a crystally shaft up the side of the butts, and one day he was—was tooing up and down there, and things slipped out from under him."

"Oh! how radiant! How iridescent!"

"Yes mum, and he began to radiate to'ards town at the rate of one thousand miles and three furlong a minute. We seen him—a-utterling down the side of the mountains, ripping up trees and rocks, and tooing along, and his iridescent wife flapped out of her schack and began to raise a row."

"Poor lily," moaned the girl, "did she stop the glorious avalanche?"

"No mum, not quite. Duffy fetched up against his schack all standing and began to howl like a blizzard, 'cause he thought he'd lost his mine. But when he tipped the landslide up on one end and there was the mine underneath just as he had left it. So he could work it right under his winder That was pooty considerable too, eh?" and the Deadwood man never winked.

"How sublime! How crystalline!"

"But I was going to say we never had sunset since."

"So starlike," murmured the girl.

"Yes, mostly starlike. You see, the landslide stands there to this day on end, and they don't dare to turn it over for fear of filling in the town, so we don't get any sun after eleven in the morning."

"A perennial twilight! So fearfully, awfully, terribly utter."

"Yes," murmured the Deadwood man, "Its just about as utter as you get 'em."

And she sat and gazed upon him, wrapped in admiration, while he fell into a reverie, and wondered at Brooklyn hospitality in not providing "sand boxes" for strangers.—Detroit Free Press.

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 27 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

Price 15 cents. Sold at this office.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhœa and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or pinkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable, and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR,

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhœa or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, his system based upon scientific fact."

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

Notes and Clippings.

MR. GLADSTONE has had a regular body-guard of police of late. This is as much a novelty for an English Prime Minister as for an American President.

THE Maltese are protesting against having the English language forced upon them. A petition against this, signed by 15,000 persons, is to be sent to Queen Victoria.

A LADY has placed the sum of £250 at the disposal of the committee of the Homes for Working Girls in London, toward the founding of a home in the south of London, to be called Garfield House.

GOLDWIN SMITH, who was rejected as an honorary member of St. George's Society of Toronto, has written a letter to the society expressing his best wishes for its welfare, and inclosing a check for $100 for the charitable fund.

THE Star Routers hav all been discharged. Their brainey attorney was Robert G. Ingersoll. The man who permitted the Grand Jury to be discharged without indicting them was Attorney General Wayne MacVeagh. Comments reserved.—Great West.

THE dispersed orders of French monks are beginning to show their despair of better times by selling off their empty establishments. Thus the Italian Barnabite Monastery in Paris has been demolished, and the Jesuits' college at Poitiers is advertised tor sale.

MR. BRADLAUGH, addressing a meeting lately, said that the curse of the day, agrarian outrage and mischief, had arisen from generations of mismanagement. At the same time, had he been in the ministry he should hav approved of the arrest of Mr. Parnell, but he would not hav expressed jubilation over it.

WHILE the congregation in a Welsh village were recently assembling for divine services, a huge dog bounded through the building and took possession of the pulpit, obstinately resisting the efforts of the minister and several members of the congregation to dislodge him. In the end the minister had to content himself with the reading-desk, leaving the dog in undisturbed possession of the rostrum, in which he quietly remained while the service lasted.

THE excavations that hav been conducted during some months past by the Greek Archæological Society hav resulted in the discovery of the theater of Esculapius. It is nearly as large as the theater at Megapolis, being estimated to seat more than 30,000 people. The material is Pentelic marble, and imagination fancies that it can trace the hand of the sculptor Polyclytes. Many remains of statues, columns, etc., hav been brought to light.

"BROTHERS," said President Taylor, in his last annual speech to the Mormon convention, "we don't exactly know how the Temple fund stands. There is no need of keeping any account. There is the building going up right before your eyes, and you can all see for yourselvs. We will now sing the 337th hymn." This was regarded as rather cool, considering that the fund has already absorbed several millions, and charges of stealing in connection with it hav been made.

THE editor and proprietor of the North American Review announces that the Review will be hereafter published at 30 Lafayette place, and will appear under its own imprint. He states that he has found it impossible to conduct the publication in the spirit of the motto adopted by its founders, making it a forum of independent thought, and extending, at his discretion, the hospitality of its pages to thinkers and scholars of all creeds and and forms of belief, and at the same time to maintain relations with a publishing house having extensiv school books and other interests of its own to promote. This change of imprint will involve no alteraiion whatever in the organization or service of the Review.

MRS. GARFIELD has placed the literary estate of the late President in the hands of Col. A. F. Rockwell, U. S. A., who is charged, under her direction, with its care, preservation, and disposition. Joseph Rudolph, the administrator, has appointed Gen. D. G. Swaim his attorney and financial agent. Mrs. Garfield is overwhelmed with letters begging for money from all parts of the country and from people of all conditions and classes. It is impossible for her ever to reply to them, as she receives from thirty to sixty a day.

THE best joke yet! It turns out that the so-called indecent passages in Voltaire's works seized by the Canadian customs were quotations from eminent divines. So says the Toronto World, Nov. 11th. These passages Voltaire quoted to illustrate his argument. The article on Genesis was written by a learned friend of the Prince of Wales, who will be surprised that this man of pure life and letters should be accused of indecency, while the Bishop of Warburton, Dr. Marsay, and Dr. Middleton were the writers of others of the indecent passages. Deuteronomy and the Song of Solomon are sweetly chaste because orthodox, while Papa Chiniquy's stories of the confessional are nice for little children, because they attack the Catholics—Mayflower.

THE despatch from Washington announcing that twelve jurors had been drawn to try Guiteau added that thay were "all Christians." Meanwhile Guiteau stoutly declares, as heretofore, that he is not insane, except in the "legal sense"—that is, in the sense that the plea is simply a lawyer's tiick for professional purposes. Now, if twelve Christians can convict Guiteau they must be frauds. He says that God told him to do the deed, just as he told Abraham to offer up Isaac. The divine command was to him unmistakable. He obeyed it. If he dies at the hands of twelve Christian jurors he will die a martyr to his faith, while they will go back on theirs. The "gospel train," however, probably will ignore this religious hot box, but the more thoughtful of the passengers are beginning to fear the consequences, and may hasten to get off at the next station.—Liberty.

A FIRE broke out in the shaft of a deep coal mine at Canton, Ill., and the miners made a wild rush for the elevator, crowding the cage and fighting for places. Five trips of the cage would carry them all up, but it looked as though the flames would quickly close the exit, and in the fright and confusion all struggled to be first. Tom Lukey, the cool and muscular boss of the gang, drove them all aside, and then called out the names of as many men as could be hoisted out at once. In making the selections he chose those who had large and dependent families. When the cage came down again he filled it with those who had fewer relativs, and the next time with husbands who had no children. It was not until the fourth lift that unmarried men were given a chance. The fifth carried some almost worthless bummers and Lukey himself, with the fire scorching their clothes. When praised for his act he carelessly replied: "Oh, that wasn't anything. If I hadn't got those fellows out of the way I would hav been burned up, don't you see."

THE deacons of the Baptist church at Champaign, Ill., quietly requested the Rev. I. S. Mahan to resign the pastorate, and he did so; but afterward he said publicly that he was the victim of church persecution. A trial before a church tribunal is therefore to be had. The charge is that he is bold, if not wicked, in his attentions to women. "Though he isn't handsome," says one of the deacons, "he is full of palaver and tricks. He can help a lady over a muddy crossing with the grace of a city beau, clasp her around the waist with the charming fervor of a Broadway policeman, and shake hands with her in the most captivating manner. Shaking hands is his forte. Mahan is not pretty to look at, but he has winning ways." A peculiarity of the trial will be that the testimony will all be given by women not members of the church. "You see," explains the deacon already quoted, "we want to keep the matter as much outside as possible. We could call plenty of our own members as witnesses, but we don't want to hurt their feelings if it can be avoided."

THE PSALM-SINGING ADMINISTRATON.

The blandly deceitful Heathen Chinee,
With his tricks so dark, and his guileful ways,
Was harmless as any child can be,
Compared with the rule of fraudulent Hayes.

It turned up its nose at the thought of wine,
And smacked its lips over weak lemonade,
But cheated the people who came to dine,
And picked their pockets before it prayed.

The mask of piety covered it well,
But under that cheap and thin veneer
The worms of corruption loved to dwell,
And rioted there in the best of cheer.

Such tricks it played, and such frauds it wrought,
That its memory sickens the nose of fame;
And when in its guileful ways it was caught,
It declared that it never knew the game.

Begot in dishonor and born in crime,
The impress of fraud on its brow it bore;
And it tells its tale to all coming time,
Of rottenness reaching from skin to core.

THE difference between the American and the German idea of personal honor is very marked. A while ago the son of a respectable German banker was suspected of a defalcation. The old man did not try to screen his son from the consequences of his crime, but took the case into his own hands in a somewhat novel way. He put a roll of bills on the table, then a loaded pistol, and calling his son into the room, said: "Sir, there is the filthy money with which to pay back what you hav stolen, and there is a loaded pistol. I hope you hav sufficient decency left to know and do your duty." That sounds terrible. However, it is good enough for the Old World, though it must be confessed, with something like national pride, that we hav made considerable advance on that old-fashioned and thread-bare theory. If an American father should dare to intimate anything of the kind to his son the deeply insulted youth would take the pistol and shoot the old gentleman, pocket the money, and then swear that the real defalter had remorselessly died by his own hand. And that innocent young man would be made president of some of our charitable institutions and warden of the church.

THE Washington World tells this about Col. Ingersoll: "Ingersoll is a man who Bobs up serenely in all circumstances. The other day the post office people fined a contractor forty thousand dollars for failing to perform his trips according to schedule requirements. The contractor was highly indignant and sent Col. Ingersoll to remonstrate with the Postmaster-General. Mr. James cannot talk as Tom Ochiltree, and so he sent for Elmer, the Second Assistant. Elmer comes from Tioga county, New York, and for a country banker he is a great surprise. He is imposing in appearanec, polished in his manner, a good judge of character, and is very happy in conversation. There were several preliminary passages between Ingersoll and Elmer, in which both acquitted themselvs creditably. Then coming down to business, Elmer said, 'Colonel, this fine will have to be paid. Recognizing your well-known reverence for scriptural precedent and illustration, I will put the case thus: If Balaam had been engaged to perform a similar service and had agreed to convey the mails on the back of his donkey from Jericho to Jerusalem, and had failed, as your client has done, it would hav been the duty of the postmaster at Jerusalem, provided the law was the same as ours, to hav deducted from Balaam's pay for the trips which had not been performed.' 'Then, by George!' cried Ingersoll, 'I think the jackass would hav been the smartest man in the three.'"

THE prosecution in the Giteau trial has rested and the defense is in progress. The testimony is mainly relativ to the question of the prisoner's sanity. Guiteau was himself sworn as a witness on the 28th ult. He reiterates the statement that the Lord prompted him to the removal of the President, and he expects the Lord will see him safe through. Much of the testimony thus far goes to show that he is of unsound mind. Guiteau's boisterous behavior and general contumacy hav led to a threat from Judge Cox to gag him during the remainder of the trial unless he discontinues his interruptions.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

Vienna to Athens.—Concluded.

GOOD-BYE TO VIENNA.

Having passed three days in the capital of Austria, it was time for me to think of making my way further south over the Austrian Alps to the Adriatic Sea. At a little past six on the morning of the 14th I was in a carriage and rolling along the way to the station in the southern part of the city. The train left at seven o'clock. For an hour or two our way led through suburban villages, sandy plains, and pleasant country. This brought us to the Alps, and soon we began to rise the mountain at as steep a grade as a railway can be made to run practically. The ascent varies from one foot in a hundred to one in forty, and this is kept up for many miles by curving and twisting among the Alps in a spiral manner to rise higher and higher toward their summits. The ascent made by the trains is said to be 2,788 feet. It is unquestionably one of the greatest achievements in engineering skill in the world. We left the town of Gloggnitz near the level of the plain, and after bending and winding among the mountains for an hour we emerged up among the hills, but a very few miles from the town we had left. We passed over many viaducts, arches, and steep places walled up, where we could look down almost perpendicularly several hundred feet, the tops of buildings and of fir-trees being hundreds of feet beneath us. We passed through tunnel after tunnel, until the fifteenth, which is the Semmering, and is three or four thousand feet in length. This is the "Semmering Pass," and is one of the grandest railroad rides in the world. The route is necessarily very crooked, the line being much more circumlocutive than the letter S. We had to make long rides to get a little way ahead, rising constantly as we went. Far below us nestled little villages and quiet homes, and a long way beneath us we could look down and see people working in the narrow valleys and defiles, where a little land could be found level enough to grow something for man or beast.

Some of the mountain tops were snow-capped, but not with perpetual snow. In a recent storm, when it rained on the plains it had snowed upon the mountains. In this portion the Alps are not so tall and not so sharp-pointed and precipitous as in Switzerland, but still they are very rugged, and are piled up by nature hundreds of feet above hundreds of feet until thousands are reached. In many places the bare rocks are very precipitous and look like huge monuments and tombstones high above us along our devious ascending course. The scenery is wild and grand in the extreme, and continues for a long time.

After passing through the Semmering Tunnel we have reached the summit, and begin to gradually descend. The descent seems longer and more gradual than the ascent, and all along we pass little hamlets, and now and then villages of considerable size, with churches and museums, and here the level land between the hills broadens out to a width of a mile or more. It is a place of considerable resort, and probably no town among the Austrian Alps is more noted or more visited.

The Alpine country continues nearly all the way to Trieste, which nestles down in a crescent form outside the rocky hills beside the beautiful Adriatic. We were fifteen hours on the rail between Vienna and Trieste, arriving at the latter place at ten o'clock at night. The trains, however, in this country, do not run extremely rapid. I stopped at the Delorme Hotel, because they claim there to speak English, but it is to a very limited degree. They understood me well enough, however, that I would at once go to bed, eating and drinking nothing, and doing no sight-seeing till morning.

As soon as breakfast was despatched the following morning, I started out to see the town.

Trieste, the Tergeste of the Romans, is the chief town of the Austrian Littorale, or coast land of Illyria, and the most flourishing and important seaport of the Austrian dominions. It is at the northeast point of the Adriatic Sea, and at the bottom of the gulf named after the town. It is said to owe its prosperity to the Emperor Charles VI., who in 1719 made it a free port, and to Maria Theresa, who fostered it with her patronage. Its population at that time was about 4,000, but it has gradually increased to 100,000. It has completely supplanted Venice, and may be said to have engrossed the entire trade of the Adriatic. The value of its imports amounts to nearly $50,000,000, and its exports to somewhere about two-thirds that amount.

The old town is principally located upon the hill some little distance back from the water, and has a very old cathedral and castle. The tower of the church is said to stand on the very point where once stood a temple of Jupiter. The new town, consisting of broad streets and handsome white houses, occupies the level space near the harbor. Part of its streets and quays are founded on ground gained from the sea, or from a salt marsh. A broad canal runs up from the harbor for a thousand or two feet, and in it large vessels can unload and load with safety. A great deal of commerce exists here, and many vessels are constantly being loaded and unloaded.

The new part of the town has quite a fresh and neat appearance. The streets are paved with blocks of stone from two to four feet long and twelve or fifteen inches wide. They are cut in ridges to prevent horses' feet from slipping, and as they wear smooth are re-cut. The sidewalk and the streets are nearly on a level. There are no gutters, and the sidewalks are about two inches higher than the street. Heavy stone posts, three feet high, are planted at the edge of the street, between it and the sidewalk, to exclude vehicles from the sidewalk. These are twelve or fifteen inches in diameter; mainly round, with a cap, while some are octagonal, and others fluted.

The Corso is the widest, prettiest street, and is bountifully supplied with stores well filled with goods. Some of the other streets are also very nice. The citizens are of several nationalities, a considerable portion being Italians, with many Austrians, Dalmatians, Armenians, Albanians, Hungarians, Servians, Montnegrins, Jews, and Greeks. Many different costumes are worn, and many dialects spoken. Many English people are said to be in business here, but I was not fortunate enough to find them. I went into the market, held in an open square with a stone floor and no roof. Fruits are now abundant and cheap. The grapes are especially fine. Pears and peaches are also plentiful, and tomatoes abundant. Nearly twenty women were sitting and making bouquets of the flowers of the country, many of which were new to me. They used white, perforated paper, made in the shape of leaves, etc., for the outer part, and built up the bouquet with great skill. Many were very large, measuring two feet across, and were decideely beautiful. Gladly would I have sent some to the loved ones at home, could they have retained their freshness and beauty.

The climate of Trieste is said so be very changeable, and subject to very sudden alternations from intense heat to piercing cold, owing, it is said, to two winds, opposite in character, and equally intolerable—the hot or oppressive Sirocco (Græco-Levanti) from the south coast, and the cold, cutting Boro (Græco) from the north coast The former is said to have the effect of driving the fish into the harbor. The latter is described as so powerful that one may lean against it and be upheld. It is stated that it often blows people into the canal. I must say, however, that the weather here now is extremely lovely, and the breezes of the most gentle character.

A want of shade trees exists here, a small grove of trees called the Boschetto being almost the only ones to be seen. The city has the appearance of being dry and heated in hot weather. In the market place is a public fountain, where the water runs out in four moderate-sized streams to the four points of the compass, and around the fountain were gathered a score or more of women, waiting to fill their tubs and other vessels; and while thus waiting they indulge in chat and gossip to a not unlimited degree.

A few miles out from Trieste, on the shore of the Adriatic, stands the beautiful palace of Miramar, the lovely residence of the unfortunate Emperor Maximilian, who lost his life in Mexico. It is said to be a very pleasant place to visit, but I had not time to go out there.

At 2:30 P.M., on Saturday, the 15th, our steamer, the Ceres, left the docks of Trieste and began her course in a southeast direction down the beautiful Adriatic. I was aboard in time, and as we departed from this gem of the sea fondly watched its receding shores and the hills which surround the city. The day is lovely, and the ride up to late in the evening is most charming. I sit on deck, writing to you, and looking back toward Trieste as we press toward the southeast. The goddess Ceres was not noted as a fast goddess, and in like manner the steamer Ceres, on which we have taken passage, is not a fast steamer, at least she has no disposition to be fast. She is one of the eighty or ninety steamers in the Austrian Lloyd lines which traverse the Adriatic, the Mediterranean, the Danube, and the Black Sea. I am informed the captains are laid under orders not to make over nine knots an hour. The company is under obligations to deliver the mail within a certain number of days, and faster than this they do not care to run, as it requires double the coal to run thirteen or fourteen miles an hour than nine, and the number of passengers carried does not justify extra effort or expense. We have about twenty first-cabin passengers on board, with several of the second-class.

Sunday, 16th.—We made to-day steady progress at the rate of nine knots an hour down the Adriatic, keeping in sight of land on our left the eastern shores of the Adriatic, but out of sight of land entirely on our right, or the western shore, which is Italy. The water of the Adriatic is bluer than the Atlantic—so deep and blue indeed as to look almost inky and black. The skies, however, are beautiful—of a soft, mellow blue peculiar to this latitude. The inlands and the main land on our left are almost constantly in view, but they are merely mountain ranges of solid rock, with very little signs of verdure and no trees. It is this continuous range of mountain rock for one hundred miles after another while passing the countries of Dalmatia, Herzegovina, Montenegro, and Albania. It is picturesque, and from the historical associations connected with it it is interesting, but otherwise not particularly so. Occasionally we pass a small humble village on the mountain side, but the query invariably arises, What can the people find to live upon on that mountain of rock? I hope the country is better in the interior; if not, it must be a most sterile place for human beings to live.

The sea has not been very rough, though we have had a brisk wind; but I must confess the motion has been sufficient to disturb my stomach, and twice or thrice it seemed to make an effort to get inside out. The Adriatic is far less rough than the Atlantic, but probably the condition of the stomach at the time has much to do in causing sea-sickness. By keeping the recumbent position, however, the sickness was slight.

I made up my mind at first that no one was on board who could speak English, and I resigned myself to the gloomy fate of making the passage without being able to hold converse with any one, but I was much pleased to find my room-mate, a Mr. Thomas Lumsden, from Edinburgh—whom I find an interesting traveling companion—could speak English. He is going to Greece on a business trip to sell some paper-making machinery, he being in an Edinburgh house engaged in the manufacture of that kind of merchandise. I have since become acquainted with a young man by the name of Shaw from Boston, who, having finished his university course, is spending a year in Europe. Having one or two on board with whom one can converse serves much to relieve the tedium of the passage. The other passengers are Germans, Greeks, Italians, Turks, etc. The fare on the boat is fair, and the passage down the Adriatic is a pleasant one.

Monday, 17th.—Our passage continues much the same, passing in near view of the coasts and islands of Montenegro and Albania, through the straits of Otrando, and then to the island of Corfu, where we arrived at 4 P.M. Here several of the passengers went on shore in yawls, there being no dock for the steamer to land at. I also went on shore to mail a letter and to see the town. Mr. Frank C. Clark, the conductor of the Cook's party through Palestine and Egypt, of whom I am to be a member, came on board and introduced himself to me, and informed me that Mr. Bridges and the rest of the party were in Corfu awaiting the steamer. I found Mr. Bridges in very fair health, and we were glad to meet again after a separation of six weeks.

Mr. Lumsden, Mr. Shaw, and myself chartered a carriage, and for an hour rode around the town and suburbs, seeing the gardens, the growth of olive-trees, orange-trees, fig-trees, etc., in full bearing, with a multitude of century plants, or night-blooming cereus, some of which have been in blossom this year. The scenery is decidedly unlike that in the more northern countries in which I have been sojourning, and it is not difficult to realize that we are approaching the tropical regions. A ride of less than half an hour along a roadway lined with the rich growths named, and interspersed with humble dwellings, and now and then a much better residence belonging to some more important personage, brought us to Kamone, the old harbor where the Phœnician city is supposed to have stood. The small islet of Pondikonnissi (Rat Island), about a furlong from the shore, now occupied by a monastery, in the fable of the locality is the Phœnician ship converted by Neptune into stone—the ship which brought Ulysses. At the mouth of the brook at the neighboring village, Kressida, is pointed out the very place where Ulysses was cast ashore when shipwrecked, and where he met with the Princess Nausicaa. East of us lies the land of Ephirus, not a little noted in ancient history.

Corfu contains twenty-five thousand inhabitants, and is the capital of the island of the same name, also of the other six islands constituting the Ionian Islands—Cephalonia, Zante, Santa Maura, Ithaca, Cerigo, and Paxo—of which it is one of the principal. It has changed proprietors several times; it originally belonged to ancient Greece, then became the property of Venice, and later it belonged to England, and, thanks to her, the island is well supplied with roads. It now belongs to Greece again. Next to Athens, Corfu is one of the most important towns in the country, as well as the prettiest. One need not be at a loss to know that Greeks abide here by observing the signs over the stores and shops, which are in modern Greek.

On a horn of land which runs a little way out into the sea, and near the Esplanade, is a formidable-looking fortification, or fortress, with massive walls, which look as though they might withstand a furious cannonading. The Esplanade is an extensive open space, partly surrounded by arcades, from which diverge the road leading to the chief harbor and the street skirting the sea and leading to Castrades, a suburb to the south. On the north side of the Esplanade stands the gray palace formerly occupied by the British Lord High Commissioner. On the west, reaching as far as the fortress, lies the greater portion of the towm, among the crowded houses of which rises the tower of the Spiliotissa (Greek cathedral), and the church of the Hagios Spiridon, the patron saint of the island. The Esplanade is traversed by a carrige-road, flanked with trees, at the end of which is a monument commemorating the gallant defense of Corfu by the Venetian general, Count Von der Schulenburg, in 1716.

We returned to the hotel and partook of dinner about 5:30, and I must confess, as I had eaten nothing all day, and threw up what I ate the day before, I partook of this dinner with a special relish. Here I was also introduced to the company with whom I am to visit Athens, Constantinople, Palestine, and Egypt, whose names and residences are as follows: Mrs. Moots, of Bay City, Mich.; Miss Brayman, of Grant county, Wis.; Miss Rose, of Cleveland, O.; the Rev. Mr. Getz, of Warren, Pa.; Master Fred Wetmore, of the same place; Mons. Lefebre, Paris, France; Mr. Bridges and myself making the number up to eight.

The Rev. Mr. Getz and the first two ladies named are very pious, and I am not sure that they are extraordinarily well pleased at having an Infidel in the company, though they received me with sufficient grace. A Mr. Lawson, of Dublin, wife and daughter, joined our party here for the present, and talk some of accompanying us through Palestine. The Mr. Clark who is our conductor is a young man about twenty-five years of age and a native of Rochester, N. H., so it will be seen we are largely an American company. The others save myself have been through Italy and came across that Adriatic from Brindisi.

At six o'clock we came down to the water's edge and took yawls for the Ceres, but owing to the quantity of freight that had to be taken off, and the slow way they have of doing it, it was eleven o'clock before the wheel was started. We took on here a large addition to our numbers—nearly twenty cabin passengers and thirty or forty of a very motley conglomeration of Greeks, Albanians, and Turks, who occupy the forward deck, and who have their beds and blankets with them. They are a mixed crowd and seem to have great difficulty, judging by their incessant clamor, in determining where they shall make their beds.

Tuesday, 18th.—The morning came in fair again, and found us steaming steadily along. In early morn we passed the island of Santa Maura, near the head of which stands Mount Actium, near which Augustus won his great victory over Anthony, and which materially helped to place him on the throne of the Cæsars. Near this is the "Sweet Harbor" of the ancients. Far above it, and on a peaked rock in the gloomy gorge of the river Acheron, which flows into Port Phaniri, may be descried the walls of the far-famed castle of Suli. We soon came to the mouth of the Ambrasian Gulf, where are the ruins of Nicopolis, the city of victory, built by Augustus to celebrate his victory. Byron, in his Childe Harold, has immortalized this locality. He has these lines:

Land of Albania, where Iskander rose!
Theme of the young and beacon of the wise,
And he his namesake, whose oft-baffled foes,
Shrunk from his deeds of chivalrous emprize;
Land of Albania! let me bend mine eyes
On thee, thou ragged nurse of savage men!
The cross descends, thy minarets arise,
And the pale crescent sparkles in the glen,
Through many a cypress grove within each city's ken.

Childe Harold sailed, and passed the barren spot,
When sad Penelope o'erlooked the wave,
And onward viewed the mount not yet forgot,
The lover's refuge, and the Lesbian's grave.
Dark Sappho! could not verse immortal save,
That breast imbued with such immortal fire?
Could she not live who life eternal gave?
If life eternal may await the lyre,
That only heaven to which earth's children may aspire.

'Twas a Grecian autumn's gentle eve
Childe Harold hailed Leucadia's cape afar;
A spot he longed to see, nor cared to leave;
Oft did he mark the scenes of vanished war,
Actium, Lepanto, fatal Trafalgar;
Mark them unmoved, for he would not delight
(Born beneath some remote inglorious star),
In themes of bloody fray, or gallant fight,
But loathed the bravo's trade and laughed at martial wight.

But when he saw the evening star above
Leucadia's far-projecting rock of woe,
And hailed the last resort of fruitless love
He felt, or deemed he felt, no common glow;
And as the stately vessel glided slow,
Beneath the shadow of that ancient mount,
He watched the billows' melancholy flow.
And sunk albeit in thought as he was wont,
More placid seemed his eye and smooth his pallid front.

Morn dawns, and with it stern Albania's hills,
Dark Suli's rocks and Pindu's inland peak,
Robed half in mist, bedewed with snowy rills,
Arrayed in many a dun and purple streak,
Arise, and as the clouds along them break,
Disclose the dwelling of the mountaineer;
Here roams the wolf, the eagle whets his beak,
Birds, beasts of prey, and wilder men appear,
And gathering storms around convulse the closing year.

. . . . . .

Ambrasia's gulf behold, where once was lost
A world for woman, lovely, harmless thing,
In yonder rippling bay their naval host,
Did many a Roman chief and Asian king
To doubtful conflict certain slaughter bring;
Look where the second Cæsar's trophies rose;
Now, like the hands that reared them, withering,
Imperial anarchs, doubling human woes,
God, was thy globe ordained for such to win and lose?

After passing Santa Maura we sailed down the channel between the Island of Ithaca on the east and Cephalonia on the west, affording us an excellent opportunity to view the rocky hills of both famous islands. Thus says Bowen: "Perhaps there is no spot in the world where the influence of classical associations is so lively or so pure as in the island of Ithaca. The little rock retired into obscurity immediately after the age of its great mythological warrior and of his poet, and so it has remained for nigh 3,000 years. Unlike many other places of ancient fame, it is indebted for no part of its interest to more recent distinctions or to the rival associations of modern history; so much as the name of Ithaca scarcely occurs in the page of any writer of historical ages, unless with reference to poetical celebrity. Indeed in A. D. 1504 it was nearly, if not quite, uninhabited, having been depopulated by the incursions of Corsairs, and during the fury of the wars waged between the Turks and the Christians, and record is still extant of privileges offered by the Venetian government to the settlers from the neighboring islands, and from the mainland of Greece, by whom it was re-peopled. Here, therefore, all our recollections are concentrated round the heroic age; every hill and rock, every fountain and olive grove, breathes Homer and the Odyssey; and we are transplanted by a sudden leap over a hundred generations to the most brilliant period of Greek chivalry and song."

Pope translates Homer thus:

"Horrid with cliffs, our meager land allows
Thin herbage for the mountain-goat to browse,
But neither mead nor plain supplies to feed
The sprightly courser or indulge his speed;
To sea-surrounded realms the gods assign
Small tract of fertile lawn, the least to mine."

Again:

"Low lies our isle, yet blessed with fruitful stores;
Strong are the sons, though rocky are her shores,
And none, ah, none so lovely to my sight,
Of all the lands that heaven o'erspreads with light."

The rocky appearance of the island bears out all that Homer said of its ruggedness, and the wonder is, judging by what could be seen from the steamer, how any people could ever be induced to live there. It is quite probable that in Homer's time there was more rain and dew in Greece and on the island of Ithaca than now, and that more vegetation made it green and pleasing. The island is seventeen miles in length, and not more than four in width at its widest place. There is said not to be one hundred feet of continuous level land on the entire island, though in the ravines where the streams empty into the sea there are fertile growths of the olive, the vine, and the beautiful arbutus.

It is said the whole population of the island does not exceed ten thousand, but they are extremely laborious, cultivating with patent industry the light and scanty soil of their island; and maintaining at the same time a considerable part of the coasting trade of Greece, as well as the general carrying commerce of the Mediterranean and the Euxine. It is stated that every family possessses a few roods of land of its own, as well as a share in one or more of the large and excellent ships which belong to their part and are continually built and fitted out there. If it be remembered that Ulysses, with the whole forces of the neigboring islands of Cephalonia and Zacynthus, only mustered twelve galleys as his contingent to the Trojan expedition, it can easily be realized that Ithaca has not deteriorated very greatly.

On the other hand, the island of Cephalonia has the appearance of being rather more inviting as a residence, there being partially level places where there is some soil and places large enough for villages. There are said to have been four cities of the island in ancient times, prominent among which was Samos, which Homer often mentioned in his song. It is nevertheless a rugged, rocky island, and not possessed of the soft beauty accorded to Corfu and Zante. The highest summit of the rocks is 4,500 feet in hight, and here are the ruins of a temple to Jupiter. The island is a little over thirty miles in length and of unequal width. Currants, grapes, and olive oil are about the only articles exported.

The city of Samos, as remarked, was often mentioned by Homer, and is said to still exhibit extensive and interesting ruins; and excavations in the neighborhood have produced various specimens of ancient ornaments, vases, fragments of statues, etc., as well as coins of a very ancient date. Livy also mentions it, and tells us it stood a four months' siege against the Romans, 189 B. C. It had fallen in ruins in Strabo's time, but from some vestiges of brick-work still extant it is thought that, like many other Greek cities, it was partially rebuilt during the prosperity and tranquility of the Augustan age.

On the shore of the bay below is a small modern village where a ferry-boat crosses the channel five miles in width to Ithaca. The broad but sheltered harbor of Samos, and its position on the strait which affords the most direct communication between the Adriatic and the Gulf of Corinth points it out as a far more eligible site for the capital of the island than that of the modern town of Argostoli.

On the shores of this island are said to occur phenomena which seem to reverse the order of nature. Streams of fresh water usually flow into sea; but here salt water flows from the sea into the island and settles into the cavernous vaults below. The descending streams and rivulets of the ocean brine flow with such rapidity that an enterprising Englishman many years ago erected a mill upon one of the principal of these reversed streams, and has since run it successfully. The flow is said to be constant unless the mouths or avenues by which the water enters become obstructed by collections of seaweed. It is said, moreover that this inflowing of the water of the ocean is not an unusual phenomenon in other parts of Greece. In the land-locked valleys and basins of its mountains lakes and rivers often find for themselves subterranean passages through the cavities of the rocks, and even pursue their unseen course a considerable distance before they again make their appearance in the upper world. Greece has every appearance of sometime, perhaps hundreds of thousands of years ago, having been thrown up by internal commotions of the earth into the present ranges of rocky mountains. The rocks are doubtless far more igneous than aqueous.

As a compensation, in the course of the ocean's water on the island of Cephalonia it is stated as a fact that a stream of fresh water from the island rises in the sea some half a mile from the shore, and with such force that when the sea is quiet and the water low this fresh current of water rises a foot or more above the surface of the ocean. This singular phenomenon probably accounts for the fact that no rivers or streams flow from the island into the sea. The two classes of phenomena, of water running from the sea into the island, and of fresh water being forced from the island into the sea, seem not a little paradoxical, but the best authority exists that both take place.

Another remarkable phenomenon on this island and not far from the landing in the harbor of Cephalonia, the facts concerning which I obtained from an intelligent gentleman who had information upon the subject, is worthy of notice. A flat stone, or one with a flat surface, about twenty feet square, or rather two stones, coming together, edge to edge, seem to be moved by a pulsation of the earth, and open and shut eight or ten times per minute, the opening being to the extent of half an inch or more. This opening and shutting is said to be kept up without interruption, day after day, month after month, and year after year, and for how long I am unable to say. The statement borders upon the incredible, but from the confidence I have in the gentleman who imparted the information to me, I am induced to give it to you just as it was given to me.

While passing this locality a fellow-passenger pointed out to the eastward the mountains of Thessaly on the mainland; whether we really saw Thessaly I am unable to say, but am pretty sure we failed to obtain a good view of Mount Olympus, where Jupiter and all the gods resided and held carnival some three thousand years ago. I will not likely obtain a view of Mount Olympus, and will be compelled to take the Grecian heaven as a matter of faith in a manner similar to that in which I am required to accept the belief of the Christian heaven. Both are so intangible and uncertain that we are obliged to accept the statements of those who know no more about them than we do.

Some ten miles below the Island of Cephalonia is the island of Zante, the Zacynthus of Homer, and from whose principal town, Zante, come the larger share of Zante currants, so well known all over the world. It has a checkered political history, like all the neighboring islands, which I will not attempt to trace. The antiquities of the former ages are said to be obliterated by modern improvements of an inferior character. A natural phenomenon on this island, however, is worthy of note, and that is the pitch wells which were so well known to the ancients. During the constant changes of men and states, eternal nature invariably asserts her supremacy. Twenty-three hundred years ago Herodotus wrote as follows: "In Zacynthus I myself have seen pitch springing up continually out of a pool of water. Now, there are several pools in this place; the layers being seventy feet in circumference and two fathoms in depth. Into this the people let down a pole with a branch of myrtle fastened at its end; and so they bring up the pitch. It has a bituminous smell, but in all other respects is better than the pitch of Pieria. They pour it in a trench dug near the pool, and when they have collected a considerable quantity they remove it from the trench into jars. Whatever falls into the pool passes underground and is again seen in the sea, which is a distance of four furlongs." This pitch is undoubtedly a grade of petroleum, and its existence here affords an additional proof that this region is either of a volcanic character, or that it was at one period of the earth's history subject to great internal commotions and upheavals.

It is also said that on another part of the island there is a smaller cave on the seashore, from the sides of which drips an unctuous oily matter, running into the water, giving it the name of Tallow Well, or Grease Spring. Zante has been subject to severe earthquakes, and their recurrence comes about once in every twenty years. On Dec. 29, 1820, a very severe shock took place, shattering the walls of the most prominent building, thowing down nearly a hundred houses, badly damaging a thousand others and killing forty people. Twenty years later another shock took place by which eight persons lost their lives.

A few words about the currant crop of this island may not be out of place. The current bush or vine requires careful pruning and dressing during the winter and spring. The vintage is a very interesting and important period to the inhabitants; and the rich proprietors then take up their abode in their country villas to superintend the cultivation of the crop upon which they principally depend. Every vineyard is carefully protected by an armed watchman, for whom a guard-house is constructed of interlaced branches of trees, covered with leaves or thatch, and sometimes elevated on poles. When the crop has matured, it is gathered and spread out for some twenty days to dry on level places prepared for the purpose. A great deal depends upon careful drying. A shower of rain will diminish by one-half the value of the crop, and a second wetting ruins it altogether. Dried by the sun and air the fruit is transported to the city and stored in safe places called seraglie, whence it is shipped for exportation, largely to England. The exports of currants of the Grecian Isles, important among which is Zante, is said to amount to $12,000,000 per annum. By this it can be seen that the currant business is a very important one, as the export duty is one of the principal revenues of the Greek nation.

Cytheria, the last of the Ionian Isles, was often mentioned by Homer. It was here that Venus halted when she rose from the sea. It was to this loving goddess what Delos was to Latona, and was believed to be her favorite abode. She had a temple here, of which some ruins are said still to remain, as well as other antiquities.

The length of the island is twenty miles, and the greatest width something more than half that distance. In historical times it was generally a dependency of Sparta, and its inhabitants were classed with the Pariœci, and to them was yearly sent a magistrate to preside over their courts of justice. The possession of the island was held to be of the first importance in the days of timid navigation, and would be still had it good harbors to afford security to sea-worn vessels. In the middle ages it was called "The Lantern of the Archipelago." Herodotus wrote that Demaratus advised Xerxes to occupy it with a fleet during the Persian war, quoting the opinion of the Lacedonian sage, Chilon, who had declared it would be of great benefit to Sparta if this island were sunk in the sea. These apprehensions were realized during the Peloponesian war, when Cytheria was conquered by the Athenians under Nicias; and the Spartans were greatly annoyed by the hostile garrison so near their coast. The island was surrendered to its former owners at the peace of 421 B. C. Since that time its fortunes have been as varied as those of the other Ionian isles.

It was in the night when we passed the shores of Arcadia, and later when we rounded the southern peninsula of Sparta, so famous in the ancient wars of Greece, the home of Lycurgus, Solon, and other sages and law-makers, and which for a long time was the antagonist or competitor of Athens. When daylight appeared the steamer had turned her prow toward the north and we were making our way toward the proudest city of ancient Greece. Before 10 o'clock we had cast anchor in the harbor of Piræus, the port of Athens, and has been since Themistocles administered the affairs of Athens, and who fortified the town and projected a wall to also reach to Athens. Piræus contains 30,000 inhabitants, and is said to be increasing in manufatures and business. The only railroad in Greece is five miles long, running from Piræus to Athens. We, however, did not patronize the railroad, but Mr. Clark provided carriages in which we rode to the capital of Greece, over a level plain. A part of the way looks barren, and a part is prolific with grape-vines, olive-trees, and occasional fig-trees. The country is extremely dry, a shower this week being the first for six months or more. The soil being a heavy clay of lime soil it grinds into dust and gives a limy appearance to every thing. The hills all around are naked rocks; the valleys are dried up so that scarcely anything remains alive; the only green things to be seen are the olive-trees, fig-trees, accacia, and pepper-trees, with grape-vines, century-plants, cactuses, etc. A ride of less than an hour brought us to the famous town of Athens, once the mistress of the world. Our entry into the town was not of the happiest description. The miserable pair of horses hauling the carriage in which I rode, when arriving at the street which leads to their stable, seems determined to turn in there, regardless of our wishes to reach the Grand Hotel D'Angleterre with as little delay as possible. The driver remonstrated with his rebellious team in the most vigorous manner, first by applying the lash, and that failing, jumped down and applied the butt of his whip over the heads, ears, ribs, etc., of his poor team, as though he had not much mercy for them. This was a novelty at first, and we rather enjoyed it, but it took but a short time to become monotonous and uninteresting, and but a short time more for the feeling to change to disgust. To such a pitch did this feeling soon arise that we alighted from the carriage and seated ourselves in another, which I am pleased to announce soon landed us at our hotel. I think, however, that the angry driver succeeded in his persuasive manner in convincing his hungry steeds that they had better defer their visit to the stable till a more favorable opportunity, for he was soon around at the hotel claiming his fee for bringing us from Piræus; but, if I am correctly informed, he did not succeed in collecting it. I feel morally certain that old Jupiter himself would not wish to ride after such a team, much less a party of distinguished Americans, one of whom has his expenses paid around the world, and who expects his horses to go when they are told to, and not to act in that disreputable manner.

Yes, here we are on classic ground at last; the land of Homer, Hesiod, Thales, Pythagoras, Lycurgus, Solon, Bias, Xenophanes, Aristides, Antisthenes, Socrates, Plato, Democritus, Protagorus, Diogenes, Pericles, Demosthenes, Sophocles, Thucydides, Praxiteles, Phidias, Zeno, Epicurus, Aristotle, Herodotus, Xenophon, Æschylus, and lots of those worthy old philosophers, sages, teachers, poets, historians, and statesmen. Here is the ground where old Jove used to reign, in more than regal splendor, where he used to indulge in those naughty capers of his in getting children on the sly outside of the family and thereby setting a bad example to the one-horse Jewish deity who attempted to run a little worthless seven-by-nine country at the eastern end of the Mediterranean sea, but made a total failure of it, and who perhaps would never have thought of taking a pretty young damsel to his bosom if amorous Jove and a few other sly and roguish gods had not set him the naughty example.

But this letter is long enough. I will make it my business in my next to give you some further account of this city and this country, and possibly confide to you a few of my impressions touching the same.

I am getting a good long distance from you—about five thousand miles—and wonder if you think of me as often as I do of you. Hoping that you do, I will say good-bye for a few days. D. M. B.

A Few Days in Athens.

ATHENS, GREECE, Oct. 23, 1881.

DEARLY BELOVED: I have seen Greece; I have stood on the Acropolis; I have seen the Parthenon; I have stood in the temple of Jupiter Olympus; I have visited the Amphitheater of Bacchus; I have sat in the front seats reserved for the priests of the various gods; I have seen the temple of Minerva; I have visited the tower erected to the gods of the winds; I have entered the temple of Theseus; I have stood in the prison where Socrates drank his dose of hemlock and lay down and died like a hero; I have visited the place where Plato had his academy and taught his pupils; I have seen where Epicurus had his garden and taught the grandest philosophy the world has heard; I have looked over the place where Zeno instructed the Stoics; I have visited the very spot from whence Edipus was taken by the clouds up into heaven after he had killed his daddy; I have stood on the bema where Demosthenes poured fourth his eloquence to his fellow-citizens and roused them to deeds of valor; I have climbed upon Mars Hill and stood in the identical spot where Paul stood when he addressed the men of Athens and told them they were too superstitious; I have visited the palace of King George, and now I don't know but I ought to die and go over to the majority. I wish, however, before I die to see Constantinople, Palestine, Jerusalem, and the pyramids of Egypt. I have also jotted down upon my programme several other things and places beyond the Nile, so I will try to live just as long as I can, and in the mean time tell you something about Athens and Greece.

I am quite sure, you all understand that Greece was settled a good many years ago, and that it is a matter of some dispute who the first settlers were; some insisting that they were the wild Pelasgians, some a people called Hellenes, others that they were men from Egypt, while others again insist that they were Phœnicians. I am of the opinion that they are all partly right, and that all the peoples named helped to settle Greece and brought with them what they knew of art and civilization, their notions of gods and religion, and that they were all branches of the great Aryan family which emigrated from Central Asia thousands of years ago.

The oldest settlements in Greece were made in Sicyon more than two thousand years before the Christian era, even before Abraham is supposed to have lived. The first king was called Ægialeus, and twenty-five others are said to have succeeded him, who spent a considerable share of their time in fighting their neighbors, for they had neighbors at that early day. After the last of these kings had passed off the stage the state passed into the hands of the priests of Apollo, for the Egyptians who came here brought their gods with them and enthroned them in this rocky country, and Apollo was one of them, though his name was changed from Ra and Helios, which were his cognomens in the land of the Nile.

Greece is but a small country, containing with all its rocks less than twenty thousand square miles, or about one-third the area of the state of New York; but, small as it was, it constituted several kingdoms which warred upon each other with protracted virulence and deadly hate. That was an age when war was the fashion, and it was followed as closely as fashions are followed now. The kingdom of Argos was founded 1856 B. C., its first king being Inachus the son of Oceanus and Zethys. Like most of the history of that age of the world the story of Greece is so blended with fable and mythology that it is difficult to tell just how much should be believed. A list of nineteen kings is said to have succeeded this first king of Argos, the third of whose name was Apis, supposed to have some connection with Apis the bull, which for centuries was worshiped as a god in Egypt. The tenth king, Danaus, was said to be a usurper who fled from Egypt after having vainly conspired there against his brother Sesostris, and landed in Greece in 1474 B. C. From him, it is claimed, descended by the mother's side Perseus, the son of Jupiter and Danæ, who, having accidentally killed his grandfather Acrisius, withdrew from Argos and founded the kingdom of Mycenæ, where Eurystheus, Atreus, Agamemnon, Oreates, and Tisamenus, or Penthilus. The history of the first and of the twelve labors of Hercules will be remembered by many. It is hardly to be doubted that Hercules was a borrowed deity, as such a god was earlier believed in in Asia as well as in Egypt. The Jewish Samson was only a crude copy of him. Grecian legends have it that Hercules never came to the throne, but that his descendants recovered it about 1140 B. C. The last king, Diomedes, distinguished himself at the siege of Troy.

This district of Athens was originally called Attica, and is supposed to have been founded by Cecraps, an Egyptian, about 1556, though the legend runs that he married the daughter of Actæus, who was the king of the country before him, and succeeded to the throne by right of his wife. It is related that he brought with him from Egypt a large colony of Saits, a people who lived near one of the mouths of the Nile, who probably helped him to conquer the country. He seems to have been an organizer, for he divided the country into districts with a chief town in each, and established laws and rules for the government of the people. One of the commendable institutions which he introduced was marriage, which previous to that time had been unknown to the people, who had hitherto used the women in common. He is also said to have inaugurated the worship of Jupiter, he also being an importation from Egypt. He taught the art of navigation and founded the court of Arcopagus, which Solon afterward improved. A line of sixteen successors followed this good king, one of whom was Theseus, the son of Ægeus, famous for his many heroic achievements, and for uniting the provincial towns into a more compact confederacy, practically introducing a democratic form of government. But notwithstanding this the people were ungrateful, and were more favorable to Menestheus, who drove Theseus from the throne to retire to Sycros, where he was killed by stratagem. Menestheus reigned till the siege of Troy, when he was slain. The last king of Attica was Codrus, and he voluntarily sacrificed himself in 1068 B. C. to rescue his country from the inroads of the Dorians, and with him the royal title was extinguished.

After the kings come the archons, or chief magistrates, of whom thirteen were hereditary and for life, and taken from the family of Codrus. This innovation did not arise so much from a dislike to royalty as from a respect to the last monarch, who sacrificed his life for the good of his country. The government of the archons for life continued till 752 B. C., when the office was made decenial, and under this change seven successive archons held office, reaching down to 682. After this their authority was further reduced to the term of one year, and was divided among nine persons at a time, one of whom was chosen as chief. When Draco was selected as chief archon he established a code of laws so severe that they could not be practical and operative; and the state of anarchy which supervened was removed by the wise councils of Solon, one of the seven wise men of Greece, who was chosen chief archon, and from his wise measures the Romans are said to have subsequently copied largely.

Bœtia, afterward called Thebes, was founded in 1455 B. C. by Cadmus, who brought the alphabet from Phœnicia, and he did much toward building up the literature of his adopted country. He also introduced navigation and trade, and taught the use of brass. He had several successors, the last of whom was Xanthus, who died in 1126 B. C. The state then became a commonwealth. The Bœtians had bitter wars with the Thracians, by whom they were expelled from the country to take refuge in Thessaly at Arne.

Arcadia is said to have received its name from Arcas, one of the numerous sons of Jupiter, his mother being Calista. The Arcadians had legends which told of a succession of twenty-five kings, of whom the eleventh, Agapenor, was at the siege of Troy. Among the last three kings were Aristocrates I. and II., who were stoned to death by their subjects, the first for ravishing a virgin in the temple of Diana, the second for ingloriously betraying his allies, the Messenians. The regal dynasty closed in 668 B. C.

It is supposed that the state of Thessaly received its name from Thessalus, the father of Græcus, after whom all Greece was named. The country was first divided into four districts, and afterward into ten Deucalion was king for a time, and during his reign it is said a flood occurred, which has been called the deluge of Deucalion. Many have supposed it must have been identical with that said to have occurred in Noah's time, but as that is unquestionably fabulous, the deluge of Deucalion is supposed to have been a irruption of the Euxine Sea, perhaps caused by some subterranean commotion, which caused the Euxine, for the first time, to run down into the Mediterranean. Æson was king in 1280 B. C., his brother Pelias, who succeeded him, being the one who sent the rightful heir, Jason, to Colchis in search of the Golden Fleece, which was probably done to open with that country a trade in flax, its staple production. This is the story of the Argonautic expedition, in which the flower of all Greece was engaged. The next ruler of Thessaly was Achilles, who took the most prominent part in the Trojan war; which, however, was brought to a successful termination by the sagacity and wisdom of a greater general, Ulysses, a king of a petty island in the Ionian Sea. The most noted war of Thessaly was with Phocis, and it was pursued on each side with bloody and persistent hatred. The war arose from the Phocions having plowed certain lands consecrated to the Delphic god, for which a fine was imposed upon them by the court of the Amphictyons, but the payment was refused, and a long, bloody war was the result, which was not terminated till the time of Philip of Macedon, who finally defeated the Phocions and ended the prolonged conflict.

The small state of Corinth is claimed to have been founded by Sisyphus, the son of Æolus, in 1514 B.C., a line of eight kings succeeding, when the Dorians drove them out, and Aletes became king in 1089 B.C. He was succeeded by eleven princes, after which a magistrate called Prytane was elected. In 657 B.C. Cypeselus wrested the sovereign power from the ruling magistrate. His son Periander succeeded, and his nephew Psammetichus after, who reigned till 584 B.C., when the Corinthians threw off the royal yoke and established a republic.

Sparta was originally called Lacona, and was founded by Lelex in 1516 B.C. Myles, the third king, changed the name to Sparta, after his daughter Sparte, and Lacedæmon, after Sparte's husband, who was the last who succeeded Myles. The seventh successor to Lacedæmon was Hippocoon, who, with his ten sons, were killed by the athlete Hercules, upon which Zyndarus, his brother, was raised to the throne, and his daughter Helen it was who gave rise to the Trojan war. After several succeeding kings, Aristodemus, was succeeded by his twin sons, Eurystheus and Proclos, and from their time the government took a permanent form— a bipartite succession, which continued for several generations. The history of Sparta for several centuries is continuous with war and bloodshed. The Spartans were truly a belligerent people, and had a great many conflicts with their neighbors, particularly the Aryans and the Athenians. Domestic discords also weakened them not a little, and these were caused most frequently by the quarrels between the two ruling kings. This state of things continued till the time of Lycurgus, when the government was remodeled. This wise lawgiver introduced a senate with thirty members endowed with supreme power in all civil matters, and all that was left to the kings was the title and honors, with the management of religious and military affairs. He divided the lands equally among the people, and wrested from them so far as possible everything that tended to luxury. His object was to make the people good citizens in peace and brave and hardy soldiers in war. He prohibited the circulation of all money save that of iron, and no trade was allowed. The mechanical arts were exercised only by slaves. The country was thus converted into a military commonwealth, the result of which was after this the Spartans became brave and unconquerable in excess of any country of its size and population.

Macedon was founded at a later date than other portions of Greece, and, as claimed by Caranus, an Argive, a descendant of Hercules, in 813 B.C. It is in the northern portion of Greece, and possibly from this fact made slower progress in civilization than the other states. It remained almost unnoticed for five hundred years till the time of Philip and his son Alexander, who became the master of the world, and with whose career you are doubtless familiar.

Of the petty states of Elis, Ætolia, Locris, Doris, and Archis little need be said. One of the kings of Elis was Augeus, the owner of the Augean stables, so thoroughly cleaned by that wonderful stable-cleaner, Hercules. Another was Epesus, who was present at the siege of Troy and the construction of the famous wooden horse which contained the soldiers who caused the overthrow of the city. A third was Iphetus, the restorer of the Olympic games. Of Ætolia one of the kings was Œneus, whose daughter, Dejanira, was married to Hercules. Tydeus, a son of Œneus, was a great hero, and his son, Diomedes, distinguished himself in the Trojan war. The little state of Locris also sent a hero to the same war; his name was Ajax. But the state derives quite as great honor from Amphictyon, one of its braves, who, at Thermopylæ, established the well-known Amphictyonic Council—a confederacy between twelve nations to assemble once in six months to consult upon each other's affairs and settle all disputes pertaining to Greece at large. The Dorians were distinguished for their migratory disposition and their conquests, by which they created almost a revolution of races. Achia was divided into twelve small republics, with democratic constitutions, and the twelve divisions mutually united by a league based upon perfect equality and mutual benefit.

The formation and development of Greece as a nation took place in what are called the Heroic Ages. The principal events in those ages are as follows: 1. The expedition of the Argonauts to Colchis about the year 1215 B.C; 2. The war of the Confederate princes against Thebes in 1225 B.C.; 3. The capture of Thebes by the Epigoni in 1215 B.C.; 4. The Trojan war in 1194 B.C. This last great event was followed by a stormy period, the result of the many disorders and differences existing in the ruling families of the country, particularly the Pelops. Still more violent commotions arose, induced by the rude tribes of the north, especially the Dorians and Ætolians, who, led by the descendants of Hercules, strove for the possession of the Poloponesus. The whole of Greece was convulsed by these disturbances, and the result was that Argos, Sparta, Messenes, and Corinth were occupied by the Dorians, while Elis went into the possession of the Ætolians. The Dorians also forced several of the Greek tribes to emigrate and take forcible possession of various points on the coast of Asia Minor, where they established successful colonies. They went out as soldiers, sword in hand, conquering new homes for themselves, often taking wives by force from those they conquered, and at other times securing them by friendly negotiation. The islands of the Ægean and the Mediterranean seas were also seized upon, and the whole face of Greece virtually changed. The system of government was equally modified. From the system of hereditary clanship different forms of republicanism came into existence, each state or locality holding the form preferred by itself, but uniting into one body or force for purposes of aggression and common defense. Athens and Sparta aspired to superior positions in the confederacy, and between them a long series of contentions took place and continued until they were held in abeyance by the Persian war. The causes which produced that war may be briefly stated: the vanity of the queens of Persia, who wished the ministration of Grecian women as slaves; the revolt of the Asiatic Greeks against the Persian power, the same aided and abetted by the Athenians, who also took part in setting fire to Sardes, together with the intrigues of the Athenian refugees, particularly of Hippias in the Persian court. Darius Hystaspes, the Persian monarch, sent around to all the Grecian states a requisition to acknowledge the authority of Persia. This was complied with, except on the part of Athens and Sparta, which disdained to yield obedience to the imperious demand. What followed is well known. An army of one hundred thousand, —or, as some authorities insist, three hundred thousand—was sent from Persia to invade Greece and teach its people submission. This proud army was met at Marathon by an Athenian army of ten thousand, and the Persian army was defeated. Darius raved with fury, and vowed vengeance upon the Greeks. Death, however, prevented his carrying out his threats; but his son Xerxes inherited alike the crown and hatred of his father, and he personally headed a still mightier army for the invasion of Greece. The opposition he met with at Thermopylæ from a meager band of three hundred Spartans gave him a pretty clear comprehension of what stuff the Grecian army was composed of. Next followed the glorious naval victory gained by the Athenians in the Bay of Salomis, which utterly destroyed the Persian fleet, while all that the Persians were able to accomplish in return was the burning of Athens, which the inhabitants had abandoned. After this the Persian was only too glad to decamp. The subsequent simultaneous battle at Platæa, and the naval engagement at Mycale, were quite sufficient to satisfy the Persians and to induce them to leave for their own homes.

The Greeks were of course exultant, and at once conceived the idea of following up their victories by carrying the war into Asia. Their pretext was to free their brothers in Asia from the Persian power. A long contest ensued, which lasted for thirty years, at which time, after the complete defeat of the Persians in a naval engagement near Cyprus, conducted by Cimon on the part of the Greeks, Artaxerxes I. of the Persians was forced to sign a treaty acknowledging the independence of the Asiatic Greeks. This has been justly declared the proudest period of Athenian power and glory. Herodotus wrote in these words: "I will say that liberty proceeded from Athens. Many will murmur, but I will say it, for it is true."

But no sooner was peace made with the foreign foe than contention again broke out at home. The spirit of rivalry which for centuries had existed between Athens and Sparta broke out anew. Athens by her superior naval strength was enabled to hold in a sort of subjugation the islands and maritime portions of Greece, which, however, yielded but a forced obedience, and this state of things enabled Sparta to assume the role of general defender of Grecian liberties against Athenian aggression and tyranny. A war of twenty-seven years followed, which was called the Poloponesian war. It ended with the capture and humiliation of Athens in 403 B.C., after which the people of Greece found their new masters more exacting than the old ones, and new burthens were laid upon them. The political humiliation to Athens, of course, was galling, but her loss was absolutely a gain to her, for instead of pursuing wars of conquest and subjugation she applied herself to the study of literature and philosphy, and in this direction her distinguished sons excelled all the other nations that have existed in the world. Setting aside all the great victories won by Greece in the centuries of her military glory, to now take a glance at the small territory comprising the country one is overwhelmed with wonder how a country of such limited dimensions could have produced such a great number of extraordinary and talented philosophers and sages, whose thought and conclusions have influenced the world to an astonishing degree and must continue to influence it for centuries to come.

The career of Philip of Macedon has been alluded to. His first great effort was to obtain the acknowledgment of his state from the Hellenic League. He next became the deliverer of Thessaly and made it a province of his own kingdom. He next took advantage of the war waged against the Phocions to enter Greece, reduce the Phocions, defeat the Athenians and Thebeans, which in the face of his aggressions had united to oppose him. By this result the independence of Greece was ended. The Spartans, very unusual for them, kept aloof at the very time when the best interests of Greece required their aid. Philip well understood the advantage to be gained by their indifference. After the battle of Chæronæ he was selected as general of the Greeks by the Amphictyonic Council to wage the war with Persia, and in this he was only too well pleased. While he was preparing for this campaign, however, his life was cut short by the hand of an assassin—an officer of his own guards—who stabbed him to death in the midst of the festivities in celebration of the nuptials of his daughter.

The entire efforts of his son and successor, Alexander the Great, were directed to obtaining victories over the Persians. How he won the battles of Granicus and Issus, in Asia Minor; how he entered Syria and Palestine; how he diverged into Egypt and conquered it; how he returned into Asia, passed the Euphrates and Tigris, and defeated the Persians at Arbela; how he went to Hycrania and the Caspian Sea; thence to Parthia, Bactria, and Sogdiana, and defeated the Scythians; how he crossed the Indus into India and gained a victory over Porus, the king of the country; how he started on his return to Greece, after sighing for more worlds to conquer; and how he drank himself to death at Babylon, or was poisoned, as the case may be—are all too well known to need repetition here.

The generals of Alexander assumed command after his death, but they soon became involved in quarrels which allowed Greece to resume her independence; but Rome had then become a rising power, and about 147 B.C., at the time of the downfall of Carthage, Macedon and Greece were subdued by the Romans.

The Tomb of Fanaticism.

AN EXTENSIV EXAMINATION OF LORD BOLINGBROKE'S DOCTRINS.

WRITTEN BY VOLTAIRE IN 1767.

[Translated from the French by Avery Meriwether.]

CHAPTER XIV.

HOW THE FIRST CHRISTIANS CONDUCTED THEMSELVS UNDER THE ROMANS, AND HOW THEY FORGED THE VERSES ATTRIBUTED TO THE SIBYLS.

People of good sense ask how that tissue of fables which so plainly outrages common sense, and the blasphemous tales which impute so much that is horrible to God, could find any credit. They would indeed hav cause for astonishment if the first Christian believers had persuaded the court of the emperor and the Roman Senate to believe them instead of a coarse populace no less contemptible than themselvs. This is true, as the Emperor Julien said, in his discourse to the followers of Christ:

"It was sufficient at first for the Christians to convert a few servants and a few beggars, as Corneillus and Sergius. They may regard me as the most unprincipled impostor if they can find among those who embraced the Christian religion under Tiberius and Claudius a single man of good birth or merit."*

The first Christian reasoners preached on the corners and in the towns to the pagans, who excelled them in debate. They said: Be not frightened at our mysteries. You can hav recourse to penitence in order to purge yourselvs of crime. We hav a form of repentance that is very wholesome indeed. Your oracles are not as effectiv as ours, and in order to convince you that our sect is the only good one, we will show you that your own prophets hav taught you all that we are teaching and all that our master Jesus Christ has done. Hav you not heard of the sibyls? "Yes," answered the pagan disputants; "all the sibyls were inspired by Jupiter himself; their predictions are true."

"Very well," reply the Galileans, "we can show you the sibyline verses which clearly announce that Jesus Christ will come and render good unto ye men."

At the same time they undertook to forge Greek verses worse than any which hav yet been composed —verses similar to those of Grub street, manufactured by Blackmore and Gibson. They attribute these to the sibyls, and for four hundred years they did not cease trying to establish Christianity upon that proof, which was of equal importance to the deceivers and the deceived. The first step being made, we find those pueril lies accepted upon the testimony of sibyls. Even the acrostic verses which make up the name of Jesus Christ are religiously believed to be divine.

Lactantius has preserved for us a number of these rhapsodies, and calls them authentic. To these fables, the sibyls added miracles, which they performed publicly. It is true that they never resuscitated the dead, as Elijah. They never made the sun stand still, as Joshua. They never crossed the Red Sea with dry feet, as Moses. They never caused themselvs to be transported, as Jesus did, to the top of a little mountain in Galilee, where one could overlook the whole earth. But they cured fever when it was on the decline, and the itch when the patient had been bathed, bled, purged, and rubbed. They exorcised demons, for that was the main object of the apostles. It is said in more than one book of the gospels that Jesus came upon earth expressly to chase away devils.

That was an old prerogativ of the people of God. There were exorcisers in Jerusalem who cured those possessed by the devil by placing under their noses a little of the plant called Barath and murmuring a few words from the Canticles of Solomon. Jesus himself avowed that the Jews had that power. Nothing was easier for them than to make a shilling or two by expelling the devil from the body of some rascal. A Jew or Galilean, after a little while, found it easy enough to chase ten devils by the day, for a guinea. The devils did not dare to take possession of the governor of a province, or a senator, or even a centurion; only those who were needy and had no power were ever possessed by devils.*

If the devil should hav seized any one, Pilate was the man, but he dared not touch him. For a long time the priests were compelled to exorcise the common people in England. But as soon as the Christian sect was established by long custom, such stuff as exorcising, etc., ceased to be necessary except in the countries which were ruled by the pope, and in those which were unfortunately under the control of bishops and monks.

The effect of this has been to destroy the primitiv simplicity and customs of the Christians, instead of making governments better, as has been thought. The baptizing of nude women by men; the dreadful baptism of the dead, exorcisings, inspirations, and diabolism, debauching suppers—all these are obsolete and only the sect remains.

The Christians gained the reputation of being a petty sect during the whole of the first century. They were let alone, being regarded as a sect of Jews, who were tolerated. The Pharisees, Sadducees, Therapeuts, and Essenians were not persecuted, so then it is all the more reasonable to say that the Christians were not disturbed in their obscurity. They were so insignificant that neither Flavius Josephus, Philo, nor Plutarch deigned to speak of them, and if Tacitus mentioned them it was to confound them with the Jews and to remark upon their contemptible condition. They had, then, a great opportunity for extending their sect. We hear of them a little under Domitian. A few were punished under Trajan. After this they mingle and mix in an undistinguishable mass the few truths about their martyrs with a thousand falsehoods.

* It is strange that the Emperor Julien called Sergius a good-for-nothing beggar. It must be because he had read the gospels with little attention, or because it had escaped his memory that moment, as is usual with those who charge their minds with weighty affairs, and yet wish to take up the burden of a controversy. He deceived himself, and the Acts of the apostles, which he refuted, also evidently deceived him. Sergius was neither a beggar, as Julian says, nor proconsul, nor governor of Cyprus, as the Acts say.

There was only one proconsul in Syria, upon whom the island of Cyprus depended, and he was the praetor of Cyprus. But the praetor was always a man of considerable importance.

Perhaps the Emperor Julien spoke of another Sergius whom the Acts of the Apostles had so unnecessarily supposed to be a proconsul or praetor. The Acts are mere rhapsodies full of contradictions, as all that which the Jews and Galileans hav written.

They say that Paul and Barnabas found at Paphos a Jewish magician named Bar-Jesus who wished to hinder Sergius the praetor from making himself a Christian; this is in chapter xiii. Afterwards they say that Bar-Jesus called himself Elymas, and that Paul and Barnabas rendered him blind for several days, and that miracle caused the praetor to become a Christian. They know well enough the value of such a tale. We hav only to read the discourse held between Paul and Sergius to see that Sergius was unable to comprehend anything.

The chapter ends by saying that Paul and Barnabas were chased from the island of Cyprus. Why did Sergius, who was master, allow him to be chased from the island, since he had embraced the Christian religion? Why did Sergius, who was the principal dignitary in the island, permit Christianity to suffer such a blow? Sergius was no fool. Why did he let his fellow-religionists suffer?

Are not all such "tales of the tub" palpable absurdities?

Observe, above all, that Jesus, in the Acts and in all the discourses of Baul, is never regarded otherwise than as a man, and that there is not a single authentic text where there is a question of his pretended divinity. [1771.]

* The same spirit was shown in later ages when old and unprotected women were accused of witchcraft by younger people in order to hav them put out of their way. No man of power, no woman who was young and pretty, and was desired as a wife or servant, was ever accused of witchcraft, only the old useless and helpless women. [Note by translator.]

What I Don't Believe.

PART II.—NO. 61.

704. The gospel of Matthew was hardly written by one person; its abruptness of transitions, the fragmentary style of its narrative, frequent double narratives of the same event, as the miraculous feeding of the five thousand, the entire absence of details as to the mode and object of the frequent journeys indicated, all point to the only reasonable conclusion that the story is a compilation, and not a connected narrative written by a single person. I do not believe that Matthew wrote it, or that it was originally written by any one person.

705. It has been conjectured by some persons that the writers of the gospels of Mark and Luke had, when they wrote, the gospel of Matthew before them. If this was so they certainly could not have regarded him as an eye-witness or very accurate authority, as they hesitate not to abbreviate, retrench, and change his statements, omitting some incidents altogether. Besides this the introduction to Luke's gospel must be regarded as fatal to the hypothesis of the authors of any of the gospels then in existence having been either disciples or eye-witnesses. It must be clear from what Luke said at the outset that although many stories or gospels had been previously written, none of them had any apparent or recognized authority. Besides this, the writer of the first gospel seems not to have been acquainted with any portion of Christ's ministry except that portion of it which transpired in Galilee. It cannot be safe to attach much importance to it.

706. The second gospel, like the first, bears no author's name, nor does it lay the slightest claim to inspiration. Some of the early Fathers, as Irenæus and Papias, without any knowledge upon the subject, assigned it to Mark, and ever since the church has followed their lead and continued to call it Mark's gospel. There is undoubtedly insufficient authority for this; but even if it was not so it matters little, for Papias expressly says that Mark was neither a hearer nor follower, but claims that he compiled his gospel from information received from Peter, whose companion and interpreter he was. This is sufficient to convince any one that Mark was not an eye-witness, even if he wrote the sixteen chapters bearing his name, and consequently have little value; but when it proved that even those sixteen chapters were not known to have an existence till a hundred years after Mark was placed in his grave, the value and authenticity of those chapters lessen very greatly —they possess no value at all. It must be remembered that there is not the slightest certainty that the Mark to whom this short gospel is attributed is the same Mark mentioned in Acts as the companion of Paul and Barnabas (not of Peter, as it appears), nor the same as mentioned by Peter (1 Peter xiii) as his son. Mark was one of the commonest Roman names; and it is believed that the idea of the identity of the three Marks was a fancy of Papias only. Mark it, there is very little value or reliability to be attached to the gospel of Mark.

707. Luke makes no pretense of being an eye-witness of what he wrote. In his preface he simply claims to set forth that which he had heard from other sources. How much weight such evidence would have in a court of justice the reader can decide for himself. What Luke tells us he admits to be mere rumor, and can have little value, even if he wrote it; but when it is borne in mind that no one knew that the narrative existed till near the close of the second century, its value still lessens immeasurably—it becomes worth nothing at all. Irenæus is the first one to mention the third gospel and to claim that it was written by Luke. He happens to be very poor authority and unworthy of credence. Luke, like Matthew and Mark, will have to be set aside.

708. There is scarcely the slightest grounds for believing that the fourth gospel was written by the apostle John, and of this close Bible critics and scholars are becoming more and more convinced. One of the strong proofs argued to support the theory that John did not write that gospel is that, according to three previous gospel writers, several important incidents occurred of which John is claimed to be an eye-witness, which he does not mention nor allude to; among them may be named the transfiguration, the raising of Jarius's daughter, the agony in Gethsemane, etc. Now as the fourth gospel makes mention of many things of less consequence than the foregoing —things, too, of which John was not an eye-witness, it is only fair to conclude that had he been present when the above events took place he surely would have given his testimony in reference to them; but he is silent as to things he is said to have seen, and relates with particularity the things he did not see, we must conclude that John did not write the fourth gospel, or, if he did, that he is a very unreliable witness. And as observed with regard to the three gospels, where it is found that the fourth gospel had no existence till the year 180 or thereabouts, we not only are forced to the conclusion that John did not write it, but that the claim he did is only a falsehood; that it is unknown who did write it, and, like its predecessors, is unworthy of credence and cannot stand as the authoritative inspired word of God. Much more could be said of the very marked differences between the fourth gospel and the other three, but probably what has been said is sufficient to convince the candid reader that if the three first gospels are true and reliable the fourth must be untrue and unreliable. They could not have all been inspired from the same source.

709. I cannot think that Matthew was truthful when in twelve instances he attempted to claim that ancient prophecies referred to Jesus as the Messiah who was to come. The connection between what are called the prophecies and what are called the fulfillments bear insufficient relation to each other to admit of one being a prediction of the other. The first about a virgin conceiving and bringing forth a son, as given in Isaiah vii, 14–16, certainly had no reference to Jesus or anybody of his time. The language was not a prophecy at all, and referred only to affairs then existing between King Ahaz and his people. The matter of the virgin and child (the word "virgin" there means a young woman) was a sign given Ahaz for his sole benefit, and had no reference to affairs that should take place eleven hundred years later. The solution of the language called a prophecy is found in the language recorded a little later on: "I took unto me faithful witnesses to record Uriah, the priest, and Zechariah, the son of Jebrechia. And I went in unto the prophetess, and she conceived and bare a son." This makes the matter of a virgin conceiving quite plain, and that the words referred to what took place between the prophet and the prophetess, and not what was to occur seven hundred years afterward between Jehovah and a young Jewish maiden. The following, still further on, only confirms it: "Behold, I and the children whom the Lord hath given me are for signs and for wonders in Israel." When Isaiah said expressly to the king, "Before the child shall know to refuse the evil and choose the good the land thou abhorrest shall be forsaken of both her kings," it is clear enough that the language referred only to the king and what pertained to him, and that Matthew was wholly mistaken in imagining that it bore allusion to the paternity of Jesus. It is quite possible that the desire to make this appear a prophecy of Jesus was what prompted Matthew to get up the story of Joseph's dream and the feat performed by the Holy Ghost. His imagination must have been very active.

710. The second prophecy noticed by Matthew as referring to Jesus and his time is from Micah 2, and is made by Matthew to refer to Jesus being born in Bethlehem of Judea. The language of Micah referred to a military chieftain who should deliver the Jews from the Assyrians. It had not the slightest reference to Jesus. Matthew was again at fault.

711. The third case involves another dream on the part of Joseph when he was warned to flee into Egypt that the life of the young child need not be taken—that the prophecy "Out of Egypt have I called my son," is an unfortunate and unskillful effort on the part of Matthew. The language called a prophecy was not a prophecy, but a retrospect with reference to the former residence of the Israelites in Egypt and the calling of his son Jacob from that country. Matthew was again at fault.

712. The fourth pretended prophecy of Jesus on the part of Matthew was about the weeping of the mothers when the inno cents were slaughtered. Matthew says: "Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet, saying, In Rama there was a voice heard lamenting and weeping and great mourning, Rachel, weeping for her children, and would not be comforted because they were not." This effort is extremely far-fetched on the part of Matthew, for the language of Jeremiah was not a prophecy at all, but was in the past tense, and referred to events that had already taken place with reference to the oppressions of the Jews from the king of Babylon. It had no more reference to the killing of babies by the order of Herod than to the massacre of St. Bartholomew in France or the Mountain Meadow massacre in Utah. There is, besides, extreme doubt about Matthew's statements about Herod's ordering the innocents to be slaughtered; it is quite possible he drew upon his imagination in the matter for the sake of showing another fulfillment of prophecy. No one but himself seemed to know anything about the murdering of the babes.

713. The fifth case is with reference to another dream of Joseph's. He was a distinguished dreamer, and Matthew was the one to know his dreams and tell them. This Joseph, according to Matthew, having dreamed himself into Egypt, could not do less than to dream himself out again. This time he dreamed that Herod was dead and that it would be safe for him to return again to his own country; but being still a little fearful that Herod might not be quite dead, or might come to life again and go to killing more babies, he turned slyly aside and tarried awhile in Nazareth. Matthew says this was done that another prophecy might be fulfilled, "He shall be called a Nazarene." This was also rather an awkward piece of work on Matthew's part, though he seems to have gotten up the advent into Egypt and the return from there for the sake of showing the fulfillment of prophecy, for first, though Matthew says the words quoted were "spoken by the prophets," not one of the Bible prophets spoke them. In the second place the term "Nazarene" was not in use till a long time after the old prophets wrote. Possibly Matthew had in his mind the word "Nazarite," which was applied to Samson, and which meant one whose hair had not been cut. This would be very incorrect to apply to Jesus, of whom it was not claimed that his hair was not cut. Thirdly, it would have been very inconsistent to call Jesus a Nazarene because his parents had stopped a few days in Nazareth when he was an infant. At these attempts to show that prophecies had been fulfilled in Jesus, Matthew simply succeeds in making himself ridiculous.

714. Matthew's sixth case is equally unfortunate. He detaches some words from Isaiah by dividing parts of a sentence where there is no comma relative to an event that had already occurred, thus destroying the sense for the sake of making a pretext that a prophecy had been fulfilled. Such efforts are no better than out-and-out falsehoods.

Church Attendance.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Thinking you might hav room in your paper for something regarding the movements of the Liberal cause in this corner of the earth, I send an editorial from the pen of the editor and proprietor of the Toledo daily Telegram of the 29th inst., in which he quotes the Inter-Ocean of Chicago. This Telegram is the only brimstone publication in our city of wheat-gamblers and churches, and from the tone of its pen it is obvious that they see in the near distance the ominous handwriting upon the bleak walls of their old deserted churches.

The Chicago Inter-Ocean, in referring to this subject, says:

"It would seem that many people in our times, even among the educated and nominally Christian classes, are strongly inclined to try over again the old experiment of practical heathenism. And they are already treading very near the border of downright, open paganism, without any of the restraints which the old paganism imposed. They hav set aside the authority of God's law in its plainest, most emphatic precepts, and what hav they left? They attend no Christian church, they worship in no Jewish synagog, they hav no Mohammedan mosque, they swear by no Koran, and they do not obey the Bible. They are more than half persuaded that the Bible has been exploded, and that Christ Jesus was only a good but unfortunate man. They hav no respect for the Lord's sanctuary, or for the man who fills its pulpit, or for the people who fill its pews on the Sabbath. They are practically to all intents and purposes pagans of the old Grecian and Roman type, without any pagan deity to worship, or any such motivs for virtue as those which influence the better class of Greek and Roman philosophers."

Remarking upon the above, the Toledo Telegram says:

"There are doubtless many causes operating to produce the result complained of. Some are governed by one thing and some by another, and no two would agree as to the cause. As to the increasing tendency to remain away from church on the Sabbath, there is not a doubt; but perhaps a majority of the absentees could scarcely giv a reason for their absence, or at least would not giv the true reason if asked to do so. It is a subject which should be thoroughly considered by the churches with reference to the removal of the cause, or causes, so far as possible. If it results solely from a feeling of indifference and is not a matter of principle, much may be accomplished by the way of influencing people to attend church. If it arises from skepticism, then it would be well that the fact should be known.

"There are well known causes which keep many from church, but what it is that keeps so many away needs investigation. The complaint is general. It is confined to no particular locality. It may be the fault of the preachers, or of the people. There is something wrong somewhere, and that something cannot be discovered too soon. Talmge thinks it is for the want of live preachers, but he is scarcely a fit person to pass judgment in such a case. It is a subject demanding serious attention, and its discussion may develop the requisit facts. Perhaps those who do not attend church could throw some light upon the subject."

There are many good reasons in the way of church conduct in this city why this fellow of the Telegram expresses himself thusly. The old Episcopal concern of this city has recently concluded a most sanguinary battle, which for fierceness compared favorably with the ancient skirmish at Antioch, although there were not as many slain, which grew out of an attempt on the part of a fellow who was recently imported and evidently a near relativ of Black Henry the VIII., who established the Protestant church. His name was "Gurteen," and his home some distance south of the "Grampian Hills."

Another magnificent specimen of manly and womanly church warfare came off the past year in Westminster church, one of the "Beecher wings" of churchdom, and the faction opposed to ritualism, left the old hive and junctioned the Unitarian concern, and went in cahoot with them under a modified code, taken from the old Calvinistic string, and can be safely termed a "nondescript" religion, very strongly resembling the "What-is-it" of Barnum notoriety. And another of the same brimstone branch, and considered the high-toned concern of our city, is in great tribulation on account of a sweet singer of their choir, who has left the church, and one of the deacons is engaged in a $25,000 libel suit on account of of alleged libelous language published in the Toledo Sunday Democrat, which he has prosecuted, and claims the above sum for damages by him sustained. And the old Methodist concern, "St. Parks," is under an awful financial cloud, which is not likely to clear away soon. One of its best-paying members being of an intelligent and inquiring mind, attended several of Ingersoll's lectures, and now says that from his present standpoint he cannot honor any further brimstone drafts. Thus the posies pine away and die as the light of science and truth shines upon them. M. O. Waggoner.

A Bigoted Paper Scathingly Rebuked.

Although we are living in an age of advanced ideas, we still find many who use that old and contemptible weapon of the church, insinuation. In past ages, when witchcraft was in fashion, if a man was suspected of being a heretic, some one hinted that he was a witch, and the good people, obeying the instructions of God's holy word, put him to death. Thanks to the brave thinkers who are gone, such a thing is now impossible; but with what sting they hav left they try to poison a man's character and make his life unbearable, simply because he dares do his own thinking.

Here is their latest:

"We regret to see the respectable pages of the North American Review very disproportionately devoted to the ravings of a person whom we do not even care to name unnecessarily. He neither 'fears God nor regards man,' and as notoriety seems to be his one object of passionate pursuit, we think it a pity that decent pages should advertise him. In a late number of the same Review he was allowed to exploit himself with Judge Black to refute him, which he did effectually; but here, in an interminable No. II., he has it all to himself, and a periodical of good credit comes into one's family in such a shape that it cannot be safely laid upon the table, nor in any way exposed to the eyes of young girls and boys."—The Churchman.

Once, at least, they hav found a man so far above them that their infamous slander and lies cannot reach him. Mr. Ingersoll may not need defense from such attacks, but it is a duty we should never forget, to express our decided contempt for any and all such utterances.

They regret to see so much valuable space devoted to his ravings. What a consolation! when they find it impossible to answer one question propounded by him, to call them ravings.

And they do not wish to contaminate their paper with his name; but let them remember that long after they and their works hav sunk into wretched oblivion, the name of Robert G. Ingersoll will shine with increasing brightness as one of the noblest and best men of his time. He neither "fears God nor regards man!" Nowhere in the pages of history can be found a blacker lie than this.

Who is there, familiar with the name of Ingersoll, that does not know of his high regard for the rights of man, woman, and child?

Where is the man acquainted with his daily life but knows that he spends his time and means in strewing flowers of happiness in the path of every one he meets? Always ready to listen to the his fellow-beings; and, if necessary, with his purse to make their life brighter. Not one in a thousand of this class of people has the moral courage to read one word of Mr. Ingersoll's lectures or knows anything whatever of the sentiments they contain; but to perform an imaginary duty, to an imaginary God, they debase themselvs in attempting to scandalize a better man.

After carefully reading and considering the points of this discussion, the man who can say that Judge Black effectually refutes any statement made by Ingersoll is either an idiot to be pitied or one with such little regard for the truth that he should forever after be excluded from the society of honest and respectable men. A Word to the Wise.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav been counting up the starless names in the Round-the-World list, and I find forty-eight of them. Two hundred and forty dollars! It is a big sum, and I hope it will soon be made good. I somehow feel it a personal disgrace whenever a truth seeker does not come up to his promise, or fails to be a good and true man. Now I propose that all who cannot pay shall pen a card to The Truth Seeker telling us why, and all who can shall redeem our credit as soon as possible; and if any hav died since promising, let their friends speak for them.

I promised Bennett when he left that I would do all I could to help keep our darling paper in a prosperous condition, and that I would pay five or ten dollars a year toward his business as long as he was gone. Well, I hav paid in twenty dollars for books since he left, and hope to do as much more before he returns. I hav induced two persons to subscribe for The Truth Seeker, and never neglect an opportunity to speak a good word for it.

We must show our love for our principles by our deeds. Nice words will never make the pot boil. We need to giv energy, work, and money.

"And having these, the work shall grow;
Each effort shall set free
A thinking man, whose voice shall go
To shout for liberty."

Obituary.

Died, in Brentwood, L. I., at a quarter past six, Monday morning, November 14, 1881, A. Briggs Davis, former editor of the Battle Axe, and founder of the Independent Tract Society, Worcester, Mass. His age was fifty years last February.

Brother Davis's was a fine, compact, sensitiv nervous organization—a man of clear, intuitiv, comprehensiv, expansiv intellect; a keen, sharp discriminator, a large, forgiving heart, tender, clear conscience, and a practical worker and energetic philanthropist and reformer. He was a man of versatil genius, a poet, painter, printer, critic, editor, mechanic, jeweler, farmer, stook raiser, carpenter, and he could excel in any one of these departments. He had originality, inventiv, dramatic, and musical ability. He was religious, Christ-like, and a brother to the human race. He was devoted to the elevation of woman from the curse of bondage and society, and had the most advanced, rational, and philosophic views on every question pertaining to the sexes. He was a prophet and inspired. He was "true as steel," a man of fine moral principles, and died a martyr to the cause of human elevation and improvement. He died in honesty and want.

I hope to collect his poems and works and publish them, together with his life, privations, heroism, and sufferings, and an account of his last five months of suffering, illness, his hopes, aspirations, and future plans.

If any one has his book, "True Love: What It Is and What It Is Not," also back numbers of the Battle Axe, especially the one containing "A Prayer for Pure Food," or any memento or picture of his face they may hav, I will use the same in the compilation of the work and return again to the owner.

Also I gave my life, substance, all, to his care for five long months under the most discouraging circumstances and situations, and if any one has aught to send me to relieve my present condition of prostration and to aid in bringing out the inner life of A. Briggs Davis, which I assure you will make an interesting volume, I shall be glad to receive any donations that may be given.

He did not want to die and leave his work unfinished. He had a "Testimony to the Nation" and "A Testimony to Reformers."

Please send Battle Axe, books, pictures, or poems addressed Mrs. Minnie Merton, Brentwood, Suffolk county, Long Island, N. Y. M. M.

Died, in Westwood, Bergen county, New Jersey, October 16, 1881, after a long, serious illness, and under great depression of mind, Miss Hannah L. Marsh, at the home of her brother. She was the owner of the Bushkill property in Pike's county, Pa., where she went with E. Z. Wickes to found a community.

Miss Marsh was of a lovely disposition and a very superior woman. Her martyrdom has yet to be written. She sacrificed her life and died without overcoming the thousand and one obstacles that impeded her progress in the way of human happiness and reform. Mr. Davis and Minnie Merton extended her a helping hand, sympathy, and aid until the greater illness of brother Davis prevented further exertions to save Hannah, and she died without the necessary conditions to restore her to health and usefulness. Few lived with such broad views and philanthropic purposes.

It seemed sad that her light should be lost to the world, as she had an experience calculated to quicken and benefit humanity, and we need just such homes as she and brother Davis would establish.

Ministers.

There are a good many useless institutions in this great city and its neighbor, Brooklyn, but if there is one so completely useless as the ministers who every Sunday preach to their different congregations we do not know it. From Beecher down to Talmage they talk much nonsense, especially when they leave their threadbare Bible texts and orate upon science and Infidelity, as they call the great Free-thought movement in this counry. Sunday before last the great sensation clown of the Brooklyn Tabernacle gave a so-called sermon upon the evils of bad literature. He seems to get his inspiration from Comstock and his facts from that notorious person's diary. Of course he had to lug in the "literature of Infidelity," and of course he had to lie in order to make his point. According to him, the only way to preserve the country is to have a censor of morals and mails. He glibly repeated the old lie that the Liberals, led by R. G. Ingersoll, are all in favor of debauching the whole world and of circulating base literature without restraint. His opinions are of but little account, but when he tells a whole churchful of presumably decent people that Infidelity is the foster-mother of all the vices of this century, not one excepted, the reverend liar should have his words thrown back in his face. If he had said that the church is the corrupter of the age, and that the ministers make the church what she is, he would have spoken but the truth. The church has at some time sanctioned every species of crime, and its leaders have committed more than they have uprooted. It has been shown time and again that in proportion to their numbers more ministers are in the various penitentiaries than of any other profession. Every week in this city the police lock up twelve or fifteen hundred persons for all sorts of crime, from drunkenness to murder, and in that large number none are Infidels. They are Catholics and Protestants. Not even Jews or Chinamen figure in our police courts unless as complainants against some good Christian who shows his zeal by some outrage against them. And yet clerical clowns like Talmage go on day after day lying for the glory of God about Infidels being responsible for all crime. They care no more for facts than they do for truth. They are endeavoring to make their own easy positions secure by trying to convince Christians that they are the bulwarks between them and the waters of death; that without them as guides the world would be given over to crime and corruption. Their lives are living lies. A majority of them know better, and if there is one who does not he must be deficient in intellect or fossilized in the superstitions of his childhood.

It has always been the policy of the ministers to keep the masses in ignorance, for they can control them when they know nothing. But let a man become enlightened, and he begins to doubt that the priests are in direct communication with God, or that they know any more about the other world than the laymen. They are a burden upon the working world—self-imposed it may be, but none the less a heavy burden that should not longer be borne. With the exception, perhaps, of some country clergymen, who hav to dig or starve, the ministers hav always been idlers and non-producers. For their useless services they hav demanded heavy payment. They are intellectual dead-beats. But their living upon other's labor is not by any means the worst feature of the unholy business. If they only took the droppings from the tables of plenty and were content to be called what they are—pampered paupers—perhaps the world could stand it. Instead of this, however, they push themselves forward and demand extraordinary consideration as the plenipotentiaries of the Almighty, the revealers of his will, and the executors of his trusts. In order to do this they hav to lie, and then their lives are lives of deceit. They are plotters against secular government, for they strive in every way to seize upon power to make their place secure. Being humbugs, and knowing it themselvs, they are afraid the people will find it out and turn them away from their sinecures. In their insatiate greed for power they hav not hesitated to spill blood without stint. They hav been the inciters to dissensions, the promoters of discord, the instigators to persecutions, and the prime movers in numberless wars. They hav been the cruel, corrupt, and implacable enemies of progress, of science, of art. They hav endeavored to lock men's minds in the intellectual dungeons they hav built, and put the keys in their own pockets. Whenever a despotic ruler has entered upon a war a little more cruel than any other it always turns out that he had a priest at his back egging him on. Priests and men of God it was who, in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, instigated the wars of the Crusades against the Mohammedans of the East, the Moors of Spain, the Waldenses and Huguenots of France, and the Albigenses of Piedmont, by which millions of human beings were slain and human blood enough spilled to float all the ships of the world. And it was this same class of men who built and managed the Inquisition—a word no human being with a heart can read without a shudder—for the trial of the heretics who had become convinced that the priests were not quite the holy men they professed to be. And it was they who deluged the Netherlands in blood; and in shameless reference to those abominable persecutions, that fiend of the church, Alva, boasted of having "lawfully" caused the death of thirty-six thousand defenseless men and women, to say nothing of the burnings and assassinations of numerous others, without even the color of law. And who else but priests were the authors and instigators of the notorious massacre of St. Bartholomew, when forty thousand innocent people were cruelly murdered, and during the three succeeding days in other parts of France twenty thousand more were wantonly assassinated, and for which religious slaughter the pope ordered special thanksgiving to be rendered in his churches and Te Deums and masses to be performed?

Instead of being a blessing to the world, the ministers hav ever been a curse. Worse enemies than they the human race never had. They hav talked about the love of God, but they hav hated with the hatred of devils. The church and her ministers hav been perfectly conscienceless, with but one object in view—the perpetuation of their own power. If they could accomplish this by keeping the people ignorant and wheedling them with honied words, they were content. But when soft words were useless they resorted to the sword and stake without hesitation and without remorse. Their motto has been, Keep our places and power easily if we can, but keep them anyhow. History is red with their murders, and lurid with the flames they kindled. Infidelity never committed murder or engaged in crime, and yet religious liars, like the Brooklyn clown, hav the effrontery to make the charges he does. Had the ministers a spark of honor left they would blush for their brother. But we do not expect they will; on the other hand, they will re-echo the lie and send it along down the line for the glory of God. Let them. Their day as leaders and formers of public opinion is already gone, and we trust that it will not be many years before a minister who uses his pulpit to slander liberty of thought will be made an object of ridicule and his name be used as a synonym for liar. For that is only what Talmage is.

Around the World.

We hope there will be no cessation in taking shares in the Round-the-World journey which Mr. Bennett is now engaged in making. The expenses of the trip will be close upon $3,000, and the cost of the books, with their illustrations, will not be less than $1,500 or $2,000. So his friends who hav sent him away will see that many more names are necessary before the bare cost of the undertaking is paid. The idea is that the work shall be a sort of joint enterprise, the people contributing the money and Mr. Bennett giving his time. It is not fair to ask him to giv the year necessary to make the circuit of our globe and pay for getting out the books in addition. And, besides, he is not able to do it. The work will be dedicated to those advancing the $5's, and their names will be enrolled in the first volume, which is being forwarded at the rate of thirty-five or forty pages per week. It will take until about next January for it to be finished, and until that time the starry roll of honor is open to those who want to be pioneers in getting the truth. There hav been plenty of books of travel written, but all hav catered to some pious church prejudice, and, so far as telling the actual state of affairs existing in the "Holy Land" and the orient, were worth no more than what they would sell for as waste paper. Those who hav read Mr. Bennett's travels in Europe, written last year, will agree with us that his descriptions are faithful portraits of actual facts. He tells everything that he sees, and he has a shrewd way of seeing everything that is going on around him. His letters so far hav been marvels of descriptiv writing. The work, we feel sure, will be greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav, and we want all our friends and their friends to aid in disseminating it. There will be over one hundred and fifty full-page illustrations of scenes described, besides many smaller cuts. These will add greatly to the interest of the work, and with the faithful and close description will present Old-World places in a very familiar light. It will be as good as making the journey. And in order to pay for all this we shall keep the list open yet awhile longer in the hope that many more will yet send in their names. It isn't exactly square that the eleventh-hour laborers should get as much as the early w[illegible] but if that is divine justice poor fallible human beings cannot be blamed if we giv the ones who subscribe now just as fine a book as those who subscribed to send the editor off. We can call it that the first sent him away and the last bring him back. Send on the V.'s.

"The Godly Women of the Bible."

Owing to repeated illnesses of the Ungodly Woman, the publication of this history of the female ornaments of the Bible has been long delayed, but we are happy to announce that it is at last completed, and ready for mailing to whoever wishes a copy. It makes a book of nearly three hundred and fifty pages. Its title-page is adorned with a syllogistic proposition which shows the absurdity of Biblical reasoning, and it is dedicated, hopefully, to the believers in plenary inspiration. It takes up nearly all the women who figure in the Bible, and shows just what they were. Among the characters treated are: Sarah, Mrs. Lot and her nameless daughters, Rebekah, Leah and Rachel, Tamar (Judah's mother-in-law), divers women, Rahab the harlot, various godly women, the Levite's concubine, Naomi and Ruth, Hannah, Michal, Abagail, Bathsheba, Tamar the sister of Absalom, ten concubines, Abishag and Bathsheba, Elijah's widow woman, Elisha's women, Jezebel, Athalia and Huldah, Queen Vashti and Esther, Mrs. Job and Hosea's women, Elizabeth and Mary, the Virgin Mary, genealogy of the Virgin Mary, a summary of the godly grandmothers and mothers of Mary, Joseph, and Jesus, the sisters of Lazarus, the anointing scenes, five women (Mary Magdalene, Joanna, Susanna, and other Mary and Salome), the woman of Samaria, the women taken in adultery, Herodias and her daughter Salome, sundry women, sundry nameless women healed and comforted by Jesus, the apostolic women, etc.

The facts are taken from the scripture, and the comments are in the Ungodly Woman's inimitable style. Those who hav read it in THE TRUTH SEEKER will want to read it again, and those who hav not will miss a treat unless they order immediately. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

O. B. FROTHINGHAM has been back to this country for some few months, and is engaged in writing a life of George Eliot. Lately some newspaper reporter interviewed him as to his religious opinions, and he made some curious assertions in the light of what he taught when lecturing. He had no inclination to go back to the church, but he thought the Liberalism of the present day was tending to a "dark Materialism" which he did not like. He was, he said, dissatisfied with it, and was waiting for more light. This has been seized upon as a handle by the church, but we cannot see much in it. Mr. Frothingham has alwas been more of a dilettante than whole-hearted Liberal, a keenly intellectual man, but not one who saw in the religion of humanity a substitute for Christian superstition. His plaint seems to us like a sigh from one weary of intellectual strife and wanting rest. As Mr. Robert Collyer says, he is growing old and is sick. He doesn't feel able to do more fighting, yet is weary and cold. When he gets his health back he will be the same as when he lectured in Lyric Hall.

THE Chicago Liberals hav started a little mite of a League sheet filled with crisp paragraphs and news of the League. They propose to open a subscription list and take subscribers at twenty-five cents for six months. They will send a bunch of sample copies to any one sending their name. The address is Liberal League, 319 W. Randolph street, Chicago, Ill. The Chicago League meet every week, and hav good lectures. Last year they were apathetic, but seem determined to make amends this year.

"Voltaire in Exile."

I hav just finished reading "Voltaire in Exile," and find myself more than ever in love with the sage and philosopher of Ferney. It is rarely that we see so many good and useful qualities combined in one person, or that one single mind can control and move so many other minds toward all that is grand, free, glorious, and progressiv, as Voltaire did.

In this little volume costing only one dollar you hav a brief epitome of the great genius whose grand work moved whole empires, nations, and kingdoms. "In London, Berlin, Brussels, and Amsterdam Voltaire found the lever of Archimedes, the fulcrum that was necessary to him in lifting the world and enlightening it. It was abroad (in exile) that he was able to fight openly, to write freely, to publish his works, to propagate his ideas, without risking, as it had happened him in France, to be bastinadoed, embastiled, and to see his books burnt by the hand of the executioner." Voltaire lived sixteen years at Ferney, and converted a "miserable little borough into a prosperous town by building three schools, patronizing agriculture and industry, spreading ease and comfort, and placing capital as suggested to him by his large experience, profound knowledge of things, and acute intellect." Every one, even Catholics, loved him and consulted him and regarded him as a part or the family. When a famin came "Voltaire distributed all the grain in his possession. He never heard of a misfortune without hearkening to alleviate it. He was good, affable, and humane withal. At every turn he would loan money without the slightest hope of being reimbursed. When unemployed workmen knocked at his door he gave them work," and he boasted, "There are no longer any paupers on my land, despite the revenue hounds." It is said "he neves refused any one money, counsel, or time, and Ferney was Mecca and Rome combined—the Mecca and Rome of Freethought."

All peasants who passed through Ferney found there a dinner ready and a twenty-four-cent piece to help them on their way. So we see this great man was a practical worker for the good of humanity, giving for physical as well as mental needs. Fighting every evil, every superstition, and every wrong; attacking the conduct of the king on his throne or the priest in his sanctuary, and his whole aim was to elevate, purify, and happify the human race.

"He fought his doubts and gathered strength—
He would not make his judgment blind—
He faced the specters of the mind,
And laid them———"

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

California Letter.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: As it has been my custom for several years past to report myself in your valuable paper on my return home from the lecture field, I hasten to this duty to the cause no less than privilege to myself to jot down a few brief notes from the lecture field of the great northwest.

For five months past my work has been a constant fight against the flesh and the devil, as represented in modern paganism, known as the Christian church, which has a strong hold as yet upon the people of Oregon and the adjoining territory.

Leaving my home in San Jose, the garden city of California, in June, I touched at Astoria, where I hav lectured many times during the past eight years. The Liberal element here is quite activ, and always responds with a warm welcome and large audience. My thanks are due to friends Chainey, McGloclin, and others for helping hands. Ingersoll, Bennett, and Paine are the gods which these people hav set up, judging from the avidity with which their writings are read and from the numbers of their pictures which adorn the walls of the homes here. My stay was short on account of being over-due at Walla Walla and other points east of the Cascade mountains.

Moving up on the Columbia, the monarch of rivers, to Portland, we found the city in great excitement over the news of the attempted assassination of President Garfield, which cast a gloom over our whole country. Making arrangements here for a course of lectures, to be given on my return from the upper country, I took the train for Forest Grove, and had the pleasure of speaking again four times in the new and beautiful hall, the gift of a noble and good man, who died recently at Forest Grove, leaving what property he possessed for the erection of a fine hall bearing his name, Werts Hall, and dedicated to Freethought.

When I spoke here first, eight years ago, there was only a handful to hear. Now a hall, well-filled, tells the story of what THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, Banner of Light, and lectures are doing in the minds of this hitherto priest-ridden town.

Now I don't want anybody to die for Christ or any other man. But when they do pass on, I would like to see them follow the example of this Forest Grove disciple of Paine and leave such a lasting monument of regard for the cause of truth. Can it be our people are all poor? I would rather put it so than to feel that they were stingy.

Thanks are due to friends Leiser, Hudson, Hinds, Clow, Todd, and others, whose hearts seem to be in the right place.

Moving on by steamer from Portland to The Dalles, I stood once more in view of one of the world's great wonders, the passage of this mighty body of water (the Columbia river) through The Dalles.

For natural scenery the passage by steamer on the upper Columbia is equal, if not superior, to anything on this continent. The Dalles, a smart business town, is just above the cascades, at a point where the great Columbia makes the passage of The Dalles or narrow rocky channel of great depth, through which this mighty volume of angry, pent-up waters rushes with great velocity.

Apparently the river, about one mile in width above The Dalles, has turned on edge at this point, and for ages has cut this passage deeper and deeper through this rocky barier from the mountains to the sea.

At this point in the river, on an island, is situated the great burial ground of the Indians of the entire west and northwest.

Here rest the noble red men of many generations, brought here from incredibly long distances to rest in sacred ground, stacked up wrapped in their blankets, one on top of another, above the ground, inclosed in small rooms made of slabs of cedar packed from a great distance on their pony-horses. Here they lie, more than one hundred thousand in number, and, what is singular about these dead, the framework does not decay as when buried in the earth, but skin and muscle shrivel up and adhere to the bones as dry as a stick.

Some people with a morbid taste for curious specimens find here a rare, as also a bare, chance to get a mummy or lose their scalp, as the island is constantly watched with jealous care, and such is the sacredness of the island in the minds of the Indians that on no account, for money, love, or whisky, will they allow anything to be taken from the place, and only at the peril of life can be removed any of the relics with which the ground is strewn. And as I gazed on this city of dead Indians I thought that, from the cruel depredations of these savages upon life and property all over this wild country, the only really good Indian in the world is a dead Indian.

I gave three lectures at The Dalles, two at the Court-House, and one at the Baptist church, by request, on "Romanism and Our Schools." The theater could not be obtained for a lecture at any price on that subject, as the author is a red-mouthed Catholic.

This town is cursed on one hand with Rome and rum—a combination from natural affinity which destroys both body and mind—and on the other by the orthodox dry rot, which has produced more hypocrits, sneaks, and moral cowards in this place than in any other town of its size on the coast.

And yet we did our best to kindle a fire here that will not cease to burn for years to come. Our thanks are due to Messrs. Crossman, Cinney, Hayden, and others, who stood in the front and helped us to hold up the banner of truth against this tripod of mental and moral cussedness.

One night's ride by rail up the Columbia brought me to Walla Walla, which I found much improved since my visit five years ago. I gave five lectures to large audiences, and much good feeling prevailed. I also held a grove meeting in the country, six miles from Walla Walla, near the little town of Milton, which was well attended, all the sects in religion being well represented. Hence some were glad and others were mad to hav the bare bones of their gods and the deformity and rottenness of their system of salvation revealed to sight.

The country here is wonderfully adapted to the raising of wheat, growing from forty to seventy bushels per acre on the high upland and foothills. Everywhere seemed one ocean of wheat.

The great drawback to this country is the impossibility of having wells of water on all the high lands where the largest wheat is grown. They haul their water on a sled from the river or springs.

Hence you will see that good homes are not so easy to make as in the Willamette country.

Man cannot liv by bread alone, and simply a wheat-field, devoid of water, does not make home.

Another drawback to this country is the want of wood, many having to haul their firewood and poles for fencing twenty-five to thirty miles. I saw many people who had left good homes in the East and traveled over a vast sweep of country, much of it better than this, to get here, to find plenty of land, with but few homes or the possibility of making them without wood and water.

The formation of the Walla Walla valley is most singular. As a rule, valleys are formed from the wash of the hills and mountains, and consequently composed of the richness of the hills. Not so in this case; only here and there an oasis, or little farm with orchard and home comforts, while the larger part is barren, covered with coarse gravel brought from the mountains by the river, which at one time and another has changed its bed so as to run over almost every part of the valley. So it happens that desirable homes bring a good price here.

The climate in summer is hot, without rain. In the fall comes the rain, and in winter more or less snow, sometimes so severe that the cattle and sheep perish for want of food and shelter. But, with the average winter, stock keep without feeding.

Villard with his railroad boom is moving things right and left. New towns are springing up on every hand, and men who hav money, and wisdom to invest it, can make fortunes here at this time.

But the poor, plodding laboring man, without means, is but little better off for all this stir, except as he partakes of the general benefit conferred by improved markets for wheat, the great product of the country.

I am constrained to write thus plainly about this portion of the country from the fact that numerous letters are reaching me from the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER desiring information about it.

Now let me say in all candor to any who are anxious to move, if you hav a good home and are making a living don't dispose of it for a song, as I did mine, to come West—not, at least, without first coming to see for yourself. To travel and prospect a little is cheaper than to sacrifice and ruin all.

With the man who has nothing to lose, moving is always in order—unless he is leaving rich relations behind. To the lazy man let me say, it givs me pleasure to point you to Oregon, west of the Cascades, as the best country on the continent for lazy people.

The climate is warm and somewhat wet. Crops never fail, even with the poorest kind of farming. The rivers are full of fish, the forests are full of game, and there is no end to wood and water, and the man who simply desires a living can make it with as little labor in Oregon as any country I know of. As for society, it will average with any of the Western states; as to schools, we think not so good as in California; as for churches, too many by half; and for religion, every religious humbug on earth is represented in Oregon. It is chock full of religion, but of morality has none to spare.

Our thanks are due to T. J. Baumgartner, A. L. Davis and wife, O. R. Ballou, W. S. Gilliam, and especially to the editor of the Walla Walla Watchman for the brave and noble stand he took in our behalf and the cause of truth.

My next point was Dayton, W. T., a beautiful little town of about one thousand inhabitants nestled in among the hills, about thirty miles from Walla Walla, situated at a terminus of the great Northern Railroad. Its prospects are flattering; its people are bright and intelligent. That disease known as religion has but a light hold upon this town. The Rev. McAllister and his noble wife hav occupied this field of labor for some years past, preaching the gospel of universal salvation through Christ. A fine large church, the best in the town, stands as a monument of their labor. But the people hav lost their hold on Jesus in a great degree, and were in a receptiv state for salvation by natural development. The trustees of this church kindly gave me the use of the church free of charge, in which I gave six radical lectures to an audience not less than four hundred, with a promis to return in the near future, and I will always remember with gratitude the kindness of O. F. Clark, Dr. Day, Mr. Crow, and others who helped to make our work a pleasure in Dayton.

Taking my leave of this pleasant city, I dropped into Waitsburgh on our way to Pendleton, and on a short notice gave two red-hot lectures on Individuality and Religion of the Intellect. The little town was frightened almost out of its wits; it took them so unprepared they had hardly time to ring the bell and circulate the cry of mad dog before it was all over, the fire kindled and the seed sown for good or ill.

The town of Pendleton has more than doubled in size since my last visit five years ago. It has rail communication with Portland by a branch from the main trunk, which is to be continued over the Blue Mountain to Baker City, and thence on to Boise, and ultimately to connect with the California Central at or near Kelton.

I gave six lectures here in Sanford's theater to a large and appreciativ audience. Here it was during a lecture on Romanism, an unregenerate Catholic, fresh from the bog, grew hot under the fire, and retiring without ceremony from the audience returned the fire, not with logic, but a brick thrown with malignant violence through the window into the theater, breaking the sash, but fortunately doing no damage to life or limb. This incident cost the red-mouth thirty dollars fine the next day, besides furnishing to the people a practical illustration of my lecture on Romanism and its history of cruelty and outrage in all the past.

Another point was furnished in this affair worthy of mention. While this Catholic brute was disturbing my meeting by loud and angry conversation and the use of such kindly epithets as "You're a damned liar," etc., two Catholic policemen stood near him without making the least attempt to quiet or arrest him, but left him to be arrested by the friends the following day. This shows clearly to my mind that only Americans should be placed on guard as officers of the peace. A Catholic cannot, in the nature of his religion, owing allegiance to the pope, be a true American, and their oath of allegiance to our government is a bond of straw. I would as willingly lose my right arm as cast a vote to place any Catholic in office, knowing as I do their hatred to our government and schools; and the sooner our people wake up to the sacred duty of Americans, in spirit, ruling America, the better will it be for the perpetuity of our free institutions.

Our thanks are due at Pendleton to Jerry Despain and wife, who made me happy in their home during my stay; also to Mr. Sanford and the young lawyer, as well as the Hewson sisters, for their music and song at each lecture of the course.

An all night's ride by stage brought us to Hepner, a distance of sixty miles, a smart little town hid away in the hills, supported by the cattle and sheep trade, the principal business of this wild mountain section of the country.

I gave three nights to Hepner, and although I felt sorry when I entered the town in the early morning from a cold and disagreeable ride, they made me happy by large audiences and the sincere interest manifest on all hands.

No Liberal paper had ever been taken here—not so to-day. They now hav six copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

My thanks are due to L. F. Shipley, M.D., G. W. Swaggart, and others, for kindness received.

Was Garfield Orthodox?

A LECTURE DELIVERED BEFORE THE PITTSBURG LIBERAL LEAGUE, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1881.

BY HON. A. B. BRADFORD.

Now, since the late President has passed off the stage of life and joined

> "The innumerable caravan which moves
> To the pale realms of shade, where each shall take > His chamber in the silent halls of death," those of the public who feel interested in the subject are beginning to inquire what right the church people hav to claim that he lived and died a Christian, in the meaning generally attached to that term.

In a republican country like this, where the church is as yet so strong an institution, a politician or even a statesman who is ambitious for place and power, if he does not agree with the prevailing religious sentiment, finds it necessary to conceal the fact. There is no more freedom of speech and action under our government than there is under a monarchy. The late Lord Beaconsfield was all his life an Infidel to the Christian religion, although as Prime Minister of England he exercised a kingly power over the church in the appointments of bishops, archbishops, and other clerical officials. He was also an Infidel to the Jewish religion, in which he was born, as is proved by the circumstances attending his last sickness, death, and burial. But as long as he did not express his opinions and attempt to weaken the confidence of the masses in the church, and thus arouse the opposition of the clergy, there was no bar in the way of his political promotion.

The policy of such a course in a government where the church is as much a part of the Constitution of England as the army, navy, and judiciary; and where it is supported at the expense of the public, made up of Catholics, Jews, Nonconformists, and the large class who profess no religion, is ignoble in the same degree that the subject of religion is more important than any other subject, and that it is outrageous injustice to compel the vast majority of the people to support a religion they do not believe in. And this is one of the many unpardonable sins of the church everywhere, that she takes advantage of men who depend upon popular favor for their position and bread, and compels them either to stop all inquiry and swallow the dogmas of the creed, or else to practice the low arts of dissimulation in regard to their religious opinions, and to lead lives of hypocrisy and self-contempt. The only classes in a priest-ridden community who are safe from such malign influence are the servil and the wooden.

This policy of silence on the august subject of God and our relations to him, as already hinted, is deemed quite as important in an American as in an English politician; for, although our Constitution and government are purely secular and ignore all kinds of religion, the voters can be influenced by the clergy, who, if they see fit, can raise a hue and cry against a candidate for office on account of his heretical opinions. Hence, in ascertaining the religious views of a public man we must first resort to the testimony of his confidential friends, to his private correspondence, or to that circumstantial evidence which, after all, is the best proof of a fact, since actions always speak louder and more truthfully than words.

In my opinion, General Garfield, like thousands of others in this age of reason and inquiry, who had been brought up in a church and accepted its dogmas as a matter of one-sided religious education, outgrew his creed, and all creeds, when he came maturely and impartially to examin their claims to his belief. For this opinion I respectfully offer such reasons as these:

When a young man at college, Garfield wrote many letters to his bosom friend, Corydon E. Fuller, from a list of which, published in the New York Times, I select for my purpose the following:

"WILLIAMSTOWN, June 19, 1855.

"MY DEAR CORYDON: Your favor of the 4th inst. was received about ten days ago, but I hav been entirely unable to answer until this time. A day or two after it came I left for Pittstown, N. Y., to attend a yearly meeting of Disciples, where I spent some four days, and last Saturday I left again for Poostenkill, and spoke to the people Saturday evening and three discourses on Lord's day. . . . We had good meetings in each place, and much interest. I cannot resist the appeals of our brethren for aid while I hav the strength to speak to them. . . . I tell you, my dear brother, the cause in which we are engaged must take the world. It fills my soul when I reflect upon the light, joy, and love of the ancient gospel and its adaptation to the wants of the human race. . . . I long to be in the thickest of the fight, and see the army of truth charge home upon the battalions of hoary-headed error. But I must be content to be a spy for a time, till I hav reconnoitred the enemy's stronghold, and then I hope to work. Ever your friend and classmate, JAMES A. GARFIELD."

In this letter, which I regret was not published in its entirety by Mr. Fuller, we see a young convert coming up out of the water of baptism for the remission of sin, full of zeal, with a faith strong enough to remove mountains, and saying to his fellow-convert: "I tell you, my dear brother, the cause in which we are engaged must take the world. . . . I long to be in the thickest of the fight, and see the army of truth charge home upon the battalions of hoary-headed error." By this expression, emphasized by myself, he meant all the old orthodox churches, then, as now, in existence, and, indeed, all others too; for they all rejected the "ancient gospel" of baptism for the remission of sins, the sole doctrinal peculiarity of the Disciple or Campbellite church. Remember, this letter was written in 1855, when he was about twenty-four years of age, and when he firmly believed the correlativ doctrins that all men are by nature in their sins and exposed to the wrath of an angry God in eternal hell-fire; and that the only method of escaping the impending doom is by exercising faith and being buried with Christ in the waters of baptism. These were his deep and honest opinions, and he acted accordingly. Had a seat in the House of Representativs, the Senate, or the Presidential chair, been offered to him at this time, he would probably hav rejected it as he would one of the baubles of childhood, or as a temptation of the devil; for his highest ambition was, as a minister of the gospel, to snatch condemned sinners as brands from the burning and hav them placed as jewels in his crown of rejoicing in the day when Christ should come to judge the world. It was this "ancient gospel," as he called it, and its adaptation to sweep the world of all opposition to it, that fired the soul of the young preacher, and made him consider everything else as dross in comparison, for "what shall it profit a man," said Jesus, "if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? Or what shall a man giv in exchange for his soul?" I know not whether, but I suspect that, like all the other Protestant sects, the Disciple church believes in a divine "call" to the ministry of the gospel, so that its preachers can say with Paul, "Woe unto me if I preach not the gospel." At all events, from contemporaneous history it is very clear that this love for the "ancient gospel," for its divine founder, and for the lost souls of men, was an affection of such expulsiv power that it drove out of Garfield's soul and subordinated all other loves, and led him to devote all the powers of his mind and body to his calling as a preacher. One sermon of a Saturday night and three the next day were a sample of his zeal in the responsible work of saving souls.

In process of time, say four or five years afterward, the mind of this ardent young preacher unfolds, and enlarges its powers by study, and he falls in with the writings of Mill, Tyndall, Spencer, Huxley, Haeckel, and Darwin, which were then attracting the attention of all thinking men in Europe and America. It is well known that he was especially struck with the essays which came from the clear and prolific mind of Herbert Spencer, who, accepting the evolution theory cordially, carried it into and enlightened realms of inquiry which Darwin and Wallace had not fully explored. In the essay on the evolution of life, which you will find in chapter ii, part 3, of the volume entitled "Principles of Biology," Mr. Spencer discusses at length the special creation hypothesis, as connected with the newly elaborated truth of the correlation and persistence of the forces of nature, thus establishing the reign of law.

Now, the Almighty God never constructed a human intellect in this world, or any other world, which, when free from prejudice, with the love of truth as the impelling motiv to inquiry, and with ability to know when a proposition is proved to be true, that can read this chapter without being thoroughly convinced of the falseness and absurdity of the idea that the iron-linked sequence of natural events ever has been, or ever will be, destroyed by an intervention called miracle or special creation. To make this statement plain to any mind capable of comprehending the truths of the multiplication table, let us understand what a miracle is by supposing a case. The teacher of a new religion, say a Mormon, or the general of the Salvation Army, which is making such efforts to conquer the world for Christ in England and this country, stands upon the bank of the Niagara river expounding his view of the gospel to an open-air congregation of doubters, who demand his credentials. To remove their doubts and bring about the state of mind called faith or belief, he lifts up his voice, and by a command reverses the law of nature that water always runs down but not up hill, and order the floods of Lake Ontario to roll back and over the precipice of Niagara upon the waters of Lake Erie. This violation or suspension of natural law, if it took place, would be God's testimony to the truthfulness of the man's utterances as an apostle, and the miracle is wrought to convince the spectators of the fact, and to cause them, not only to believe in his divine embassadorship, but to do whatever the mirale-worker directs in the way of duty. They would be justified in this, for they could say, as Nicodemus did, "We know that thou art a teacher come from God, for no man could do the miracles which thou doest unless God be with him."

If, however, after all this display of Almighty power, loaned to the miracle-worker for the time being for the specific purpose of making the spectators believe in his claim, they still hold out in unbelief, then, clearly, God is as much disappointed and defeated in his aim as his servant is. God being all-wise, and all-good, and all-powerful, orders the sequence of events, stretching from the eternity of the past to the eternity of the future, so that his intelligent creatures might hav confidence in him as the ruler of the universe. In the department of religion his wish is to bring back his revolted subjects to their primitiv allegiance to him; and to secure this object he sends his son, and his son's apostles, to persuade the rebels to be reconciled to God. This is the theory. To convince them that Christ and his apostles are his authorized spokesmen and embassadors, he invests them with the power of working miracles, expecting, or seeming to expect, that the rebels, when they see the credentials of divine authority, will lay down the arms of their rebellion, believe, and be saved. But after all this display of positiv proof only a few, comparativly, see and believe. All the rest stand out in their unbelief. God is disappointed and foiled; and almighty as he is, he is not almighty enough to remove the obstacle out of the way so as to carry out his benevolent plans.

The resurrection of Lazarus, who had been dead four days in a hot climate—if the event ever occurred—was the most stupendous reversal of the law of nature recorded in the New Testament. Yet while we are told in the eleventh chapter of John—the other three evangelists never allude to this event—that Jesus wrought the miracle "to the intent that we may believe," and "that the son of God might be glorified thereby," and "because of the people which stand by, that they may believe that thou has sent me," it appears to hav signally failed in producing the desired effect, for while we are told that many of the Jews did believe, so many more dis-believed that Jesus was compelled by his unpopularity "to walk no more openly among the Jews," but to go "thence into a country near the wilderness, where he continued with his disciples." And the whole history of the resurrection of Lazarus winds up with the lamentable admission that "though he had done so many miracles before them, yet they believed not on him." Thus we see from the testimony of the Bible itself that miracle-working is no convincing proof of a divine mission. It is only deemed such by those whose interests are promoted by the phenomenon. And the truth of this remark is substantiated by a fact taken from the Old Testament, which I have never seen noted before, that the same God who authorized the apostles of the Christian religion to prove its credibility by working miracles declares, in Deuteronomy xiii, 1, that if a prophet rises up among you (Jews) and proposes a secession from the established religion of Judea to some other religion of the neighboring nations, and performs miracles—"signs and wonders" to prove the truth of his mission as a seceder, the people who see his miracles are forbidden to believe him, and the prophet and his followers must be put to death immediately.

The miracles recorded in the sacred books of the world's multitudinous religions are numbered by thousands, and they vary in dignity, from the childish miracles of Jesus in his reputed father's carpenter shop, and recorded in the apocryphal gospels, which were believed by the Christian church for three hundred years, to the flight of Mohammed's coffin through the air. And it seems an obvious conclusion to the mind of a candid man that if the false prophets of the Old Testament worked miracles, and the false prophets of the New—Simon Magus, for instance—did so too; and if the Catholic church from the beginning has worked, and still works, miracles, this world would be an unsafe place to liv in, for there is no telling what day some teacher of a new or old religion, in order to strike dumb all opposition to his claims, may suspend, for instance, the law of gravitation, unsettling all standards of weight, and whirling all loose things into space by the centrifugal force of the earth's motion on its axis. If these great laws of nature, on the steady operations of which we all depend in our calculations, are, nevertheless, liable to be reversed by some prophet of a new religion, who would build a house or a railroad, with any assurance that they would stay where they were put?

In contrast with this fitful government of the world by miracles, shaking the confidence of mankind in wise management, and failing, after all, in accomplishing the avowed purpose of the miracle, modern science teaches that the world is a plan—a panorama, if you please—and that as millions of years have been taken up in executing and unfolding it thus far, millions of years more will be required to show its ultimate intent; and, in this process of evolution, so uniform is the sequence of cause and effect—every effect being only a new cause to produce another effect—that no supernatural event has ever occurred during the long round of the past ages to disturb the harmony of the plan, or ever will occur in the countless ages of the future. The whole universe, and every atom that helps to comprise it, is under irrepealable, iron law.

Now these ideas, so in accordance with common sense, and reflecting such honor upon the great unknown cause; and the church ideas, so utterly unreasonable, and reflecting such dishonor upon God, struck the mind of Garfield with tremendous force; and the brightness of the new light, as it gradually dawned upon his soul, extinguished the darkness of the old faith. From that moment his intellect was disenthralled, and he became a Freethinker; and taking courage from the remark of Farraday, the great English chemist, that "in knowledge that man only is to be despised who is not in a state of transition," he went forward in his career of inquiry and ceased to be a Christian in the sense of the church, while he became a better Christian than ever in the sense of Jesus himself, who declared that the sum total of religion consisted in a reverent and obedient love to God as he was displayed in his works, and a considerate love to man, who is our equal brother. This is what he meant, I think, when he calmed the fears of one of his friends who was still in the bondage of Egypt, and who was alarmed at his seeming departure from the ancient gospel of baptism for the remission of sins, by saying that his religion had only "broadened."

If I am asked how I know this, I answer, only from circumstances and conceded facts. He soon declined and ultimately ceased entirely to preach the "ancient gospel," which, in 1855, he thought must take the world. His former pity for the lost condition by nature of his fellow-beings of mankind changed into indifference, for he now saw that, bad as the race is, it is in a better condition than it ever was before. He repudiated the doctrin of total depravity with its twin dogma of eternal hell fire, and regarded them as a blasphemous charge against the father of mankind and a cruel slander against his children. His zeal for the glory of God by the salvation of sinners which, in 1855, was at fever heat on the thermometer of religious feeling, sunk down to the freezing point, for his ideas of God had fundamentally changed; and as to man, the only damnation he is exposed to is the damnation of ignorance and superstition. And in the full vigor of bodily health, with sound lungs, and no throat distemper which retires from the pulpit so many clergymen when they marry rich wives or find any other bonanza; with remarkable qualifications as a man and an orator, he quietly left the pulpit forever and betook himself to the profession of the law and to politics. If the pastor of a church in Pittsburg, drawing a salary of $3,000 or $4,000 a year, as young, in as good health, as gifted in magnetism, as winning in his ways public and private, and as well calculated to convert sinners and build up the church as Garfield was, would do such a thing as this the isolated fact without a word spoken would satisfy all but the fools that he no longer believed his church creed, but had become what that fact proved, an Infidel to his religion. To the truth-loving, truth-perceiving, and truth-appreciating mind of Garfield, the doctrin of miracles, or special creations, falling to the ground, brought down with it the whole superstructure of dogmas and ceremonies that had been erected on it, and left him nothing in the shape of religion except the simple but all-comprehensiv religion which Jesus taught, love to God and love to man. He had now become, "but secretly for fear of the Jews," what the church, in her arrogance and presumption, calls by the reproachful epithet of "Infidel," having given up the religion of the hull and accepting that of the kernel. Instead of believing the discouraging doctrin that man fell from his high estate of holiness, intelligence, and happiness in the Garden of Eden, nearly six thousand years ago, he accepted the evolution theory, so full of hope and encouragement, that, whereas we hav arrived at our present exalted position in the scale of being by the operation, during millions of ages, of the great law of the struggle for life and the survival of the fittest, our race is destined to reach in the ages of the future a bodily, intellectual, and spiritual development, the grandeur of which no mind can conceive of now.

But did not Garfield, when he took the oath of office as President of the United States last March, "kiss the book" like a good Christian? Yes, he did swear by the book of Genesis, which condemns astronomy, geology, paleontology, and archæology, sciences which he used to teach the students of Hiram College as true beyond all contradiction. He did swear by the Song of Solomon, the polygamist, who had seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines, and in the inspiration of which he had no more belief than he had in the divine inspiration of the odes of Anacreon, or Burns's "Tam O'Shanter." He did swear by the one hundred and ninth Psalm, in which David, the man after God's own heart, cursed his enemies and his enemies' children, born and unborn. He did swear by the thirteenth chapter of Deuteronomy, which has been the warrant of authority during long centuries of darkness and superstition, and is so regarded to-day by some Christian people, for putting men to death on account of their religious opinions. And he did swear by the gospels, in which Christ explicitly directed his disciples to "Swear not at all; neither by heaven, nor by the earth; but to let their communication be yea, yea, and nay, nay, because whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil." He did swear by the Epistle General of James, who said: "But above all things, my brethren, swear not; neither by heaven, neither by the earth, neither by any other oath; but let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay, lest ye fall into condemnation." Yes, he did all these things, I admit, but in doing so he yielded, as thousands of other good men hav done, to the force of circumstances. It was the obtrusiv sectarianism of Chief Justice Waite that made Garfield act so inconsistently.

The Constitution of the United States directs, in Article 2, Section 1, that "the President elect shall take the following oath or affirmation, 'I do solemnly swear, or affirm, that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States.'" Garfield had a right to expect that, on the occasion of his induction into office, the Chief Justice would administer the Constitutional oath or affirmation; instead of which, he required him to kiss the book, like a priest-ridden papist. It was too much to expect under the circumstances, that Garfield would disturb the harmony of the occasion by a protest. But it would hav immortalized his name, and hav admitted him into the company of the great founders of the republic, if he had said to the Chief Justice, "No, sir; our government is a secular institution alone, and I prefer to take the oath or affirmation prescribed by the Constitution. Garfield's successor did take the Constitutional obligation when he was sworn in at New York. But when he went to Washington the Chief Justice swore him over again, and made him, too, "kiss the book," a proceeding which was highly disrespectful to the opinions and practice of all the American people, except those of the Catholic and Episcopal churches.

There is tremendous force in circumstances. In 1879 the Rev. Dr. Bacon, of Connecticut, got up a crusade against steamboat excursions on the Sabbath, and succeeded in stopping them. The design of these excursions was to giv recreation to that large class of working men, clerks, and business men of all sorts, who are confined to the house all the week by their vocations, and who, not frequenting the churches on Sunday, prefer, instead, to take their wives and children into the country for relaxation and amusement, as John Calvin and Martin Luther did and allowed. Such a way of spending the Sabbath, however, is a violation of the state law, and above all, a violation of the laws of Sinai, as Dr. Bacon teaches, where Jehovah spoke amidst the thunderings and thick darkness, and said, "Remember the Sabbath day and keep it holy." But last summer ex-President Hayes made a visit to the reverend doctor, and when Sunday came, and the weather was fine, and the roads good, and the ex-President looked anxious to enjoy the open air, the reverend doctor harnessed up his horses and took his guest out riding, thus violating the statute, incurring a fine, setting a bad example to other people, but what was infinitly more inconsistent aad criminal, insulting the majesty of Jehovah by trampling his solemn command under foot, and leading common-sense people to say that, in regard to his zeal in stopping the steamboat pleasure excursions on the Sabbath, this example of "bacon" was "gammon," which Webster defines as "humbug," an attempt to play on the credulity of the people. But we must all extenuate, if not excuse, this gross violation of the law and the doctor's own religious convictions, because he committed it under the stress of circumstances.

But you ask, if Garfield experienced such a radical change in his religious opinions as you hav described, why did he not announce it to the world, and make amends for his past folly by devoting the rest of his life to the enlightenment of those who were still enthralled in the darkness of the old superstitions? This is a fair question, and is entitled to a fair answer. In the first place, he felt what is true, that a man's religious opinions is a matter between his God and himself, and that under a secular government like ours, whose Constitution intentionally and entirely ignores all religion and has not in it the name of God, or of Christ, from beginning to end, a man's metaphysical ideas about God, and our relations to him, is a subject which the public hav nothing to do with. There is no doubt at all that the founders of the republic, with an exception or two, were Deists who believed in the existence of a God, but who could not intelligently and conscientiously accept the Christian religion as defined by the creeds of the church, but who did not feel called to make war upon it. Garfield imitated their policy of silence He did not profess to be a reformer. He felt that every man must work his own passage out of the land of Egypt and the house of bondage as he did, by his own reading and reflections. He was only a lawyer, making a living for himself and his growing family at the bar, and a politician in the service of his country. In the second place, he knew that if he announced his honest opinions to the world, as his friend Ingersoll had done, he might succeed, like Ingersoll again, by dint of his talents and legal learning at the bar, but must giv up all hopes of political preferment. Few men in our history had more personal magnetism and the other elements of character which go to make a man popular and successful in politics. But he knew full well that if he were a candidate for office, and the public knew his real sentiments on the subject of religion, his political opponents would get up the cry of "Infidel" and defeat him at the polls.

At this moment Charles Bradlaugh, of England, who, on account of his eminent talents and statesmanship, was elected to represent a Northampton constituency in the British Parliament, is not permitted by the Tories and weak-kneed Liberals to take his seat, simply because he disbelieves in the God of the popular theology. Plenty of others hold the same ideas as he does, but they do not avow them, and in order to arouse no opposition go through the empty formality of the oath. The scriptures often represent the church, on account of her sinfulness, as a strumpet and adulteress, who will barter her love and purity for money. She still retains this characteristic in England and this country; for, although the theory is that the door of heaven is shut against all who do not believe the creed, even Infidels and Atheists in both countries, if they promptly pay a hundred dollars a year and put in an appearance in their pew once in a long while, may be ticketed clear through as outside passengers on the chariot of salvation. Bradlaugh does not do this. On the contrary, he believes the church to be the refuge of bigotry and superstition, and a hindrance to the cause of civilization; and with a moral character unimpeached and unimpeachable, with unquestioned ability and patriotism, declares as a thinker and reformer, but not as a member of Parliament, his honest opinions on the subject. Therefore the Tories, and enough of the Liberals falsely so called, join in the howl of the church against him, and he is ejected from the House of Commons to which he had been twice elected. I am no Materialist or Atheist, but I honor the man who respects the divinity of truth and the freedom of his own intellect enough to hav convictions, and to express them on all suitable occasions before his fellow-men. The Abolitionists did so forty years ago when their opinions were as unpopular and odious in the eyes of the church and politicians as "Infidelity" is now. But the times change and we change with them. And as our own South, redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled from the triple curse of slavery, and restored to her right mind by the genius of universal emancipation, will soon be ready to erect a monument to commemorate the patriotic services of Garrison and his fellow Abolitionists; so the marble may be already quarried out of which the children of his enemies will build a monument to Bradlaugh for his heroic sacrifices in the cause of human enlightenment in general and the freedom of English people in particular.

All true reformers can bide their time; for the history of human progress declares in hundreds of instances that what are deemed sacred truths in one age become cast-off errors and impediments to the march of civilization in the next. To be sure, the reformer who dies and turns to dust before the triumph of his principles don't get much compensation for the trials and losses he endured in their advocacy. As the theory of evolution by a struggle for life, and the survival only of the fittest, while it advances the general good of the race sacrifices the individual, so the reformer in a good cause must get his reward as he goes along in the consciousness of doing right and in the gratifying assurance that his self-denying services will contribute to the general good.

When Garfield received the assassin's shot, and life and death hung for weeks in the even scale of doubt, he had full possession of his intellectual faculties, and said to his physicians and heart-broken friends as they stood beside him, "Be honest with me; tell me the worst, for I am not afraid to die." These were nearly the very words Washington uttered to his physicians as he lay on his deathbed in 1799; and in both cases they proved the men to hav had settled opinions. But as Garfield's strength wore away, and God turned a deaf ear to the prayers of millions of people who agonized for his recovery, no clergyman of his own or any other church was called in to help him read his title clear to mansions in the skies. Mr. Errett, of Cincinnati, his life-long friend, endeavors to explain this fact by saying that his life had been such that he needed no particular preparation for crossing the river of death as its cold waters dashed against his feet. This was strictly true according to my theory, for Garfield did not feel that he was going into the presence of an angry God who could only be propitiated by the blood of his son and the prayers of Christians. The force of truth had driven these ideas entirely out of his belief. But Mr. Errett knows that in all cases where Christian believers die and are supposed to enter into the presence of God, the evangelical custom resembles that of the Catholic church, and the clergyman, or priest, by prayers and pious conversation, strives to see the dying man, specifically and by an act of faith, accept the garment of Christ's righteousness, by virtue of which he expects to be justified before God and admitted into heaven. In Garfield's case there was nothing of all this. No cry to God for mercy, no tear of repentance; no call for a clergyman; no doubt or apprehension concerning his relations to God; not an evangelical expression escaped his lips, so far as the public has been informed.

All was calmness, and he died like a man who had made up his mind long before, and was ready, not only for death, but for the issue thereof, whether it shall be a total extinction of his personality or a continued existence in higher spheres of action, and under the same laws of evolution and improvement which prevail in this world.

I hav now traced the circumstances of Garfield's life, as they bear upon the point of discussion, from 1855 to the sad hour when all our hopes of a brilliant and patriotic administration of the government under his Presidency, uniting the hearts of the American people in bonds of brotherhood that could never again be broken, were cruelly and hopelessly blasted by a religious assassin—the most dangerous of all kinds of assassins—who felt it his duty to God to "remove," as he called it, one President and put in another. And I appeal to your candor and your love of truthfulness to say whether the circumstances I hav narrated, the facts I hav cited, and my reasoning upon those facts, do not justify me in denying that Garfield either lived or died a Christian in the meaning attached to that word by the church, viz.: a blind-eyed person who believes in a set of contradictory and unintelligible dogmas called his creed, and practices a round of empty and superstitious ceremonies which he calls his worship.

Letters from Friends.

AMHERST, MASS., Nov. 19, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed you will find check for $5 for your Round-the-World trip.

Yours truly, L. W. GOODELL.

GRANTSVILLE, NEV., Nov. 14, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5 for Round-the World trip, and I am well pleased with your paper and the book that you sent me. It is worth all the money. am your well-wisher, JOHN NIMMO.

HANOVER JUNCTION, VA., Nov. 23, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed please find check for $5, to be placed to the Round-the-World fund in the name of J. C. McAllexander. He says he had no hand in sending our noble old veteran away, hence he contributes his mite to bring him back. With kind regards to yourself and those engaged in disseminating the truth, I am, Very respectfully,

JAMES B. DENTON.

VALLEJO, CAL., Nov. 18, 1881.

MRS. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed please find post-office order for $10 for Mr. Bennett's forthcoming books, "A Tour Round the World"—one for Mrs. B. Lister and one for Robert Bruce. With best wishes, I remain Yours respectfully,

ROBERT BRUCE.

FARMINGTON, UTAH, Nov. 12, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been silent a long time, but none the less anxiously watching the movements of Liberalism and of our patron saint, D. M. Bennett. No paper is more eagerly watched for than THE TRUTH SEEKER, though there is one paper which we are watching for as anxiously just now, namely, the next number of the Liberal League Man, with a more full report of the Chicago Convention. You must not omit enrolling me with the Round-the-World patrons. I am obliged to confess that I am a little selfish in this, as I put it in this light, that friend Bennett is doing the work, while I am going to get the benefit of the same at the small cost of five dollars. In referring to the Chicago Convention permit me to say that in connection with the Liberal League of Utah I am very proud of the results accomplished there, and look upon it as an epoch in the Liberal League movement. It more than meets our most sanguin expectations. And to think that our old friend, H. L. Green, is in the ranks again, and that he has brought with him such a grand army of soldiers. Who says the age of wonders is past? Well, I feel I could keep on writing now I hav got started, but will not impose longer on your time, so wishing you good-speed, I subscribe myself, your brother in the cause,

WALTER WALKER.

CENTRAL CITY, COL., Nov. 15, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of the 12th inst., just read, I see a proposition from friend Dwight, of Florida, regarding the establishment of an orphan's home under Liberal auspices and management by the contribution of ten cents from each Liberal in this country, which meets my hearty approval. Will you please put me down for six shares, one for each member of my family, notwithstanding I am the only Liberal member thereof. My family is nearly grown up, therefore I cannot expect to realize any direct benefit from it, but contribute freely with the hope that the children of some other poor, misunderstood Liberal may be benefited thereby. I find that the path of an outspoken Liberal is a rough one in a community such as this, and through the influences of the merciful and just teachings of Christianity we are liable to need an asylum for our children when we die in poverty, as the church would compel us to if possible. When the proper person is designated to receive funds for the above purpose, I am ready to forward my shares. D. D. LAKE.

LION CITY, MON., Nov. 14, 1881.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I am not a resident of the West—in fact I do not liv not quite as far West as your city; but this much I can say, and firmly believe, that there are a great many in this western world whose minds are not so thickly overshadowed with superstition that no light can penetrate. I find, sir, there are many who try to elevate your paper. I will be more modest, I will subscribe for it, and in my modest way will also try, as we say West, to get a few partners. A good orator seldom blusters. At first a long-standing north-wester seldom commences butt end foremost. And as I've already said, my ways will be modest or mild. To force science will never succeed. Be mild but energetic, form points from the best authority, and stick to them. There's where Mr. Mair failed; his weak repetitions gave you a convert, and an unbiased one.

I hav visited most of the places that are named in the European tour, and can honestly say a more concise and straightforward account could not be given. I hav watched with particular interest THE TRUTH SEEKER, and will conclude to date that I hav ever read any paper that contains so much in so little. I must say this: that most denominations hav a press, and each Sunday those who rent a pew will find a pamphlet—one or more—whose contents are so stale that I hav seen it or them thrown down in disgust and looked at with loathing, much the same as a refined artist would look at a water-color of the Prodigal Son.

I feel interested in "Alamontada"—not the love part, for I know the moral does not rest there. THE TRUTH SEEKER'S columns are not for fiction, but something I am in search of—truth.

Respectfully, R. YEAMON.

PROHIBITION IN KANSAS.

BURLINGTON, KAN., Nov. 21, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: As there has been a great deal said and written in regard to the new liquor law, some telling the immense good it has done, if permitted through your columns, I would like to state the true workings of the law. Probably you hav read what Gov. St. Johns has said, that "there was no liquor sold in Kansas with the exception of some of the large cities," which is as false as false can be. Since the passage of this bill by the last legislature of our state, the law going into effect May 1, 1881, there has been more whisky and beer sold than in the same length of time ever heretofore. To hear the old woman's fanatical society talk about this law a person would be led to believe that there never were any spirituous liquors made, and, if there were, they were sent right into Arkansas and never reached our growing young commonwealth.

Right here I will say that Kansas has, since her admittance into the Union, never had a worse blow to mar her welfare than the new Prohibitory law. In nearly every town the grog shop is open, and in nearly all the counties where prosecutions hav been commenced they hav failed to convict, and the state has had the costs to pay. This law has been plastered on our statute books by a class of people who make their livelihood by keeping the old superstitions alive; and as theology gets too irksome for their weak brains they branch off on a subject that is much more easily handled—temperance. There is not a man of sound mind but who knows that temperance is a good thing. But are the only temperance people on earth church-members? Every Sunday in our churches all that is heard here of late is the "hell-holes of iniquity that are allowed to be run," and yet all this precious flock do to enforce the law is to furnish wind at their houses of worship. They hav no cases commenced against these law-breakers, whereas it is as much their duty as any other citizens. And then the good people who do not indorse the farce are insulted by this pious crowd and called "whiskyites." A few political scabs hav taken hold of this temperance law and talked early and late for it, but it is done for political influence. All of the best newspapers are working hard for its repeal, notwithstanding Mothers De Ju Call, Amanda May, and others are chartering the cause to help the one-idea governor into the United States Senate, but he is left, for we Kansans want a Plumb. In conclusion, Mr. Editor, I will say that there is not a town of one thousand souls in Kansas that has not more or less liquor sold, proving very plainly that "Prohibition does not prohibit."

LAW.

BURLINGTON, KAN., Nov. 28, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I am not ashamed to hav the world know that I am an advocate of those ideas and principles usually denounced by public opinion as humbugs and madness. In fact, I often say to the wiseacres of the church when they are denouncing the reforms of the day that I am an advocate of all modern humbugs, and I consider it will not be out of place to reveal to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that I am opposed to all monopolies of every form, both in church and state. I am opposed to [illegible] railroad monopolies and land aristocracies, and I am opposed to all oppression in every form. What the people need now is education, and that education a common sense one—one under which they can evolute from the quagmires of superstition entailed on them by church and state, for we are willing slaves to both. Our so-called republic is only such in name. We are paying extortionate taxes to support an army of county, state, and national officials, who are binding upon us burdens of debts too grievous to be borne, and, to abridge it, we hav too many officials and too many laws. The church is another unnecessary evil. Think of having sixty-five thousand priests to support, and of half a billion of untaxed church property. The fact is, we lack confidence in our fellow-men, and put our trust in gods, kings, presidents, bishops, and all the dignitaries of church and state; this is all wrong.

O man! in whom we should learn to trust,
Thou hast made thy gods from paltry dust,
And given them attributes, all divine,
And sung and worshiped at their shrine.
Thou hast caused the world to mourn and lament
For the lives thou hast slain in their defense.
The earth has been deluged in human blood
To satisfy the vengeance of an angry god.
Monarchs, kings, bishops, and priests,
Hav vied with each other to establish the cross
In lands where Brahma and Chrishna were adored
For ages before the birth of your lord.

Yours, CHRIS BROWN.

OSCEOLA, IOWA, Nov. 17, 1881,

MR. EDITOR: I see by the Chicago Tribune that Messrs. D. Appleton and Co. hav commenced their contest with the editor of the North American Review because of the publication of the Ingersoll-Black controversy. Let every Liberal put the name of this and all other bigoted firms on his black list and refuse to buy any book bearing their imprint. Fight the devil with fire, is the old saying, and let us all try it once. I think it would also be a good plan for every Liberal to write to the editor of the Review and express their sentiments as to the action of the firm of D. Appleton & Co.

Fraternally yours, CHARLEY W. DIBBLE.

RUSSELLVILLE, TENN., Nov. 15, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: On the 27th of last month I left California for this country, the land of my nativity. Thirty-three years ago, when a young man aged twenty-three, I left this country and my many relativs and migrated West. I left this country on the 7th of October, 1847, and hav lived in California thirty-one years of the time since then. My life during all, or nearly all, of these long years has been one of partial seclusion. I hav kept myself away from psalm-singing and gospel-spouting assemblages. I hav studied the great book of nature, the Freethinker's Bible.

On last Sunday I accompanied one of my sisters to church. It was the first time in thirty years that I had darkened the doors of one of those places. The parson's text was, "God is good." He endeavored to show that God had been very good to Moses and all the old Jews and to the antediluvians, and to the spirits of his children after they are dead. But he utterly forgot, or didn't choose to tell, how mean it was to drown the antediluvians in that big flood after letting them struggle along for ages in ignorance and destitution, living in holes and caves in the earth like wild beasts. Nothing could be more cruel than the advice he gave to his favorit people, to wage war with the neighboring nations who were weaker than themselves, which they did, murdering all the men, children, and married women in the most cruel and barbarous manner, and saving the virgins for the gratification of their barbarous, their cruel, their hellish lust. Think, too, of how, when God made the human race, he instituted a plan to damn nine-tenths of them forever in a burning lake of fire and brimstone. And so on to the end of this rotten system.

My greatest desire is to do all that I possibly can to free my relativs and friends in this country from the fetters of theology. I shall do all I can for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Orthodoxy has a strong hold on the people here, but I can plainly see that its power has greatly decreased since I left here thirty-three years ago.

I remain your colleague and brother in the great fight for mental freedom, WM. L. WARLEY.

WEST BELLEVILLE, ILL., Nov. 14, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: You will find inclosed $3. I hav been longer in renewing and paying for my subscription than I expected to be, but circumstances over which I had no control were what prevented me from sending sooner. In the first place I was sick for some time and could not work, and in the second place after I got well and started to work I had only worked two days when my brother got his leg broken in two places and his collar-bone broken by a fall of coal in the mines, and I hav to stay at home to attend to him.

Now, Mr. Editor, do you not think that God had a hand in that business? kinder inspired the coal to fall, you know, for he's always playing some monkey pranks on us unsuspecting, innocent men? If it was not for the fact that he plays pranks on Christians as well as Infidels, I would think that he did it as a chastisment for our ungodliness. But when I think of the universal prayer test offered up in behalf of Garfield, I'm obliged to conclude that such things happen because God has not yet evoluted out of monkeydom or monkeyism. When God gets all of the monkey out of him by evolution, and becomes a full-grown, civilized man, he will quit all his dirty, low-lived tricks. He will not then kill any more Presidents, send no more Bennetts or Heywoods to prison for opinion's sake; no longer will he deny to Bradlaugh his seat in Parliament to which he has been elected; burn no more heretics or witches; in short, he will cease his persecution.

Yours for truth and justice, ED. MOODY.

FREDERICKSBURG, IOWA, NOV. 20, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I see by the tab on my paper the time is up, and that I should remit. You will find inclosed money order of $2. Please giv me credit for the same. I cannot do without the paper, it keeps me posted, so that I feel able to meet the Godites, and then Bennett's letters are worth five times the price of the paper.

Diphtheria is raging here, and we can't get a praying man or woman to come here to help take care of the sick. They stand back in holy horror and say if we go we shall get the same disease, and we would all die with it. They are afraid to meet their God, and the ones that come forward and take care of the sick are the very ones that the churches call Infidels that don't fear God, man, or the devil.

Yours for liberty, H. B. CARPENTER.

CORVALLIS, OR., NOV. 1, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I am fifty-two years old this month, and never heard a lecture by a man who knew the truth and wasn't afraid to tell it until last week, when Dr. York, of California, came around to our town and delivered two of his famous lectures, which I hope will be a benefit to people yet unborn. He found our town as full of Freethinkers as God found the cities of the plains of Sodomites and (to him) Liberals as plenty as righteous men in Sodom. He found me first, center, and last. I rented the hall and paid all the expenses of the lecture, which were over $20, and I rejoice over it as the best investment I hav made in Oregon, while those I thought I could depend upon because they were Freethinkers slunk away for fear it might cost them a nickel. Yet curiosity drew quite a crowd, who rushed in for a free lunch. Numbers of church-members who soon cowered and slunk when they heard that Jesus never lived and the devil was dead. Hurrah for hell, and Liberals to the front! I want a few copies of the "Crimes of Preachers," Darwin's "Descent of Man," and some of those colored posters.

N. B.—I hav money left for the next man who dares to tell the truth. Yours truly,

B. F. HYLAND.

SO. DARTMOUTH, MASS., NOV. 21, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of last week a correspondent from Seneca, Iowa, inquired if any of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER knew of a cure for nasal catarrh? I would say that I hav known of several cases of that complaint cured by the use of Dr. N. Bryant's catarrh snuff. It is prepared in wooden boxes by Dr. N. Bryant, Natick, Mass. Send your order by mail, and I doubt not the article will reach you in the same manner. The last box which I procured cost me thirty-five cents.

Yours truly, H. BARTLETT.

A LUSUS NATURÆ.

OSCEOLA, IOWA, NOV. 15, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: There is in Missouri an infant town but fifteen months old, and a population of, it may be, three hundred, with no gods, devils, spooks, saloons, or (I had almost said) Christians, but of the latter a few insinuating rogues had crept in under false pretenses. As the Theban band fought the barbarians of a former day, so this band of Liberals of to-day are opposed to the uncivilized Christians around them. An overwhelming majority of Liberals in any locality is a novelty, and the futil efforts of Christians to boss or to outdo this little community is amusing and instructiv. This infant colony will grow vigorously. A torch to light its dim surroundings, an oasis in a moral desert, it must and ought to thrive. In the near future southern Missouri will be proud of its pioneers in progress, and Christianity, when its opposition shall prove futil, will try to share the merit of founding the new enlightened colony called Liberal, Barton county, Missouri. A few of its advantages are: a neat public hall to talk sense in instead of a church for nonsense, a good soil, cheap land, genial climate, medicinal waters, plenty of coal, on a railway, good market, and, to crown all, good society.

Inclosed is post-office order for $1 for THE TRUTH SEEKER to March 1, 1882. F. J. EMARY.

CINCINNATI, O., NOV. 18, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Knowing you to be the outspoken advocate for the suppression of all pious shams and superstitions in general, I believe the time has come when a bold and truthful statement should be made to the world, which is this, that religions of all kinds are the outcome of either knavery or insanity. Let any one of these systems be sifted down to its very root, let the light of truth and reason shine thereon and penetrate its deepest recesses, then can be clearly seen its false and deceitful deformities and its corrupt principles. Whatever system is constructed on a basis of falsehood ought never to be respected or sustained. Whoever goes back to the origin of these systems can clearly discover that the whole business is nothing but a tissue of fraud on the one hand, and extreme gullibility on the other. Place any one of these systems on the plane of honest, legal proof and none of them hath one peg to hang a truth on. Take the old Jew-book, closely investigate its pages, and very soon can be distinctly seen that it is a monstrous compilation of intolerant priestcraft for no other motiv than to enslave mankind and make him the tool of arrogant assumption. Sir, the coming man who will bravely and boldly beard this corrupt hydra and expose its pretensions deserves well of his country, which is the world.

These priestly systems are a widespread treason against the liberty of man, and should not be treated lightly or with indifference. They hav for ages ruled with sword and flame, and to-day they detest the man who fearlessly utters his honest opinion, which casts its beams of light upon their dark and mystic deceits. It is time the long sway of priestly arrogance and self-constituted authority should experience a great reverse instead of riding rough-shod on the necks of the people. The people should, without delay, emancipate themselvs from the galling yoke of theological serfdom and join the brave army of Liberal Freethinkers.

Let the bondsmen of church domination be for ever free. Then, and not till then, will this beautiful world be valued and, above everything else, appreciated. Then will go forth from every seat of learning the true intellectual thought and wisdom which is ever the result of unshackled minds.

Freedom of thought is the grand highway to the highest order of civilization. This should be the sublime condition of the masses. Every people and clime should feel its benign effects and gladden their hearts with freedom's joy and solid happiness for this, their present and only life. Abrogate forever the dreams, fables, hobbies, and fulsome nonsense peculiar to superstitious ignorance, with all its creeds and dogmas, and frown down the idle drones who sponge on the credulity of the world. Away with the dull and insipid monotony of monasticism, which, more or less, pervades all kinds of religion, and hasten in the good time of general cheer to chase all gloom and sadness from this lovely planet of eternal duration. Let wisdom shine on every hand and bow to nothing but human right and equal justice. The idiots of past ignorance must become extinct, and the present superstitions must giv place to reason, the only true guide of the world. When these glorious changes dawn on humanity faith in man will be the rule, and the outcome will be general friendliness, brotherly kindness, and every charm that human wisdom and enlightened civilization can possibly devise and inaugurate. This world is a paradise. When truth and love rule the multitudes every phase of idolatry should cease, and the priests of all these systems of idolized gods should cease their babble and not deceive the people by misleading them and filling their minds with that of which they know nothing. It is no less idolatry to worship an imaginary deity in the air than on the earth or the ocean; it is all a phantom—a deceptiv shadow that vanisheth forever at the moment of death. Solidity for this life is sound sense; faith in another life is nonsense. The theological driveler knows this, but he still imposes on ignorance for filthy lucre. T. WINTER.

UNIONTOWN, KANSAS, NOV. 10, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I am a new subscriber to your paper, but it has created great enthusiasm in this little village of Uniontown, where a Methodist church is being erected at the expense of the poor class of people. The money was raised by subscription, and it has caused many a poor child to suffer for bread and meat and stop at home from school for the want of shoes to wear. Please find inclosed $1. I want my name in the Round-the-World list.

Yours for ever, ROBERT DYER.

APPLE RIVER, ILL., NOV. 14, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: It has been several months since I hav written anything in the way of a letter for your paper, and I would not now ask for space to say a few words through its columns in behalf of Infidelity did I not feel deeply interested and imbued with the grand truths and principles of this subject, which your paper so fearlessly and nobly advocates.

I hav been a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER since last March, and must say that never before from any other paper hav I derived such desired information and comfort as from reading THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am proud to be a subscriber to such a paper, and am exceedingly glad to think that we hav in this country such a grand and fearless organ in the advocation of truth, liberty, justice, and morality.

At first thought, to some readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER the question may arise, "Why has THE TRUTH SEEKER not a larger subscription?" But a moment's reflection will readily answer this: It is because of the widespread popularity and influence of Christianity; it is because the people hav not yet freed themselvs from the clutch of it and are still being blinded and misled into the belief and practice of improbable and rational things by gross lies and misrepresentation of the truth by avaricious and hypocritical priests. In this way of being mystified their moral conception of what is right or what is wrong, what is true or what is false, is terribly impaired, and in this state of mind they are unable to conceive, much less believe, anything that pertains to natural laws and facts.

Many Christians seem to think that their religion is the only religion because it is the popular belief. We Infidels, who can read the signs of the times, are perfectly willing that they should think so, especially since the last decade, when we come to note the rapid decline of Christianity both in power and popularity; and in spite of all its strenuous and greedy efforts to still maintain its own it has lost ground, and, like a huge oak beginning to die, its life already receding toward its center, with many of its branches leafless and almost lifeless, its life is destined to a speedy end.

The Infidels and Liberals of America owe much thanks and praise for the grand and heroic work which has been wrought for the advancement of Infidelity and the Liberal cause within the last decade to such men as R. G. Ingersoll, D. M. Bennett, Wright, Bell, Underwood, and Wakeman, and many others equally as worthy of mention.

In my opinion, although the past ten years hav been fruitful years for Infidelity and Liberalism, the next ten will prove far more abundant, because we are just now in a position by which we may expect and which we surely will realize big gains.

We hav now quite a thrifty Liberal fraternity in this country, and one which is being almost daily strengthened by the accession of many from the Christian pulpits into activ Infidel workers and reformers. With such encouraging conversions and support from the ranks of Christianity, together with the growing, independent intelligence in the minds of the people to do their own thinking upon matters of religion, irrespectiv of Bible or creeds, and aided on by our great Infidels to the falsity and absurdity of the Bible, we hav nearly all the indications that could be wished for for the rapid advancement and ultimate success of Infidelity.

As far as the intellectual and moral part is concerned we hav all that could constitute a noble cause, but we need a much larger fraternity. We need more men to advocate the cause among the people. We need a freer circulation of Infidel literature. We need more workers and less lookers-on. We need more men who are not afraid to advocate Infidelity, and who are not ashamed to own it any place. All this is true, but we must not expect too much too soon, because our cause is just now getting a good start and a position whereby it will soon be able to do much.

We, as Infidels and Liberals, hav little to fear in the future, while we hav much to be joyous over in the grand prospects spread out before us. We are proud of our belief, but not bigoted or intolerant with our Christian friends who differ with us. We are perfectly willing that every one should hav the same right to their opinions that we claim for ourselvs. This one principle is the humanity of Infidelity, and the practice of which is doing something to Liberalize the world and make it wiser and better, and which, together with activ Freethought and work upon matters of religion, is sure to be the savior of the world.

So let us, as Infidels and Liberals, be tolerant and Liberal; let us be kind and just, and lovers and seekers after truth, and abhorrers and denouncers of falsehood and hypocrisy. Let us not be selfish of our belief, nor afraid to circulate our books and papers among those over whom we think they will hav an influence, and by so doing we will spread the light of truth and science, and free humanity.

Yours fraternally, E. INGERSOLL.

CANTON, ILL., NOV. 26, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: There was something said at the Chicago Liberal League Congress about organizing a lecture bureau. We suggest that a good plan would be to put the question to every Liberal outside of the Liberal League as well as in, What will you giv a year to support (your church) the Liberal cause on condition that you are to hav at least four courses of Liberal lectures within a year in your own town or place of business? I will giv $12 on the above conditions for one year. I am,

Yours truly, JOHN W. ABBOTT.

A Sun-Worshiper's Thanksgiving Hymn.

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

Thou rulest here, O Sol, supreme;
Thou causest day and night;
Thou art the great eternal spring
Of motion, heat, and light.

Yea, all sensation, strength, and thought
Alone in thee find source;
In nature's moves on earth thou art
The great propelling force;

Thou dost man's destinies control;
Thou formest every flower:
We recognize in thee the great
And all-sufficient power.

Mankind, in death and nothingness,
Without thee would be lost;
All beauty, love, and life would sink
In one long night of frost.

Millions of ages thou hast shone,
The truths of science show,
And prove 'tis false, that thou wast made
Six thousand years ago.

Though lies are said of thee and bred
By ignorance of old,
Thy rage moves not at puny tales
By petty pigmies told.

Instead of pouring out thy wrath
Thou blessest man each day,
While in grandeur, strength, and greatness
Thou rollest on thy way.

We see the ancient myths expire—
Gods made by human skill,
Not one transcends thy potencies,
For thou art shining still;

And thy warm sunshine gives us life,
We know most certainly.
Our praises then and thanks belong
Most rightfully to thee.

We thank thee, then, for clothes and food,
For crops, for wood, and coal,
But for our lovely maids and wives
The most of all, O Sol.

Then hail, all hail, to thee, O Sol!
To thee we bend the knee;
We shall, for all we hav and are,
Giv thanks to only thee.

WRITTEN ON READING INGERSOLL'S REPLY TO BLACK.

BY R. F. S.

Now, Christians, forward! Do not fail
To try and answer back;
But you will want an abler man
Than this "policeman" Black.

This Ingersoll with wit and lore
Is bringing minds to rack.
In such a plight we need more light
Than can be shed by Black.

You are so numerous and so wise
That champions cannot lack.
You ought to send, you may depend,
A better man than Black.

Don't send a weakling to the front
When you again attack,
Nor will you need a fertil Weed
That does not equal Black.

No feeble souls are wanted now,
Who make a constant quack.
Or still again, Van Bockelin, [1]
Succeed the vanquished Black.

You may think this a childish game,
Requiring little knack;
That you can bring a fancy Swing,
And push us off with Black.

But if you want to "hold the fort,"
And keep your narrow track,
We do advise, it would be Wise
To trust no more to Black.

WHAT OBJECTIONS TO

THE

Bennett-Mair Discussion.

BETWEEN

D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.

(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founded upon the doctrin and authority of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progress and improvement.

8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which mankind are capable of receiving.

Sixteen Saviors or None.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

Being a reply to John T. Perry's "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examins all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other, and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and themselvs, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. OPEN LETTER

TO

Anthony Comstock

In Answer to His Open Letter Sent to Newspapers.

465 FULTON ST., BROOKLYN,

SIR: I hav before me a seven-paged open letter, addressed to myself, intended for publication in all the evening and morning papers, copies of which, I am prepared to prove, were sent to every daily and several weekly papers, the publishers of which refused to publish it, consigning the precious product of your labors to the waste paper basket. For this I am truly sorry, as it would hav given me an admirable opportunity to show the public the true inwardness of the man who could pen such a letter, and yet claim to be a Christian and a protector of the public from the vicious members of society. A more vicious letter could not be penned, and the evidence of malice crops out in every sentence You first claim that the courts honorably acquitted you. If they did, then I know nothing of the words honorable acquittal. You were arrested for publishing a malicious libel, and taken in the charge of an officer before the magistrates. You then waived examination. If you had written truthfully, why were you afraid of examination? I was present in the court to confront you on your vile charge. You were silent.

After the lapse of several weeks I received an order from Judge Smith's court to attend such court respecting my charge against you, and believing that you would submit to an examination and giv some excuse for your act, I went, accompanied by over fifty witnesses, so that a special court had to be set aside for my special case against you. Well, let us examin as to what followed. I stood there without counsel, ready to defend my order of arrest. I was strong in the proof of my charge against you, and did not require an attorney to quibble on points of law. You, on the other hand, had an attorney—a man in whom any person may trust their case as a legal adviser, and outside the law I hav reason to know that Mr. Tenney, your solicitor, is a gentleman and a noble-hearted man. He must hav felt seriously the weakness of your case, as set forth in your libelous letter, and therefore, as an act of charity toward you, advised you not to submit to an examination. He, good fellow, by special pleading, decided to take exception on points of law, and attempted to show that not the spirit and intent of your libelous letter should be gone into, but the actual wording only should be considered, and that therefore the same should be adjudged as a privileged communication, and on this ground pleaded for a dismissal. This I objected to, whereupon your solicitor proposed that a brief be prepared, setting forth the reasons why my complaint against you should be dismissed. I then stated in the presence of that court, that all I required was a full investigation into the facts. It was then arranged that the District Attorney should take charge of the case, as prosecuting counsel, on behalf of the people against Anthony Comstock, I being promised at that time that such investigation should be made on the following Wednesday. But, feeling that there was some crooked business going on, and an attempt being made to frustrate justice, I employed one of our best attorneys, and he wrote a letter to the Judge, to the District Attorney, and your attorney for copy or nature of such brief. Not only so, but myself and attorney applied at Jefferson Market Police Court next day, and we were told that Justice Solon Smith had gone into the country, and would not be back until Monday following, the court officer to whom we spoke intimating that as the Comstock case was in the hands of Justice Solon Smith, nothing would be done until his return. Picture, therefore, my astonishment upon receiving a notice from the court that the case had been dismissed without an investigation into the facts which led to the writing of your letter, neither myself nor one of my witnesses being called, and yet you hav in your letter the audacity to tell the public that you were honorably acquitted. May heaven save the public when such honorable acquittals shall follow the publication of such vile letters as that penned by you to hundreds of my patients! So much for your "honorable acquittal." Now, as to your having evaded arrest or not, the facts are these: I did not dream of having you arrested until after I had written my letter to you, which appeared in all the newspapers. I called at your office personally three or four times, as did also my half-brother, David Cotter. We were each told by persons in your office that you had gone into the country, and would not be back for a week; but on being told by persons on Nassau street that you were seen in the immediate neighborhood not long after my calling, I felt that you were evading me, and deliberately refusing to giv me the names of those whom you pretended had made statements against me. It was your thus evading me which caused me to take criminal proceedings against you, and forthwith instruct counsel to sue out a warrant against you for criminal libel. After such warrant was in the hands of the officer, such officer and several of my witnesses sought you at your office. They were told by persons in your office that you had gone into the country, as I had before been told. On the morning of your arrest my half-brother, David Cotter, called at your office, in response to a telegram received by me. He was then told that you were away in the country. He went straight from your office to that of Howe & Hummel, and there met a private detectiv who offered there and then to disclose the whereabouts of Anthony Comstock, if the $100 reward, which I had offered for his arrest, should be given him. This was promised, and David Cotter then went and apprised the officer who held the warrant, and they went in company to your office, when they were jointly told by persons sitting there that you were away and they did not know when you would return; whereupon the officer, acting upon the information given by the detectiv above named, proceeded to a room in the upper part of the building wherein several voices were heard. The door was opened in response to the knocking of the officer, when a number of gentlemen were seen sitting around a table as if in committee. Anthony Comstock was inquired for, and denied being there. Upon retiring voices were heard in a room close by. Inquiry was made if Anthony Comstock was within. The person who opened the door replied that Anthony Comstock was not there, when the door was closed. My half-brother, who was waiting in the lobby, made a ruse as if running down stairs, the officer, all the time standing outside, beside the door. The same person who had before opened the door opened it again. The officer, by a rapid movement of the foot, kept the door open and then walked in and arrested yourself, Anthony Comstock. If this was not hiding from arrest, I fail to understand what hiding means, and as you hav in your open letter mentioned the fact of my having offered one hundred dollars reward, and that I had refused to pay the person giving the information, I beg leave here to state that the hundred dollars was paid to the detectiv in the presence of several witnesses, one of whom was a merchant and manufacturer in your immediate neighborhood of Nassau street. So much for your arrest. Was it with or without evasion?

Now, as to the next portion of your open letter: You say there is a law prohibiting the transmission of letters and circulars concerning schemes to deceive and defraud the public or obtain money by false pretenses through the mails. You knew very well when you were writing that sentence that it had no application whatever to my case, inasmuch as the following open letter to the physicians of Brooklyn was before you, offering every physician or scientific man a free entry into my factory and consulting rooms, and in the same letter offering five thousand dollars' worth of my goods to the poor of Brooklyn. Why did you not avail yourself of the offer and hav called at my consulting rooms and manufactory for inquiry before writing your libelous letter to the hundreds of my patients? You could hav no excuse as to time and place, for this reason, viz., that my establishment is one of the most prominent in Brooklyn, and in close proximity to your own residence, so that nothing but malice aforethought could hav induced you to hav written such a letter, while the following offer to the physicians of Brooklyn was before you in the circular or pamphlet from which you obtained the names of my patients to whom you wrote. If you wish to excuse yourself re-read the following:

WM. WILSON'S OPEN LETTER

To the Physicians and the Commissioners of Charities of the City of Brooklyn.

GENTLEMEN—Two years ago in Europe I invented and patented a magnetic appliance for the relief and cure of disease. My system is one that was never before attempted, but its simplicity places it among the many great improvements in the history of science which, after its inception, has caused thousands to wonder why so valuable an additiou to the necessities of our race should hav been so long overlooked.

The success of my appliances in the cure of disease in England was such that over THIRTY THOUSAND persons were clothed in them, and not one case of failure when the proper appliances were worn as recommended. In the face of such success in Europe, I determined that the people of America should be made acquainted with the fact. I arrived in Brooklyn only a few months ago and commenced the sale of my goods at No. 465 Fulton street, since which time I hav, in Brooklyn and neighborhood, over a THOUSAND persons wearing my appliances for the diseases above mentioned—all of whom came to me only as a last resort, having failed to get relief from any of their physicians. And these persons were as readily relieved as were those of Europe—NINETY-NINE PER CENT of whom will tell you to-day on application to them that my appliances gave time all the relief promised. A printed list of my clients is at your disposal so that you may satisfi yourself of the truth of the above statement. My proposition therefore is that I hand over to the medical men of Brooklyn FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS' worth of my appliances, to be used only on the persons of the sick poor now and likely to be in your charitable institutions and hospitals. The only condition I make is that I myself clothe the patients according to my own judgment and be allowed to retain watchers at my own expense that the patients do not receive any medicin during the wearing of my appliances, and that a proper report be supplied from time to time, so that I, at my own expense, can publish the record of the cures by my appliances. I further wish that every medical man in Brooklyn should call at my manufactory and examin for himself the processes of manufacture and make himself thoroughly acquainted with my system. My factory is open for inspection at all hours to any physician, chemist, or scientist, and in close proximity to my own business premises the same physicians may see for themselvs the patients who hav been relieved by my appliances. All physicians and chemists who hav examined my goods hav availed themselvs of my invention, are to-day wearing my appliances, and recommending the same to their patients with marked success.

The aforesaid gift of FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS' worth of goods will be delivered from time to time, as agreed upon by a committee of yourselvs, on application to me a few days in advance, stating the disease for which they are required, so that I can supply the best possible form of my invention. Hoping you will avail yourselvs of my offer, I remain, gentlemen, Yours obediently,

WILLIAM WILSON.
No. 465 Fulton st., Brooklyn.

In face of the above letter, what pretense can you find for your conduct? Why did you not giv me the names of the parties whom you pretended had written to you? The fact is, no one did write to you except a lot of conspiring doctors, and to please them you became their tool.

In the next part of your open letter you refer to a letter you sent me, and say as follows: "Why did you, like Ananias and Sapphira of old, keep back a part; why did you not tell the public that I wrote you personally on the 15th of September?" Your memory must be very bad in this particular, or you did not read the newspapers, inasmuch that this paragraph appeared in the Truth newspaper on September 20th, under the caption of "The Romance of Anthony Comstock's Arrest, and what Led to It," and directly following the $100 reward, I refer to the very letter which you say I never noticed:

"And the next morning I received a cringing letter, written after the reward was offered, as shown by the postal date on the envelope, Brooklyn postmark, 2 A. M., September 16. Now I was told in his office on the 15th of September, at two in the afternoon, that he had gone away for a week. Who told the lie? Did he order his subordinates so to do, or did they do so of their own accord? The next day, September 16th, my half brother, David Cotter, with the detectivs and the court officer, went to Comstock's office. They were told that he was in the country, and did not know when he would return. They were then told that a letter was written by Comstock to William Wilson the night previous. At this the clerks seemed surprised, and said, 'Well, we do not know where he is, nor when he will return.'

"A private detectiv then told my half brother where to find him, and said he was hid away in an upper room in the same building. There the officers went, knocking at one door where voices were heard within, but the door was locked. Then in another room adjacent an attempt was made to discover him among a company of gentlemen sitting apparently in committee, but Comstock could not be seen. A ruse of running down stairs was made, only to retrace their steps just in time to find the door gently open that had before been tried and found locked. The officer slipped his foot between the door jamb and, walking into the room, arrested the great Anthony Comstock. He was taken before Justice Smith and committed in the following words of committal:

"'It appearing to me by the within depositions and statements that the crime therein mentioned has been committed, and that there is sufficient cause to believe the within-named Anthony Comstock guilty thereof, I order that he be held to answer and be admitted to bail in the sum of five hundred dollars, and be committed to the warden or keeper of the city prison of the city of New York until he givs such bail. SOLON B. SMITH,

"'Police Justice.

"'Dated September 16, 1881.'"

You will therefore see, on referring to your open letter, that you admit that my first public communication against your act was printed on the 14th day of Sept., and yet you charge me with being like Ananias and Sapphira of old, by keeping back a part. How could I mention, in my communication of the 14th, that which was not written by you until the 15th? But you know very well that the letter you refer to as having been kept back was referred to as above on the 20th day of September, that being the first letter from myself after receiving the letter written by you on the 15th. You therefore utterly fail to show in your open letter that I had kept anything back. In the same open letter you refer to a lawsuit in Ireland between Wetton & Co., and William Wilson, of No. 64½ Patrick street, Cork, and the most malicious act that any man could conceive is the taking the trouble of writing to Ireland for information respecting a man, and when such information is received, telling one-half the story in a open letter to the public and keeping back the other half. This you know you hav done, and I challenge you to publish at your own cost your open letter, as I at my own cost shall publish this. Your malicious act in thus concealing the real nature of the lawsuit between Wetton and myself as rival manufacturers and large employers of labor is an act unworthy of the commonest informer. I hav a deed from the British government wherein, on the settlement of that suit as above referred to, such deed binds my opponents to pay me a large sum of money in settlement thereof. Your attorney, Mr. Tenney, or Mr. Colgate, your President, can see that deed whenever they choose to call at my offices. Yet you, in your open letter, attempted to show that I had been guilty of a crime. If this was not vindictiv malice, what was it? Again, in the same open letter, you would insinuate that my patent and Edgar Wetton's were the same. Yet you know very well that the circular from which you obtained the names of my patients contains also the following description of my patent:

"During the past few years seven or eight different patents hav been taken out for Electric and Magnetic Belts, but the vital defect in each and all of them has been a want of means whereby the magnetism once imparted to them could be retained. This defect has been fully overcome in the 'Wilsonia' invention. William Wilson struck the happy idea of attaching a series of Voltaic Piles to the Magnets, which by absorbing the natural exudations of the skin giv out a constant galvanic current, and thus keep up a continuous supply of Magnetism. Another very important feature of the 'Wilsonia' invention is this. Wearers of these garments never experience unpleasant shocks and are never afflicted with sores, which inevitably result from wearing galvanic chain bands—they having to be steeped in vinegar to render them capable of imparting any curativ property, and in this process they become the mother of an incurable form of erysipelas! And then, the 'Wilsonia' is as comfortable to wear as any undergarment. These appliances keep the body warm in the cold season, and, by their power of absorption, impart, in the summer, a refreshing coolness."

Also the Method of Manufacture.

"Wilsonia" Magnetic Clothing;

These goods are made as explained below, and every person following out the instructions here given can make for themselvs and their own wearing any garments to suit their malady.

Although I hav patented the invention, I giv any one the liberty to make for themselvs, but shall prosecute any one who dares to make them for others to wear, or to sell.

Process of Manufacture.

Take a sheet of cloth, or any woven fabric, lay it upon another sheet of gutta percha tissue, then lay a sheet of muslin corresponding in size; fasten these together. Then take hard steel plates (brittle as glass they need be for our purpose), cut them into narrow strips about one and a half inches long; perforate each plate, making a hole large enough to take in an an ordinary shoe eyelet. These plates to the number of 250, with 500 eyelets, fastened to the cloth, are sufficient to make an ordinary NERVE INVIGORATOR. Over these plates, when fastened to the fabric, we place another sheet of India rubber tissue. Over this again we place another sheet of muslin and fasten the whole mass together with hot irons. We then puncture the eyelets the whole thickness of the fabric so fastened together, having about five hundred openings through the garments. Then we cover the whole with a lining of any material to suit the fancy of the wearer, but preferably canton flannel should be used. When the garment is so far finished it is magnetized by a powerful electro magnet until every plate of the whole series is thoroughly saturated with magnetism.

Having described the process as above, I again say that if you make the garments as I direct they will do you just as much good as though I made them myself. But the above being my patent, I shall prosecute any one who dares to make them for profit, and shall use the utmost rigor of the law in so prosecuting.

Now, then, where comes in quackery with with the "WILSONIA?" Why do not the advertisers of quack nostrums tell purchasers how to make their compounds?

Now, as to Prof. White's great discovery: He told us a few weeks ago, through the columns of the New York Herald, that he had made a marvelous discovery, viz., that the whole secret of the electric charge in the Gymnotus, or electric eel, lay wholly in the fact that the said electric ell was enveloped in a film, whereby its electric charge was augmented. This marvelous discovery, he said, was only made after six and three-quarter years of fruitless research, and by an accident, he goes on to say, the whole thing was made complete.

Now it will be seen from reading the above formula, that WILLIAM WILSON'S patent was taken out two and a half years before Professor White made his statement through the columns of the Herald.

It is upon the Gutta Percha Film patented by MR. WILSON, that the secret of the "WILSONIA'S" force wholly lies.

Physicians, electricians, and scientists are, therefore, invited to examin critically into the nature of the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING, and, with the formula before them, go into their laboratories and experiment for themselvs. They will then know that the

WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING

Is the Greatest Wonder of the Age, and yet withal one of the most Simple of Inventions

In the same open letter which you sent to the newspapers you malliciously attempt to belittle me by assuming, that, because I had been a cabinetmaker, I could not therefore attain to a knowledge of curativ agencies distinct from the methods laid down by the schools. In answer to this assumption of yours, I can only say that I pity you for your stupidity. Do you not know that the celebrated Dr. John Hunter of London worked at the bench as a cabinetmaker at forty-two years of age, and afterward became the most eminent surgeon in Europe? and to-day the Hunterian Museum in London is a living monument of that cabinetmaker's skill? Do you not also know that all great inventions ever made emanate from among those whom we least suspect as the originators of new thought?

Another important reference in your open letter I refer to: On a board sign you say as follows: "Read the Anthony Comstock letters in favor of 'Wilsonia.'" In answer to which I simply say that I hav the copies of fifty-five letters sent to you in favor of my garments, the parties sending such letters being those to whom you had conveyed your libelous communication. Therefore I call these letters of my patients the Anthony Comstock letters, and shall continue to publish them in a pamphlet dedicated to the Young Men's Christian Association of Brooklyn and New York; nor you nor your society shall intimidate me against such publication. Nothing shall be hidden nor held back. In conclusion, I again make the following challenge to you: To sign bonds for $5,000 if you can prove that I do not cure ninety per cent of the incurables given over by the doctors, or to produce one case where all the benefit was was not derived as promised on the purchase of the goods, such goods being worn as directed as to quantity and to time. I believe your society requires money to carry on its operations; here, therefore, is a chance to add to its funds. I will also sign bonds for a like sum if you can show one testimonial published by me that was not genuin, and will pay all expenses of the six physicians on whom you relied, and will meet them singly or as a body on any platform in the United States, and prove to an audience of scientists that these physicians know nothing of the nature of nerve fluid, the constitution of the blood, nor the difference between electricity and magnetism as a curativ agent. WILLIAM WILSON.

Having thus openly answered your letter, and wishing the whole thing to be closed up, I herewith make you this offer, viz: That you shall, upon the examination of the deeds referred to in my letter as above, between your attorney and Mr. Colgate, upon the conclusion of such investigation, giv me a letter of apology for having been instrumental in casting discredit upon my invention. I am quite willing to accept your plea of ignorance of the facts, and that you were deceived by others.

Upon receipt of such letter of apology, I will withdraw all further proceedings. WILLIAM WILSON.

Important to the Suffering and Afflicted Who Hav Been Deceived by Advertising Nostrum Venders.

The great success attending the introduction of my world-famed WILSONIA GARMENTS has incited a host of speculators to place upon the market several bogus arrangements under the specious titles of "Magnetic Clothing" or "Magnetic Garments." One unprincipled person has actually copied my engraving representing my clothing, so that a person not seeing the garments would take it for granted that the goods so advertised were facsimiles of the WILSONIA, the engravings representing the clothing being identical with those issued by myself thus tending to defraud the public by their purchasing a worthless article for the cure of some malady or other. This same person has copied, almost verbatim, the language of my own circulars. One of these garments was brought me direct from the vender. I find it to be a clumsy imitation of the first magnetic garments made in Europe some fifteen years ago. I would therefore ask the public to see the Wilsonia garments before purchasing anything represented as a magnetic clothing. They will then find that an attempt at imitation has been made by an engraved circular containing copies of my own circular as above stated, and so cunningly has the device been carried out that parties purchasing the goods from such circular will suppose that the garments so purchased were identical with my own, but when seen together they are as different as anything can possibly be conceived. If, however, persons will call at any of our STORES in New York or Brooklyn, or elsewhere in the United States where Wilsonia depots are opened, they may hav everything made clear to them. The claim of CHEAPNESS is a poor point to put forward when the matter of disease and life and death is in the balance. My reputation now is so unparalleled that never before in the history of the world hav such remarkable cures been effected as those following the timely use of the now world-renowned Wilsonia garments. The blind hav been made to see, the deaf to hear, the helpless paralytic to walk erect, the demented to become sane, the martyr to catarrh and asthma to speak and breathe freely, the terrified with heart disease to walk forward among the public without the terror of impending death. All and every form of disease disappear when the Wilsonia Magnetic Garments are used as directed. I will undertake to cure 90 per cent of the so-called incurables now in the hospitals in the United States, and will place my garments upon such patients free of charge, the only condition I make being that the authorities governing such hospitals shall not allow any medicin to be given the patients during the wearing of my garments, and that the cures shall be publicly advertised as soon as made. CITIZENS OF AMERICA! when and where in the history of the world has such an offer as this been made? Here, in New York and Brooklyn alone, there are thousands of poor invalids in our hospitals passing through the ordeal of a protracted and living death who might, if my offer be accepted, be restored to the world as useful members of society, and this free of charge. If my offer be not accepted by the physicians of the hospitals, then the physicians must stand convicted of indifference and carelessness toward the poor invalids intrusted to their care. I hav sold my patent to a company with a view of manufacturing on a very large scale, so that with increased facilities in the form of valuable machinery specially prepared for our purposes, we shall be able to place upon the market an unlimited supply of these wonderfully curativ appliances.

After years of study in the particular direction of electrical therapeutics, I hav from time to time made many improvements on my first conception of what was needed for the relief and cure of disease until the "Wilsonia" in its present form contains all the elements of what has gone before in the same direction. The continuity of current is made complete, the dangers of non-ventilation are entirely overcome. This is an important point in the "Wilsonia." Thousands of persons are to-day suffering from the effects of retarded perspiration, having had thrown back into the organism the poisonous emanations of the body. The expansiv nature of the "Wilsonia" combination in all its entirety makes the price somewhat high, but yet it is far the cheapest in the end, inasmuch as the curativ force will continue for years, although a commoner kind will frequently result in marvelous cures. These commoner goods we sell at the following prices:

"DESIGN" iN NATURE.

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

Gems of Thought.

WHEN reason, judgment, and experience decide that an act is wrong, no matter how pleasurable to us this act may be, we should refrain from it and turn our longings, desires, and even thoughts, into another channel. To giv way to wishes and passions for momentary enjoyment is weak and childlike. With the growth of reason and judgment should follow that of well-doing.—Elmina Drake Slenker.

ON every side in all social phenomena in the education of children, in the tone and spirit of literature, in the forms and usages of life; nay, even in the proceedings of legislatures, in the history of statute books, and in the decisions of magistrates, we find manifold proofs of that women are gradually making their way and slowly but surely winning for themselvs a position superior to any that they hav hitherto attained. This is one of the many peculiarities which distinguish modern civilization and which show how essentially the most advanced countries are different from those that formerly flourished.—Buckle's Essays.

WHATEVER the imperfections of the revised version may be, still it must be admitted the revision is a good work accomplished. It will at least awaken thought and stimulate inquiry in quarters in which these hav been too apt to slumber. It breaks the shell which the old authorized version had thrown over the religious world, or at least the English Protestant part of it. People will no longer look upon the English Bible, chapter heads and italics included, as if it had been dropped from heaven just as it is; and perhaps it will be more easy than it was to get a truth of modern science into the heads of ordinary religious people, even in the face of apparent difficulty arising on the side of the Bible. This will be a gain to the cause of truth and reason which all truthful and reasonable men will be glad to see.—Rev. G. Vance Smith.

IT is impossible to calculate the moral mischief, if I may so express it, that mental lying has produced in society. When a man has so far corrupted and prostituted the chastity of his mind as to subscribe his professional belief to things he does not believe, he has prepared himself for the commission of every other crime. He takes up the trade of priest for the sake of gain, and, in order to qualify himself for that trade, he begins with perjury. Can we conceive anything more destructiv to morality than this?—Paine's Age of Reason.

THE women who rebel against the limits imposed by sex may take comfort from the thought that a vast quantity of the best work of the world is of no sex. It is the work of preserving and enlarging the general inheritance of mankind, of, to use the now stereotyped expression, leaving the world better than we found it. Moral progress, knowledge in all its branches, art in all its forms, literature, culture—these offer inexhaustible fields in which every advance will reveal a new horizon, every conquest new worlds so conquer, and in which there will be no question of man or woman, but only of the human powers each individual can bring to the common stock of humanity.—Mrs. William Grey.

AT last
She rose upon the wind of prophecy
Dilating on the future; everywhere
Two heads in council, two beside the hearth,
Two in the tangled business of the world,
Two in the liberal offices of life,
Two plummets dropt for one to sound the abyss
Of science and the secrets of the mind;
Musician, painter, sculptor, critic, more;
And everywhere the broad and beauteous earth
Should hav a double growth of these rare souls,
Poets, whose thoughts enrich the blood of the world. —Tennyson.

MOST truths are as dull as they are precious, simply because in the course of ages they hav worked their way to the exalted, but not interesting, position of truisms.—Sir Henry Taylor.

WHAT would be the use of laws against murder if the condemned criminal could obtain his liberty by apologizing to the queen of England or the President of the United States? Yet such is the Christian system, which, though in one sense beautiful on account of its mercy, is also immoral on account of its indulgence. The supposition that the terrors of hell-fire are essential or even conduce to good morals is contradicted by the facts of history. In the dark ages there was not a woman from Scotland to Naples, we doubted that sinners were sent to hell. The religion which they had was he same as ours, with this exception, that every one believed in it.—Winwood Reade.

IT should be clearly understood that every man has an irrefragable right to treat any doctrin as he thinks proper; either to argue against it or to ridicule it. If his arguments are wrong, he can be refuted; if his ridicule is foolish, he can be out-ridiculed. To this there can be no exception. It matters not what the tenet may be, nor how dear it is to our feelings. Like all other opinions, it must take its chances; it must be roughly used; it must stand every test; it must be thoroughly discussed and sifted. And we may rest assured that if it really be a great and valuable truth, such opposition will endear it to us the more; or that we shall cling to it the closer, in proportion as it is argued against, aspersed, and attempted to be overthrown. —Buckle's Essays.

A RELIGIONIST may be an enthusiast and imagin he sees what has no reality; he may know his narrativ to be false, and yet persevere in it with the best intentions in the world, for the sake of promoting so holy a cause; or, even, when this delusion has not taken place, vanity, excited by so powerful a temptation, operates on him more powerfully than the rest of mankind in any other circumstances; and self-interest with equal force. His auditors may not hav, and commonly hav not, sufficient judgment to canvass his evidence; what judgment they hav they renounce by principle, in these sublime and mysterious subjects; or, if they were ever so willing to employ it, passion and a heated imagination disturb the regularaity of its operations. Their credulity increases his impudence and his impudence overpowers their credulity.—Hume's Essay on Miracles.

"HAV ye any gud piannies?" she asked, as she stepped into a piano wareroom on East Fourteenth street the other day, displaying a prosperous-looking pocket-book. "I want wan fur me datter, who is comin' home from the semetary wid a finished eddication."

"What style of instrument do you prefer?" said the clerk displaying an upright. "This piano is the double-patent-quadruple-stringing-board-never-stay-in-tune and celluloid keys."

"Och, never a happoth do I care about the shtoile so long as it's a strong case! Hav ye any wid iron cases?"

"No, ma'am; but all our cases are made extra strong."

"How much'll you take for that piannie?"

"Four hundred dollars, ma'am."

"Do you sell on the slow-pay plan?"

"Yes, occasionally we sell to reliable purchasers on the installment plan. The installment on this piano would be $15 a month."

"Will ye throw in a cover and shtule?"

"Hardly fair to ask it, ma'am; but we'll throw in those articles this time."

"An' a buk o' music?"

"Yes, we won't be mean about it."

"Now, if ye'll insure the piannie I'll take it."

"Well, really, ma'am, the purchaser usually insures the instrument; but, to close the bargain, we'll insure this piano and agree to take all risks."

"Ye see, betwane me and you," said she, after she had made her mark on the necessary papers and deposited the first installment receipt in her bosom, "I'm glad to feel aisy about the insurance, as I want to get the better of me ole man, who tuk an oath that if I brought a piannie into the house he'd smash it up wid an axe: an' faith he's the bi to do it the next time he gets dhrunk."—Cincinnati Musical People.

YESTERDAY morning a tall young man of twenty landed at the Union depot with a bundle under his arm, and after three or four minutes spent in getting his bearings, he walked up Jefferson avenue and turned into a clothing store.

"Do you wish to try on some coats and wests for a dollar?" asked the proprietor, as he rushed from behind the counter.

"No, I guess not. Do you deal on the square?"

"My frent, dot is exactly vhat I does. I vas so square dot I lose $3,000 last year. Can I sell you an overcoat for ten dollar?"

"No, I guess not. Here is an overcoat that I bought of you four weeks ago."

"Bought of me?"

"Yes, I think you are the man. When I got it home we found that it was moth-eaten. I can pick it to pieces in a dozen places."

"Is dot possible? Und how much you pay?"

"Eight dollars."

"My shtars! And vhat you vant now?"

"I want my money back."

"Vhell, vhell. My frent, I am sorry for you. You seem like an honest poy, and it vhas too bad."

"Yes, it was a swindle, and I want my money back."

"Dear me, but I wish you vhas here yesterday. Let me explain to you. You bought dot coat four weeks ago?"

"Yes, four weeks to-day."

"Vhell, I had sold oudt to my cousin Philip shust one day before. Philip ish not a square man."

"What hav I got to do with Philip?"

"Let me explain. In dree days Philip makes assignment to my brudder Louis. Dot Louis is a leedle off. He would sheat your eye-teeth away from you."

"Yes, but I havn't anything to do with Louis."

"Let me oxplain. Louis kept der place a week, und he giv a shatel mortgage to my fadder-law, and vhas bounced out."

"I don't know anything about that."

"Let me oxplain. My fadder-law vhas took mit a fit and died, and he leaf dis place to my wife. My wife was gone to Europe for two years, and she leaf me as agent. Now you see how it vhas. I gannot tell you who sold dot coat. Maybe it vhas Philip, maybe Louis, maybe my fadder-law. It couldn't haf been me, for I vhas in Shicago. If you leaf dot coat I will write to my wife. She is square, shust like me, and maybe she writes back dot you can take a linen duster and two white vests and call it all right."

"Say, this is a sneaking swindle," exclaimed the young man.

"Maybe it vhas. Philip vhas a great liar."

"I'll go to the police."

"Vhell, dot is all right; maybe der police vhill help me catch Louis. I shust found oudt last night dot he cut all der hind buttons off all der coats in der store before he left."

"If you'll step outdoors I'll mash you."

"Vhell, I like to oblige you, but you see I vhas only agent for my wife."

"Well, you'll hear from me again, and don't you forget it," said the victim, as he went out.

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an
EXTERNAL APPLICATION,
which is the doctor's latest and greatest discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case. Some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits, Consumption; while others, again, had become upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become so ill as to be scarcely able to take care of themselves.
SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.
Middle-Aged and Old Men.
There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.
☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.
PRIVATE COUNSELOR.
Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, his system based upon scientific fact."

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.
BY JAMES PARTON.
With Portraits and other Illustrations.
This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.
Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the ferti scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

Notes and Clippings.

THE authorities at the Vatican hav rejected an application to put a telephone in that palace.

A GREAT many people who hav something the matter with them cannot tell whether it is dyspepsia or religion.

A SON of the late Rev. Dr. Nehemiah Adams, of Boston, a highly orthodox divine, has become a speaker and writer against Christianity.

"THE asylum for idiots at Clerkenwell," is the respectful manner in which Punch speaks of the Middlesex magistrates.

THE Vicar of Epsom, in an advertisment for a curate, savs: "'No blasphemous hymns' are sung in his church, which is 'free from ritualistic follies.'"

BY a vote of the Baptist deacons at Mendocia, Ind., a figure of Venus, which had been embroidered on a screen by the pastor's daughter, was declared unfit to be sold at the church fair.

IN the Legislature of Washington Territory a bill giving suffrage to women possessed of $500 in property was passed in the lower House, but killed in the council by a vote of eight nays and one yea.

MR. GEORGE HOWELL, the workingman Liberal candidate for Stafford, has the cry of "Atheist" raised against him. The new Dean of Carlisle advises him to take no notice of it, and says that "cannibal" would do just as well.

THE Rev. G. W. Hamilton, in a sermon at Salem, New Brunswick, explained that the assassination of Garfield was ordered by God as a punishment of the nation, because of the popular and semi-official reception of Parnell in this country.

KING HUMBERT, anxious to pay his father's extraordinary debts, practices an economy unparalleled by a crowned head. Besides reducing the royal stud to a minimum, and diminishing the court officials, he has tried to sell several of the royal palaces.

A CONNECTICUT deacon refused to pay taxes on his residence on the ground that, as he held religious services in it every morning and every evening, it was by law exempt as a "house of worship." The collectors, refusing to allow his claim, sold the building.

A NUMBER of Chicago men, including a Jewish rabbi, a bishop of the Reformed Episcopal church, and the pastor of a Unitarian society, hav addressed a petition to the Board of Education asking that the first forty minutes in each school day be devoted to instruction in unsectarian ethics and physiology.

THE Rev. Thomas Baskerville, of Bloomfield, pastor of a Congregational church, clerk of a Congregational miuisters' association, and agent of the Congregational missionary society, has eloped with with a servant girl, taking along all the money he could borrow, and leaving his sick wife and three young children without a dollar.

WHEN a Texas couple stood up to be married, the minister saw the handle of a pistol protruding from the bridegroom's pocket, and suggested that, out of respect to the solemn ceremony, it be laid aside, The advice was heeded. Then the bride demurely drew a dagger from her bosom and tossed it beside the other weapon.

MRS. BESANT was the only student who this year obtained a first-class certificate in the examinations at South Kensington in the advanced stage of general biology. Twelve students went up for examination, Mrs. Besant passing first-class, six students passing second-class, and five failing. The examiners were Professors Huxley and Foster.

THERE has been a dreadful ecclesiastical storm in a teapot at Manchester, Eng. The Rev. Carter, rector of St. Lukes, is a high-churchman, and his congregation sometimes numbers eleven. One morning a stranger entered and partook of the communion, but instead of eating the wafer he stuck it inside his prayer-book, and when he got outside made uncomplimentary remarks on the whole performance of the ritualistic parson and his bevy of damsels. For this offense the magistrate fined him forty shillings and costs. The Rev. J. Carter and his damsels will probably thank the Lord over a tea meeting in the vestry.

A BIRMINGHAM paper says: "The uses of a curate are not altogether of a spiritual kind; otherwise a married one would be certainly worth as much as a single one. The curate is expected to act as a parochial lady's man; to make up a set at tennis, to pop in and discuss Tennyson at five o'clock teas, to lend, in fact, a sort of flavor of holiness to the mild pleasures of angelic damsels."

TALMAGE, last Sunday, preached on the subject of loteries, gambling, and games of chance. He was particularly severe upon the game of ten-pins. He said it wasn't the pins alone that went down; souls went down with them. He ought to be thankful. It givs him and the small boys a chance to "set 'em up again," which is what he gets big money for.

SOME idea of the wealth of the mines on the Pacific coast may be obtained from the fact that in 1877 there were $76,000,000 on deposit in the savings banks of California. This is the largest amount of money ever held by the banks of the state at any one time, and its accumulation was the result of the mining prosperity that had prevailed for some time previous.

MISS CAMPBELL, an English lady, called the "Queen of Corsica," has built a church at Ajaccio, and rules her chaplain with almost tyranny. If the sermon is too long, a large watch is drawn out of her pocket and held over her head until a conclusion is put to the irksome discourse, to the amusement of the congregation and the discomfort of the divine.

THE inhabitants of Marpingen, a small village in the Prussian Rhine province, which obtained great notoriety some years ago by the alleged appearance of the Virgin Mary and the consequent miraculous cures, seem to hav lost much of their faith in the Ultramontane party. At the recent elections the Catholic candidate obtained 71 votes, while the Liberal polled 184.

"VOLTAIRE IN EXILE" is the title of a brief and well-written biography of the brilliant wit and writer, antichurchman, and champion of intellectual liberty in the eighteenth century. It is the work of Benjamin Gastineau and translated from the French by F. Vogeli and Edmund Dubourg. For readers who hesitate to take up the larger biographies this little duodecimo may be a welcome substitute.—Home Journal.

IT is no answer to Mr. Ingersoll and to those who believe with him to say that he is an Atheist and will be burned in everlasting perdition, or that he is a man of bad character, or that he will possibly die in agony and shame. This is the general tendency of most ecclesiastical responses to attacks of this kind. But what the people expect from their clergymen is that the eloquent and specious philosophy of so distinguished an agitator should be answered. The warning of Dr. McCosh as to the decrease of clergymen should be taken seriously to heart by all who wish well to the cause of Christ.—Herald.

A CORRESPONDENT from Danbury, Conn., writes to the Sun as follows on the subject of dancing: "In the Sun report of some remarks made by the Rev. Robert B. Hull about dancing I find the following words: 'The biblical dance was very different from ours. It was a religious act. You may be sure that when David danced no one called out, "First and second couple forward and backward."' Now, would you allow me to inquire of the reverend man if he would recommend us to imitate David's dance in the manner of dress and other particulars, as described in 2 Sam. vi, 14-23?"

THE London Freethinker says: "The Christian Commonwealth last week had a long article on 'Atheism vs. Christianity,' in which it makes the admission that 'Christianity has too long repudiated the honesty of her opponents, and has too often consoled herself by thinking that only the fool can say in his heart, "There is no God."' But soon afterward the Atheist is likened to 'a beast treading down the flowers that made glad life's desert places.' The same article says that Atheism puts out the light of hope. No, it only puts out the light of hell. It then asks what Atheism will giv religionists in the place of what it takes away. What does the doctor giv when he drives out disease? Health. So Atheism drives out superstition and leaves our minds healthy and free. Next, Atheism is requested to 'giv us a more lovable deity.' But Atheism doesn't keep deities in stock. Last, Atheism 'repudiates the Mosaic account of creation.' So does every educated man outside the lunatic asylum and the pulpit."

THE Torch of Liberty says: "The assassin now on trial for the highest crime known to man claims that the deed was that of God, he being only the instrument. He says: 'My defense here is that it is the deity's act, not mine; and I expect he can take care of it. He has taken care of it pretty well so far.' This looks like good Bible doctrin, and we don't see exactly who is going to dispute the wretch and at the same time hold to the doctrin of 'the divine interposition of providence.' Arthur is on the side of Guiteau. He says, 'It hath pleased the almighty in his inscrutable providence,' etc. There has been two unsuccessful attempts made to kill the assassin, but he has escaped with hardly a scratch upon his worthless body, so that his, 'He has taken care of it pretty well so far,' is not a grim joke, but a veritable reality. If Guiteau is the chosen instrument of God, then all efforts to punish him will fail, and, according to the doctrin of divine interposition, God will protect his chosen servant against the world, even to the shutting of lions' mouths, the turning back of seas, the stopping of the sun and moon, and many more improbable things. For one, we are heartily tired of this nonsense. We don't believe in Guiteau and his God, and we think even if he is a servant of the meek and lowly, the sooner he is jerked to Jesus the better."

ACCORDING to Foster's Democrat: "The Board of Assessors of Concord, N. H., has voted to abate the taxes levied against all the churches of that city under the provisions of the law requiring that such property, in excess of $10,000 in value, shall be assessed. The tax abatement amounts to upward of $1,200. So it will be perceived that the abatement ball has been started and very likely it will go on until the taxes of every church in the state will be abated and they will all go free. The Dover church people are already moving and had a hearing before the Board of Assessors to-day for the purpose of getting exemption. The plea of the Methodists is that the society or church either or both, as such, own no church property above the $10,000 which the law exempts, but the pew owners, as such, own and hold the property, and it is all covered in the pew valuation. As the law exempts pews, as such, from taxation, the society cannot be liable. Here is a nice point, and it may be a good and valid one for aught that we can see at present. But where the society or church, as such, own the whole and rent the pews, it is a different case, as is alleged. But be these things as they may, it looks to us that the Concord assessors are assuming a good deal of responsibility when they undertake to say that the public good (we believe they put it on this ground) requires the exemption of property which the law says plainly enough shall be taxed. Those assessors appear to be a law unto themselvs. All we hav to say about this matter in Dover is, Let right, justice, and equality prevail, and nobody can reasonably find any fault."

THE Nonpareil Rowing Club, composed largely of printers, and of which some of THE TRUTH SEEKER compositors are members, will hold its annual ball at Tammany Hall on Friday evening, the 16th. Those who like to dance can find no better society to do it in than these gentlemen, who erstwhile arrange the alphabetic metal, and anon urge the propulsiv oar through the pellucid waters of the Harlem.

GUITEAU'S trial is progressing. He has been upon the stand as his own witness, and related the story of the shooting and the events leading up to it. He considers himself a child of destiny, foreordained from the beginning and inspired by the Almighty to remove Garfield and save the republic. It is probable that Guiteau is "cracked," but whether legally a lunatic or only a victim of that milder form of insanity known as religion is the question to be settled by the jury. In the cross-examination by Judge Porter the theory of inspiration is getting a severe overhauling, which Christians would hardly relish if applied to some other characters who hav claimed divine guidance. When Guiteau hangs, Christianity will pull at one end of the rope.

Much of the literature and religion of Greece was, of course, borrowed of other nations, religion especially being an article that has from time immemorial been borrowed from one nation by another, even down to our own time. There is not in Christendom to-day a religious dogma, rite, or sacrament that was not borrowed from pagan nations. The fertile brains of the Greeks soon added to the number of gods which they imported from other nations, and they easily personified the arts and sciences by typified wisdom, beauty, and love. The oracles, festivals, and games were doubtless Grecian institutions, though based on the borrowed religious notions.

Decidedly peculiar to Greece were the gardens and groves of her greatest philosophers, where, as it has been said, an alley of trees and a row of flowering plants separated from each other the most radical diversities of opinion. Great mental achievements were wrought out in those quiet retreats, and the efforts of those intellectual giants were crowned with astonishing success. In no country of the world, either in ancient or modern times, was philosophy or intellectual culture more thoroughly brought out than in Greece in the sixth, fifth, and fourth centuries before the Christian era.

We should even go back farther. Homer lived nearly a thousand years before our era, and his songs of the proud achievements of his countrymen of the preceding millennium, were, all things considered, the grandest that have ever been sung. Truly has it been said "The poems of Homer have never been rivaled. We have no historians to place side by side with Herodotus, Thucydides, and Xenophon; no philosophers (notwithstanding their antiquated notions and erroneous methods of reasoning) to take the precedence of Pythagoras, Socrates, and Plato [and to them should be added Zeno, Epicurus, and Aristotle]; scarcely any dramatist besides Shakspere to rival Sophocles, Euripides, and Æschylus."

The highest arts were also carefully cultivated by the Grecians. The finest statues the world has seen were wrought out by Grecian brains and hands. It is said of the Venus of Praxiteles that the gazers believed that the marble moved and was about to speak, which induced many to apply their lips to those of the statue, taking it for a living form. The Greeks were also well advanced in the art of painting, and they had more and better paintings than all the rest of the world; besides, in architecture she rivaled all the nations of the earth, and even to this day the Grecian styles rank the highest among mankind.

It may also be claimed that Greece was not behind in all that pertained to the welfare of human society. As a mercantile nation she rose in importance as Phœnicia fell behind; and she was so thoroughly master of this business that the horrors of civil war were not allowed to interfere with commerce. Every species of merchandise was allowed to pass through their several lines unmolested. The ambulatory commerce of Greece was simply wonderful, and her merchants traveled far and near in the prosecution of their avocations. It is said the caravans of Greece penetrated even as far as China with the products of the West, and took with them on their return the riches of the Orient. In their mercantile operations the first bills of exchange were brought into use. Isocrates mentions a trader who came to Athens with grain having delivered a draft of money due to him somewhere on the Euxine Sea, which was negotiated without difficulty, which perhaps is the first transaction of the kind on record.

The political institutions of Greece should not be lost sight of. Very likely she borrowed her notions and practices of monarchy and royalty from the nations which had preceded her; but she was the first nation to introduce democratic and practical republics. She had an innate and fervent love for liberty and equality, and really, especially when she became advanced in civilization, she exhibited little love for hereditary power and royalty. In her, political freedom had a firm home.

Greece, of course, had her faults, and prominent among them was a disposition to waste her life and strength in needless internecine wars. This trait of character, blended with an excessive party spirit in the place of real patriotism, effected the sacrifice of the national cause, when the decline of the country became as rapid as its elevation had been marvelous. But taking the Grecian nation, all in all, I must repeat that one is inevitably filled with wonder how so small and sterile a country, especially in that age of the world, in the various walks and avocations of human effort, could have produced such wonders.

I trust, my friends, that you will pardon me for dwelling at such length upon ancient Greek history, which many of you are doubtless familiar with; but since visiting these famous shores I have run over the record of their past history to refresh my memory, and I felt as though I should properly give you the benefit of it. I will now attempt to tell you what I have seen myself.

ATHENS AS IT IS.

We of the party named in my last letter do our sight-seeing together, so that one guide answers for all. The first place we visited after partaking of a lunch on the day of our arrival was Mount Lycabettus, in the northern part of the city, or just without it. It is a steep, abrupt hill of rock rising from the plains of Attica, at an angle of about fifty feet, to a hight of over five hundred feet, and on the top there is just room enough for a small Greek church and for a dozen people to stand and survey the beauties of the splendid panorama before them. Around the base is a hard, sterile earth composed of stiff clay and stones, and in this the century plant, cactus, and a few pepper-trees seem to luxuriate, but we soon rise above them, finding little but rock and occasional small hardy plants, natives of this locality. If you remember how Christian and his companion Faithful looked climbing the hill Difficulty in Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," you can form some idea of how our company looked ascending this hill Difficulty; and it was only by keeping the zigzag path roughly cut in the rocks that we could make the thing possible. Fortunately we had not such a pack to encumber us as poor Christian had, nor such trepidation about the past or the future. As I cannot well claim to be a Christian, possibly I may pass for Faithful, and I am quite sure that at any time I had rather be Faithful than Christian.

Well, we made the ascent, or rather all the company save the two younger members of it, who turned back on account of the difficulties of the journey, and I must boast that I was among the first who reached the summit. And from that elevated locality a splendid view is obtained of Athens and all the country round about, as it lies like a map unrolled before you. Athens, you will remember, is about five miles from the sea, on the plains of ancient Attica, which is bounded on the northwest by Mt. Parnes, on the northeast by Mt. Pentelicus, on the southeast by Mt. Hymettus, and on the west by Mt. Ægaleos. On the south it is open to the bay of Salamis, or Saronic Gulf. To the left of the bay are the Ægean sea and the range of mountain land beyond, and on the right is seen the high rocks of the little province of Corinth.

On the opposite side of the city, and at a distance of perhaps one and a quarter miles, stands the far-famed Acropolis, rising up, a craggy mass of rock, three hundred feet in hight. In its immediate vicinity and to the right is a lower hill of rock, called the Areopagos or Mars Hill; still further to the right is the Pnyx, and to the southwest is a fourth hill, the Museum. On the southeast of the city runs the river Ilissus, and on the west the Cephissus, or rather the places are there for the two streams, but the water has departed. Even in the rainy season they cannot be very large streams. They empty into the bay of Salamis not far from Peræus, or rather they are swallowed up by the marshes in that vicinity.

While the landscape view from the top of Lycabettus is not so lovely as it would be if the ranges of mountains five, ten, and fifteen miles away were covered with forest trees, and the intermediate valley rich with luxuriant verdure, still, from the peculiar clearness and softness of the atmosphere, the cerulean blue of the sky, and the peculiar and agreeable tints which meet the eye from the hill-tops around, there is a decided charm in the Athenian landscape. In May it is undoubtedly very lovely here, when the whole valley and the bases of the mountains are clothed in green, and everything teems with new life and vigor; but at this season of the year all is sere and dead save a considerable growth of olive-trees on the plain and stunted pines on the hills, several vineyards in different localities, numerous public and private gardens, and small parks in the city—the trees and plants of which have to be watered—and numerous acacia and pepper-trees, both of which have a beautiful foliage, with a plentiful growth of the aloe, or century plant. Despite all these, the view is almost painful from the more abundant appearance of a dried-up and dead condition of things. If this country could only have timely and frequent rains it would be the most lovely climate in the world, being neither excessively hot nor excessively cold. Now, in the last week in October, the thermometer stands at 72°, with an altitude ten degrees greater in the warmest part of the day. The memories of the ancient city of Athens and its charming surroundings are thus beautifully dilated upon by Milton in his "Paradise Regained:"

"Where on the Ægean shore a city stands,
Built nobly, pure the air, and light the soil;
Athens, the eye of Greece, mother of arts
And eloquence, native to famous wits,
Or hospitable in her sweet recesses,
City or suburban, studious walks and shades.
See there the olive grove of Academe,
Plato's retirement, where the Attic bird
Trills her thick-warbled notes the summer long.
There flowering hill Hymettus, with the sound
Of bees' industrious murmur, oft invites
To studious musing; there Ilissus rolls
His whispering stream within the walls; there view
The schools of ancient sages; his, who bred
Great Alexander to subdue the world,
Lyceum there, and painted Stoa next;
Then shalt those hear and learn the secret power
Of harmony, in tones and numbers hit
By voice or hand; and various measured verse,
Æolian charms and Dorian lyric odes,
And his who gave them breath, but higher sung,
Blind Melesigenes, thence Homer called,
Whose poems Phœbus challenged for his own;
Thence what the lofty grave tragedians taught,
In chorus or Iambic, teachers best
Of moral prudence, with delight received
In brief sententious precepts, while they treat
Of fate, and chance, and change in human life,
High actions and high passions best describing;
Thence to the famous orators repair.
Those ancients, whose resistless eloquence
Wielded at will fierce, democratic,
Shook the arsenal, and fulminated over Greece
To Macedon and Artaxerxes' throne;
To sage philosophy next lend thine ear,
From heaven descended to the low-roofed house
Of Socrates; see thou his tenement,
Whom well inspired the oracle pronounced
Wisest of men; from whose mouth issued forth
Mellifluous streams, that watered all the schools
Of academies old and new, with those
Surnamed peripatetics, and the sect
Epicurean, and Stoic severe."

Byron describes an Athenian sunset thus:

"Slow sinks, more lovely ere his race be run,
Along Morea's hills the setting sun;
Not, as in northern climes, obscurely bright,
But one unclouded blaze of living light!
O'er the hushed deep the yellow beam he throws,
Gilds the green wave, that trembles as it glows.
On old Ægina's rock and Hydra's isle.
The God of gladness sheds his parting smile;
O'er his own regions lingering, loves to shine,
Though there his altars are no more divine.
Descending fast, the mountain shadows kiss
The glorious gulf, unconquered Salamis!
Their azure arches through the long expanse
More deeply purpled meet his mellowing glance;
And tenderest tints, along their summits driven,
Mark his gay course, and own the hues of heaven;
Till deeply shaded from the land and deep,
Behind his Delphian cliff he sinks to sleep."

Though all are not able so fully appreciate the architectural beauties of the ancient temples of Athens, yet scarcely any can fail to admire the magnificent assemblage, they form in their position, outline, and coloring, where they can trace the pictures of the poets in "the vale Cephissus, the hill of Colonos, the ridge of Hymettus," where he can view on one side the bay of Salamis, and on the other the hights of Phylæ. "Nowhere is antiquity so well substantiated as at Athens, or its outline more completely filled up to the eye and to the imagination." Thus Murray: "The character of the landscape round Athens is very peculiar, its simplicity of outline and coloring, combined with the magnificence of form and extent. It cannot be called rich scenery, for with the exception of the olive grove on the plain the landscape is devoid of wood. An air of repose is one of its chief characteristics; the form of its hills, and the plain terminating in the broad bay of Salamis, contribute to produce this effect, which is, however, to be ascribed more particularly to the eye finding a resting-place on the hight of the Acropolis, and the magnificent ruins covering the summit."

The little church on the summit of Lycabettus is named after Saint George, and I learn services are held there on Sundays and a few faithful devotees, attracted, probably, as much by the romantic position and the magnificent views, as by the rites of the service, climb up there to worship. It is only repeating the customs of the ancient Persians and other pagans to build their temples on the highest places and to ascend there to worship. In numerous ways is paganism seen repeated in Christianity.

THE ACROPOLIS.

Let me next tell you something of our visit to the Acropolis, the great point of attraction about Athens. Fifteen minutes' walk from our hotel brings us to the famous pile of rocks, which like a citadel rises above the plain. In fact, it was first used as a citadel in the early days of Athens, before the temples of the gods were erected, and even since that period it has still been regarded as a citadel, which it is by nature. It is wholly inaccessible at the western end, where an extensive marble staircase of sixty steps seventy feet wide led and still leads to its summit. The Acropolis is in general form that of a rocky platform of irregular shape, eleven hundred feet in length, four hundred and fifty wide in the broadest part, and three hundred feet above the city. At the western end, at the head of the broad marble staircase stands the Propylæa, or grand entrance. The portico is sixty-nine feet broad, having six fluted Doric columns, five feet in diameter, and twenty-four feet high. The two wings are seventy-eight feet apart. These wings faced each other and consisted each of a stoa or porch of three Doric columns, ranged between the square pilasters, called antæ. The northern wing remains in perfect shape. A porch facing the south, thirteen feet deep, led to a hall thirty-five by thirty feet, usually called the Pinacothea. The walls of this apartment were once lined with paintings. It is now occupied with fragments of statutes and architectural carvings, with inscriptions, etc. The whole is of white marble from Mount Pentelicus, ten or twelve miles away.

The southern part is much in ruins, and is partly concealed by a lofty medieval tower, which forms a very conspicuous object in all views of the Acropolis. On the side of the entrance opposite to the tower is a moderate-sized Doric temple of Nike Apteros, or Wingless Victory, which retains more of the original edifice than some of the other temples in the locality. All of them have been greatly injured by the attacks of enemies, notably the Persians, the Romans, and, worse than all, by the Turks, who not only by their bombardment shattered the temples, but after coming into possession of the place, and using it for a magazine, an explosion took place which spread great ruin amidst all the temples of the Acropolis. The massive and imposing columns remaining are those which withstood this terrible ordeal.

On the north side of the surface of the Acropolis, and in the center, as regards east and west, stands the Erechtheum, which is claimed to have been more revered by the ancient Athenians than any other of their temples, and it was closely connected with their earliest traditions. Erechtheus, or Erechthonius, for both names have been used, occupies a more important place in the Athenian religion. Homer represented Erechtheus as born of the earth and brought up by the goddess Athena, or Minerva, and the Athenians offered him annual sacrifices. According to one form of the legend, he was placed by Athena in a chest, which was intrusted to Aglaurus, Pandrosus, and Heres, the daughters of Cecrops, with strict orders not to open it; but that Aglaurus and Heres, unable to control their curiosity, disobeyed the command; and upon seeing the form of the child entwined with a serpent, they were seized with madness and threw themselves down from the steepest part of the Acropolis. Thus this temple was built in connection with the religious notions of the people. The original temple being destroyed by the Persians, a magnificent one was built in its place, the remains of which still stand as described.

Erechtheus is claimed to have been buried on the site of the temple, as he was regarded as the founder of the original structure, as well as the one most instrumental in founding the religion of Athena in Attica. Here was the first statue of Athena Polias; that is, Athena, the guardian of the city. This statue was made of olive-wood, said to have been let down from heaven for the purpose. Here also was the sacred olive-tree, which Athena called forth from the earth in her contest with Poseidon, or Neptune, for the possession of Attica. Here, also, was the well of salt water which Neptune produced by a stroke from his trident, the impression of which was claimed to be seen upon the rocks. Cecrops was also buried here. The temple also contained a separate sanctuary of Athena Polias, in which the statues of the goddess was placed, and a separate sanctuary of Pandrosus, the only faithful one of the three sisters to whom the child was intrusted. Thus the Erechtheum comprised two temples—one to Athena Polias, and one to Pandrosus; but it was very frequently called after Athena Polias, who, by the bye, was not identical with Athena Pallas, whom the Romans afterward worshiped as Minerva. Athena Polias seems to have been the local deity for Attica or Athens.

The new Erechtheum was a structure of singular beauty and magnificence—one of the greatest triumphs of Athenian architecture. It was of the Ionic order, and formed a striking contrast with the Parthenon, which was of the Doric order. The form of the Erechtheum was different from every other Grecian temple. The temples of Greece were usually of an oblong figure, standing east and west, with a portico at each end. But this structure had a portico at the eastern end, but none at the western end; but in place one each on the north and south sides, forming a transept. Consequently the temple had three porticoes. The eastern portico, regarded as the principal, consisted of six Ionic columns, standing in a single line before the wall of the celia, five of which are still standing. Six other Ionic columns formed the northern porticoes, four in a line, and one on each flank; these are all standing. They are three feet higher, and six inches more in diameter than those of the eastern portico. This is thought to have been done on account of the foundation rock being lower here. The southern portico was entirely different in character, and, instead of being supported by columns, is upheld by six caryatids, or large marble female figures in long drapery. The four front ones are in line, with one on each flank. They stand upon a basement above the exterior level. The roof which they support is flat and some fifteen feet above the floor. One of these caryatids was taken to England, and is now in the British Museum; but in place the people of London were kind enough to send back a copy cast from cement, which now stands with the other five original ones, though of a darker color. A Frenchman, M. Piscatory, an embassador to this government, was instrumental in having these beautiful caryatids restored to their original position. It may be well enough to remark in this connection that in the church of St. Pancreas, in London, these six pagan caryatids have been copied exactly. The conception is, of course, a pretty one, but still they are entirely pagan, and the fact affords another proof of the disposition which Christians have so many times manifested to appropriate pagan ideas, fashions, and beliefs. In the interior of the temple were originally many statues of gods and goddesses, among which were prominent those to whom the temple was erected. A great deal more is said touching the early notions with regard to this temple, but probably I have given enough.

But it is the Parthenon, standing near its center, which is the great feature and glory of the Acropolis. It was also originally called the Temple of the Virgin. The Grecians thought a great deal of their divine virgin, and made as much ado over her as the Christians do over theirs. In fact, the world has for thousands of years entertained great reverence for virgins. The Persians had their Astarte, the Assyrians had their Ishtar, the Egyptians had their Isis, the Hindoos had their Devaci, the Druids had their Ceredwen, the Scandinavians had their Friga, the Greeks had their Athena and their Diana, even as the Christians had their Mary. Theirs is the latest virgin of the lot; all the others, and several more not mentioned, being in advance of the virgin of Palestine. Truly, if Christianity were divested of all it has borrowed from its pagan predecessors, there would be nothing left of it.

Wordsworth had the grace to say that the Parthenon was "the finest edifice on the finest site in the world, hallowed by the noblest recollections that can stimulate the human heart." Murray says: "In this temple an architecture which had gone on through ages of refinement, until it culminated there, was combined with the work of the greatest sculptor Greece and the world ever produced; and unless we take into consideration the perfect unison of those two arts, we cannot do justice to Greek architecture, much less the Parthenon. Painting also was there, and although we can thoroughly realize the part it played in the magnificent diapason of the three sister arts, we dare not question its propriety. Our present object, however, is chiefly with the architecture, for the remains of the paintings are almost evanescent, and the sculpture, although some mention of it must be made, is no longer there, with the exception, at least, of a very small portion.

"The Parthenon was built under the administration of Pericles. Ictinus and Callicrates were the architects, while the general supervision was intrusted to the great sculptor Pheidias. It is not known how many years were required in the construction, but as the Propylæa required five years, the Parthenon should have required at least twenty years. It was completed about 438 B.C. The cost has been estimated by Leake to amount to one thousand talents, or $3,500,000. It was built entirely of Pentelic marble, obtained from the Pentelic mountain, some twelve miles east of the city. The roof, however, was Parian marble, obtained from the Parian quarry. In technical language, the temple is peripetal and octastyle—that is to say, it consists of a portico of eight columns at each end, and has a colonnade of seventeen columns on each side, which would make, counting the angle columns twice, forty-six in all. Of this number, thirty-two are still standing, to say nothing of abortive attempts at restoration on the north side. The entire length of the temple on the upper step is 228 feet, the breadth 101 feet. The columns are of the Doric order, six and a quarter feet in diameter, fluted, and thirty-four and a quarter feet in hight. The architrave above these columns was adorned with gilded shields of bronze, which were placed beneath the metopes. Between the shields there were inscribed the names of the dedicators. The impressions left upon the parts covered by these shields are still visible upon the architraves. The shields themselves were carried off by Lachares, together with the gold of the statue of the goddess, when Demetrius was besieging Athens. There were also upon the architraves bronze nails or pegs, upon which festoons were hung on days of festival. The ninety-two metopes of the frieze were filled with sculptures in high relief, of which only one remains in a good state of preservation. The pediments or actoi were filled with sculptures of a size much greater than life. Those of the eastern portico related to the birth of Minerva; those of the western to the contest of Minerva and Neptune for the soil of Attica. All are now entirely gone save three horses' heads in the corner of the eastern, and a single group on the western pediment, supposed to represent Cecrops and Aglaurus, of which all the finer parts are much obliterated. The hight to the apex of the pediment, exclusive of the ornament of the acroterium which there must have been at the top, was fifty-nine feet above the upper step, or with the addition of the stylobate, sixty-four. The level of the pavement of the temple was only about six feet below the ridge of the roof of the Propylæa, and was raised high above all the platforms in the Acropolis."

The eastern end of the temple occupies the highest part of the grounds. The northeast angle of the edifice, which forms the platform on which the columns stand, rises immediately from a leveled bed cut in the rock. It consists of the solid steps of Pentelic marble about twenty-one inches thick, set on a plinth one foot high, of the same material. It is thought this second temple was built in conformity to the style of the original temple, which stood on the same spot, and which was destroyed by Xerxes.

Leake speaks of the Parthenon in this language: "Such was the simple structure of this magnificent building, which, by its united excellence of materials, design, and decorations, was the most perfect ever executed. Its dimensions of 228 feet by 101, with a hight of 66 feet to the top of the pediments, were sufficiently great to give an appearance of grandeur and sublimity, and this impression was not disturbed by any obtrusive subdivision of parts, such as is found to diminish the effect of many larger modern buildings, where the same singleness of design is not apparent. In the Parthenon there was nothing to divert the spectator's contemplation from the simplicity and majesty of mass and outline, which forms the first and most remarkable object of admiration in the Greek temple; for the statues of the pediments, the only decoration which was very conspicuous by its magnitude and position, having been inclosed within frames which formed an essential part of the designs of each front, had no more obtrusive effect than an ornamented capital to an unadorned column."

It would require more space to give a description of the magnificent statues which, according to the various authorities, adorned the Parthenon, than I can take, but from the accounts that are given of them they were wonderful indeed. I must, however, have a little to say about the magnificent colossal statue of the virgin goddess, Athena, or Minerva, which stood in the portion of the temple called the Naos, which is 98 by 63 feet within the walls. This colossal statue of the virgin goddess, with the exception of the statue of Jupiter at Olympia—both by the hand of Pheidias—was the most celebrated statue of antiquity. It was called the chrys elephantine, because ivory was employed for all the undraped parts. "The dress and other ornaments were of solid gold, of a weight equal that of £10,000—so contrived by Pheidias that the whole could be removed if ever required by the exigencies of the state." It is said that an accusation was brought by envious persons against Pheidias, that he had appropriated to his own use some of the gold which was intrusted to his charge for the making of this statue, which he proudly refuted by having the gold taken from the statue and weighed in the presence of his accusers. This gold, however, was finally plundered, so claimed, by Lachares, who made himself master of Athens about 300 B. C.

The hight of the statue was forty feet. It was clothed with the ægis and a robe reaching to the feet, with a Medusa's head in ivory, on the breast. At her feet lay a shield, bearing on the convex side the battle of the Athenians and Amazons, and on the concave the strife of the gods and giants, and on the sandals was carved that of Centaurs and Lapithæ. The goddess bore a helmet surmounted with a sphinx, with griffins in relief on either side. A spear was in her left hand and a serpent near the butt end of the spear sought refuge under the shield. A most remarkable feature of this statue was an image of Victory, four cubits high, which stood on the outstretched hand of the virgin. A metal railing, of which some traces remain on the pavement, surrounded the statue.

The pediments, or what in common language would be termed the gable-ends of the temple, as already hinted, were ornamented with exquisitely-wrought statues above life size, the largest being eleven feet high. They stood out far enough from the wall behind them to allow one to pass along in the rear. As before remarked these sculptures bore relation to the miraculous or immaculate birth of the virgin and her contests with Neptune. On the eastern pediment was sculptured Hyperion, or day, rising in the south corner; next came Theseus, otherwise Hercules, or, according to some, Cephalus; then the seasons; then a gap which authorities cannot agree in filling, after which came the draped torso of fortune, and then the fates, and in the north corner night going down. Three horses' heads, two of which belonged to night, remain. On the opposite or western end were represented the rival deities, Neptune and Minerva, the first on the south, the other on the north, true to the relative positions of sea and land—Neptune with his weight thrown a little back toward the south, as though yielding his ground, Minerva leaning a little to the north as if about to advance across his path; thus, while the expression of actual collision is avoided, that of an advantage gained is clearly portrayed. The figure of Neptune was nude and over eleven feet high; that of Minerva, as usual, draped, and of about the same hight. Of the statues of Cephissus, Cecrops, Aglaurus, attendants on Minerva, Pandrosus, Heres, Erechtheus, Aphrodite, or Venus. Thetis, numerous goddesses and female figures, Tethys, Venus on the lap of Dione, Ilissus, Callishoe, with centaurs, horses, etc., etc.

"The metopes, or the sculptures in high relief on the exterior frieze of the peristyle between the tri-glyphs, were ninety-two in number, fourteen on the fronts and thirty-two on the sides; their form is generally nearly square, four feet two inches each way. Part of the preëminence of the Parthenon over other Greek Doric temples was due to the fact that all the metopes were ornamented with sculpture; these metopes were of remarkable spirit and variety of treatment, and were executed, as there is reason to believe, by different artists under the superintendence of Phiedias. All those in the middle part of the flanks were thrown down by the explosion. Those of the two fronts remain in their places; and, together with those which remain on the north side, are, and have been for a long time, for the most part, in a mutilated state. Those of the south side, for a cause not easy to explain, escaped mutilation; and in consequence of their better preservation, were drawn by Carrey in 1674, whilst he omitted the rest; and such as escaped the explosions were removed—fifteen to London, and one to Paris; one only, the westernmost, remains on the temple."—Murray.

The entire Acropolis, together with the main avenue leading to it, was, in the days of Athenian glory, literally covered with statuary of the kind, but they have departed, save the fragments that remain. The Turkish and Christian vandals—having sister systems of religions—did the business.

The Turks were actuated partly by a feeling of hatred toward idol-worship, regarding the statues as little else than idols, and partly by a desire to make their conquest over the almost defenseless country as thorough as possible. But it was the Christians who were the greatest vandals. They not only destroyed, but they plundered and stole by wholesale and retail. The museums of the Christian countries of Europe have been enriched by the many hundreds of priceless statues stolen from Greece. Lord Elgin, of England, preëminently a Christian conqueror and thief, in 1802 took great quantities of the statues, bas-reliefs, etc., not only from the Parthenon but from other parts of the Acropolis. He caused his men to tear down the artistic bas-reliefs from the friezes and the metopes, breaking many in the removal, and these were taken to London, and are now in the British Museum. This was a species of vandalism and theft that cannot be too strongly denounced. Egypt, India, Assyria, and Italy have been treated in the same way, and by such wholesale stealings the British Museum has been made as rich as it is. This is all wrong. Copies could have been taken, but the statues should have been allowed to remain in the countries where they belong, and should have been so restored and preserved as to last for ages in the countries where they were produced. Greece has been so robbed by Christian thieves that she has not enough statuary left, out of the thousands of works which her talented sons produced, to fill one good-sized room. As a compensation Lord Elgin sent the Grecians a clock for one of the steeples of Athens, which is still retained, but it was very small amends for the high-handed stealing which he perpetrated.

More appropriation of the property of paganism was shown by sacrilegiously converting the Parthenon into a Christian church in the sixth century, taking it from Minerva and Jupiter and giving it to Mary and Yahweh; and this thing they did in scores upon scores of cases in Athens, in other parts of Greece, in Rome, and in other countries. In this way the "blessed religion of the Virgin and her son" has been shown to be superior to the pagan systems, and to prevail over them. Upon the conquest of Athens by the Turks the Parthenon became a mosque, and down to the year 1687 the edifice remained almost entire, with the exception of the roof. In that year the Venetians bombarded Athens and a shell fell into the Parthenon and destroyed the central portion of the building; eight columns were thrown down on the northern side, and six on the southern; while of the pronaos only one column was left standing. The two fronts escaped. After the capture of the city the Christian commander, Moorsini, attempted to steal a lot of the statues from the western pediment to carry to Venice, but his men were so careless and unskilful that the statues fell while being lowered, and were dashed in pieces. Next came the robbery of Lord Elgin, already alluded to, in 1804, and in 1827 fresh injuries were perpetrated upon the Parthenon by the bombardment of the city. The columns were wofully defaced, especially on the western portico, but with all the injuries the old structure has received it is still a grand monument of the skill and energy of the ancient Grecians, and strikes the beholder with astonishment and admiration. I was filled with wonder at the engineering skill that must have been required to raise up those abrupt rocks the large blocks of marble forming the entablature, the architrave, frieze, and cornice, as well as the other portions of the edifice. I measured one block which lies unbroken on the ground, and found it eighteen feet in length, four in width, and two and a half thick. It must weigh forty or fifty tons. Hundreds of similar blocks were hauled from the Pentelicus and elevated on the Acropolis. It was only one of the many very extraordinary feats connected with that wonderful hill.

By the south side of the Acropolis, and central east and west, is what is left of the ancient temple of Æsculapius, the healing god of the Grecians, who not only used to cure all manner of diseases, but even raised the dead. This was before the same feat was performed by Jesus in Palestine. The temple was once adorned with statues, but they are gone, and nothing is left but broken fragments not considered worth stealing. East of the temple, and a little farther from the Acropolis, is the vast amphitheater of Dyonisus, the Greek name for Bacchus. The plain was largely an excavation in the hill—rock and earth. Many of the marble seats are still in place, including the front seats for the priests of the different gods. These seat have a back of marble, and were in finer style than the others. The names of the gods whose priests occupied them are still cut in the marble. I sat in several of them, and tried to realize the time when the plays of Æschylus and Sophocles were played upon the stage before me. The seats rise in regular gradation from the center to the outer part of the circle. The distance from the inner circle to the upper and outer was three hundred feet, and the place was capable of holding thirty thousand persons, an audience that any modern theatrical company would indeed be proud of. Date 475 B.C.

About the same altitude, and west of the temple of Æsculapius, is the Odeum of Herodes, built in honor of his wife Regilla. It was 240 feet in diameter, and was capable of seating 6,000 persons. The roof to cover so large a place required great architectural skill, and was made of cedar. The place was largely embellished with statues, of which only fragments now remain. It was constructed after the theater of Bacchus. Between the latter and the Acropolis is cut into the hill what now looks like a cavern, and was once a Doric temple to celebrate the victorious Choragic contest. Above the same are two columns with triangular capitals, which formerly carried tripods. Its date was about 325 B. C.

In the northwest corner of the Acropolis is a cave of considerable dimensions cut into the body of the hill, said to have been dedicated to Pan and Apollo, but there is nothing connected with it at present worthy of special notice.

The Gymnasium of Hadrian is about seventy yards north of the grand entrance to the Acropolis, where commences a colonnade of the Corinthian order, consisting of single pieces of gray marble, not fluted, three feet in diameter and twenty-nine feet high, and extended in a northerly direction. It is said a hundred columns from the quarries of Libya once stood here; also a temple of Juno and Jupiter, and a sanctuary common to all the gods.

About one hundred yards southwest of the outer corner of the Gymnasium of Hadrian are some remains of a marble building of excellent masonry, where was located the Gymnasium of Ptolemy, supposed to have been constructed about 300 B. C. Here equestrian and gymnastic sports were indulged in by the students and young men of Athens.

In the eastern part of the city is the Panathenaic Stadium, being a partly natural hollow and partly excavated oblong amphitheater with elevated seats for the spectators, where chariot-racing and afterward wild beast contests took place. It is supposed that the people at first sat upon the grass, with the surface of the ground in its natural position, but after a time it was enlarged and improved by Lycurgus, the son of Lycophron, 350 B. C. Herodes put up the steps of Pentelic marble, and greatly enriched the place. It is said to have held over 40,000 people. At the eastern end a tunnel is made through the hill, where the wild beasts were let in. This was done under the Romans; the Grecians did not engage in wild beast contests or amusements.

OTHER ANTIQUITIES.

Around the Acropolis on all sides stood the ancient city of Athens, which in its glory is said to have contained over 400,000 inhabitants, but now the city, of less than 100,000, is north of the sacred hill, though coming up close to it. The old town around the Acropolis was called the Asty, and was inclosed by a wall, the remains of which, however, are to be found in but few places. Within the Asty are several remarkable ruins, which were visited by our party with great interest.

I will first mention the magnificent temple of Jupiter Olympus, which stands, perhaps, the tenth of a mile east of the Acropolis, and two hundred and fifty feet lower. I will not enter into a long description of it, but will content myself by saying that its size was materially larger than the Parthenon. It was in the Corinthian style, and was built at a later period than the Parthenon. Its length on the upper step was 354 feet, and its breadth 171. It had 124 marble columns, six feet and four inches in diameter at the base, with a hight of 55¼ feet. But fifteen of these grand columns are now standing, the sixteenth having fallen in a severe storm on October 26, 1852. The eighteen pieces which formed it still lie as they fell. The different blocks were fastened together with iron bars or dowels. The capitals are exceedingly well carved, and are eight and a half feet square. The stones composing the architraves are of great size, and weigh about twenty-five tons. The temple was begun by Pisistratus, but remained unfinished four hundred years. Augustus took it in hand, but did not live to complete it. When it was completed the worship of Jupiter had fallen into disuse. So the gods pass away. The arch of Hadrian stands near this old temple; it is twenty feet wide and twenty-six high. There is no special interest connected with it.

The temple of Theseus stands about the same distance to the northwest from the Acropolis, and is the best preserved of all the old pagan temples in Greece. It was preserved during the dark ages by being converted into a church of St. George; and as the architecture and sculpture is considered only inferior to the Parthenon, it was fortunate that the destructive Christians dedicated it to Yahweh. It is not large in size, being 104 feet in length, and 45 in width. The columns are nineteen feet high, and three feet and four inches in diameter. The sculptures of the metopes relate to the labors of Hercules, and those on the flanks to the labors of Theseus. The pediments were filled with sculptures, but the Christians took them away.

The Tower of the Winds, as it is usually called, or as it was anciently denominated, The Horilogium of Adronicus Cyrrhestes, is deserving of notice. It is an elegant octagonal structure, forty-four feet high, with a god of the eight winds sculptured on the upper part of the eight sides. Eolus was the presiding god of the winds, and under him were Boreas, Libs, Notus, Eurus, Zephyrus, etc. In connection with each god the weather and results which the god is supposed to bring are represented. A sun-dial was on the tower, the remains of which are still to be seen. A water-clock was inside, run by water brought in an aqueduct from the Acropolis, but a short distance to the south. Its date is thought to be 150 B.C.

The Areopagus, or Mars Hill, is about one hundred feet west of the Acropolis, and not more than half its hight. It is also an abrupt pile of rock (limestone), into which steps are cut by which to reach the top. Here was held the high court of last resort of the Athenians. Here are two rude stones, one for the accuser, the other for the accused. Other seats are for the judges. The court was held in the open air, and the place was invested with great reverence on the part of the people. Here is where Paul stood when he delivered the following sermon to the Athenians:

"Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things ye are too superstitious, for as I passed by and beheld your devotions I found an altar with this inscription, To the unknown God. Whom, therefore, ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you, God that made the world and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands; neither is worshiped with men's hands as though he needed anything, seeing he giveth to all life and breath, and all things; and hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed and the bounds of their habitation; that they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him and find him, though he be not far from every one of us, for in him we live and move and have our being; as certain also of your own poets have said, For we are also his offspring. Forasmuch, then, as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold or silver, or stone graven by art and men's device. And the times of this ignorance God winked at; but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent, because he hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men in that he hath raised him from the dead."

It is not difficult to suppose that the summon must have been quite an enigma to the people who stood in the plateau, called the Agora, before him, and one might suppose he could have made the latter part of his short discourse a little more comprehensible. Now Paul was partly right and partly wrong. The true God of the world and of all the worlds dwelleth not in temples made with hands, neither requires he to be worshiped, as though he needs anything, seeing he giveth to all life, breath, and all things; but Paul believed in a God who used to live in an old box made with hands, and only three or four feet square at that, and who seemed to need a great deal of burnt blood and roasted flesh to make him feel comfortable. So far as I can see, the ideas of God held by the Grecians were far more sensible than Paul's. They scarcely believed in the blood and flesh necessity of God, and their conceptions of him were only a personification of nature's forces. If Paul had used the term nature instead of God he would have been far more correct. Nature is truly the source of life, breath, and the power of motion, and is at all times near every living being. This ever-present power was never made nor devised, while the God Paul believed in was devised in the minds of ignorant men. Paul was also wrong in supposing that the world and all things else that exist were made; that is, produced from nothing. Not an ounce of matter was ever evolved from nothing, and a thousand or a million men and gods combined may well be challenged to perform the feat. Whatever exists to-day ever did exist in some form, and ever must; and thus help to make up the nature which Paul should have better understood. But let us leave Paul and his errors and talk a little more about ancient Athens.

Immediately beyond the Areopagus, and between it and the Pnyx, is the Agora, which was the public square of the ancient city, a kind of market-place, and where the people used to gather to listen to speeches, and discuss public matters. There is some difference of opinion as to the precise bounds of the Agora, but it was embellished with colonnades and statues, and was a space capable of holding from ten to twenty thousand people.

The Pnyx is an elevation of rock, to which some additions and alterations were made, southwest of the Areopagus and adjoining the Agora. It has a levelish surface, and on the front part is the bema or pulpit, a hewn level surface of the rock, where the orators used to stand when addressing the people, being some ten feet higher than the Agora. Here is where Demosthenes, Pericles, Solon, Themosticles, Aristides, and others were wont to assemble to address the multitude. And still further over toward the sea is another bema or pulpit, a place evidently artificially leveled, where speakers often used to hold forth. It is said Demosthenes used also to speak there. The Pnyx was also used for legislative purposes, being the place for the parliament or the assembly.

Southwest of the Acropolis, and south of the Pnyx, is the Hill of the Muses. On the top is a somewhat imposing monument to Philopappus, of Besa in Syria, who removed to Athens, and held important offices, at the close of the first Christian century. The monument is of white marble with a slightly concave and imposing front, but possesses no special beauty. It is in the base of this hill and on the side toward the Acropolis that two or three prisons are excavated in the rock, being small-sized rooms, with a door of ordinary size. The west one is said to be the one in which Socrates was confined and where he died. It is a double room, the inner one being circular at the top, two feet in diameter, allowing the daylight to enter. The room is twelve feet in diameter, and leading to it is another containing about the same number of square feet. As I stood there I realized anew what a grand, brave old fellow Socrates was, and how like a hero he died. When the sentence of death was pronounced upon him and the hemlock was handed him, he took it and drank it like a man of true courage. I could not help thinking, as I stood there in his prison house, and where he breathed his last, how much more bravery he exhibited than a certain individual who over four hundred years afterwards, over in a narrow strip of country in Syria, called Palestine, who seems to have had some notions of becoming a king, for which unwarranted ambition, together with some remarks he was reported to have made, he was sentenced to die. But his dread of death seems to have been very great. When he realized that the event must take place, he yielded to terrible unavailing mental agony. To such an extent did he dread to die that he wailed excessively, and it is stated that in this state of agony he absolutely sweat several great drops of blood. And though it was no worse for him to die than for every other person who has ever lived in the world to do so, and though death was the only portal by which he could enter that world of exquisite happiness which his followers believed he had left some thirty-one years before, so greatly did he still fear death that his heart quailed and he exhibited what has been justly characterized as cowardice and want of firmness and self-control under trying circumstances. He is said to have cried out in his desperation, "Eloi! Eloi! lama sabacthani?" (My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?) Although many affect to believe him the creator of the universe and the source of all power, he was on this occasion as helpless as a child, and died with just about as little firmness and courage. Ah! Socrates was far more brave and heroic than he!

The Hill of the Nymphs is west of the Pnyx. It was also called the Nymphæum, and in these modern times is remarkable for the observatory which has been built upon it. South of the hill the ancient road to Piraesis is located. There are many other points of interest in the ancient city, but they have become so obliterated in the course of the time that has elapsed as to now be scarcely discernible, and it is hardly worth while to undertake a description of them.

Among the vineyards about a mile northwest of the city is what is said to have been the home of Plato, where he had his grove and held his academy. A modern house is now on the adjacent ground, but nothing marks the spot where the old sage and philosopher had his home. The garden of Epicurus is located on the opposite side of the city, and about as far out. Probably the traditions which point out these spots as the homes of those famous old teachers cannot be relied upon; but that they lived here in Athens and taught the soundest wisdom and the purest morality there is no doubt.

At the southern base of Lycabettus was the gymnasium called the Cynosargus, the school of Antisthenes, the founder of the Cynics. It gave the name to the suburb in the immediate neighborhood. The Heracleum Cynosargus, being on a rising ground, and commanding a distant view of the road of Phalerum, was the position taken by the Athenian army after the victory of Marathon, when they heard of the sailing of the Persian fleet around Sunium toward Phalerum, and marched in all haste to the defense of their city.

A little S. S. E. of the Cynosargus was the Lyceum, one of the chief gymnasiums of Athens; it stood near the banks of the Illissus, and was, like the academy, celebrated for its plane trees. The sacred inclosure of Apollo Lycius was embellished by Pisistratus, Pericles, and Lycurgus, son of Lycophron. It seems to have been a favorite haunt of Socrates, and became the school of Aristotle, whose followers were called Peripatetics from their custom of delivering their lectures while walking in the grove of the Lyceum.

The Ceramicus was so called from having been occupied by the Athenian potters, who carried on a great export trade in ancient times. It was divided into two districts, the inner and outer. The one comprehended the Ajora, and contained the principal street of Athens. This street, at the gate Dipilona, divided into two roads passing through the outer Ceramicus, one sacred road leading to Eleusis, the other to the Academy, the most famous of the gymnasiums, distant about three-fourths of a mile from the gate. On each side of these two roads were the tombs of those citizens who had fallen in battle, or were otherwise famous. Of these only a few rude masses remain, not unlike the tombs of the Appian Way near Rome, but smaller. When perfect they must have added great effect and interest to those two approaches, from which, of all points, the Acropolis shows itself to the greatest advantage. Pausanius has recorded many of the tombs. Some were only simple pillars, on which were inscribed the name and time of death of every citizen who had fallen in particular battles, not omitting even the servile class. Near the gate, and on the road to the Academy, were buried Thrasybulus, Pericles, Chabrias, and Phormio. Beyond these are the tombs of the Athenians who had been slain in battle by sea and land, with the exception of those only who fell at Marathon and were buried there. Here were the victims of the disastrous expedition to Sicily and the defeat of Ægospotami, Nicias, who had surrendered to the Syracusans, being alone omitted; and near them those who fell in the brilliant double victory of the Eurymedon and in other victorious battles. Here were also the tombs of Zeno, founder of the Stoics, of Harmodius, Aristogeiton, and many others.

The Academy was surrounded with a wall built by Hipparchus, and was planted and divided into walls and embellished with fountains by Cimoon. It was celebrated for its plane trees. That part of the plain bordering on the Cephisus and the olive grove is still called Acadhiminia. Not far to the north are two small eminences; the southernmost is the hill of the sacred Colonus, celebrated by Sophocles as the scene of the death of Œdipus, who was here taken up by the clouds into heaven.

Among the antiquities I should mention our visit to the museum containing the relics and antiquities taken by Dr. Schleimann, the great excavator, at Mycenæ and Spatta. They are arranged in cases with glass tops, and consist of bronze weapons and instruments, vases, lamps, tear-bottles, and numerous articles of pottery and terra-cotta works, ivory ornaments and trinkets, coins, gold ornaments, masks, etc., found in the tombs, with cameos, engravings, etc. Many of them were found in the tomb of Agamemnon, and a representation is given of the grave of Agamemnon, with his bones, or part of them, lying side by side with those of his wife. Many articles of bronze are found, nearly corroded away, but I saw nothing made of iron or steel. Can it be possible that iron was unknown at that period?

In a part of the establishment is a collection of Egyptian antiquities, including sarcophaguses, gods, etc. Among them I noticed twenty or thirty figures of the virgin and child, representing Isis and Horus, and which were made many hundred years before Christianity existed. I called the attention of the Rev. Mr. Getz to this particular feature, and remarked to him that he could there see the source whence the idea of the virgin and child was taken, and remarked in addition that the first painting of the Madonna ever known in Christendom were paintings of Isis and Horus, executed in Egypt before the era of Christianity and taken from there to Rome. He seemed ready to admit the great antiquity of the images, but he could not admit that Christians borrowed the idea at all. Oh, no, simple, honest Christians have never borrowed anything, and never have taken anything that did not belong to them, which they were unable to carry or remove. Oh, no! Christians never take anything ("in a horn"). On one of the sides of the courts I saw a statue representing Prometheus fastened to the rock with vultures gnawing at his liver.

Dr. Schleimann resides in Athens, and his residence is a fine white marble edifice three stories high, with some ten statues on the roof over its walls; it is one of the prettiest edifices in the city.

We also visited the new Museum of Fine Arts, in connection with the university, not yet wholly completed, which is a magnificent structure. Statues and other sculpture ornament the outside of the edifice, and two fine statues twelve or fifteen feet high, one of Apollo and the other Minerva, on which artists have been at work nearly two years, and have nearly completed, are to be elevated on two fine marble pillars in line with the front of the edifice, and seventy-five feet high. They cannot fail to make a very imposing appearance.

This beautiful structure has been erected with the money donated by a rich Greek named Baron Sina, who made his money in Vienna. The Schleimann Museum was constructed with funds donated by another generous Greek who made his money abroad. In fact, it is with money made in other countries that most of the modern improvements in the modern city have been made.

Monday, Oct. 24th.—To-day our company chartered two carriages and rode out twelve or fourteen miles in a northwest direction to the ancient town of Eleusis, where are the ruins of two very ancient temples, one to Ceres, the goddess of agriculture, the earth, or in other words, of nature herself; the other temple to Artemusia, whom the Romans called Diana, and where the famous Eleusinian mysteries were inaugurated more than a thousand years before our era. Our ride first lay through a mile or two of olive groves and vineyards on the plain, many of the olive-trees being very aged, estimated at from one to two thousand years of age. They are said to reach an age of twenty-five hundred years. We after reached a narrow valley of very hard, poor land between two ranges of hills of rock, on which there is no soil; on the left are high prominences called Mount Ægaleos, but still where stunted pines manage to prolong a precarious existence. When about two-thirds the way out we came to Daphne Pass, where is an old monastery built in one of the early Christian centuries on the foundation of a temple of Apollo. The monastery is in Byzantine style, or of a square form, with a dome at the top in which in ancient mosaic is a doleful representation of Jesus. It bears much the appearance of some of the old Roman Catholic places which I have seen, though the form of the structure is more square. The sacred lamp was burning, and it looks as though religious services are still held there.

Further on we came to a spot where once stood a temple to Venus, marked by excavations in the almost perpendicular rock, at the foot of which doves carved from white marble have been found. Very little of the temple remains on the foundation. At length we came to the beautiful Bay of Eleusis, which opens upon the view a like a lovely picture—an arm of the sea, nestling in a very quiet spirit among this bold hill of rocks, and presents the appearance of a lake, the island of Salamis closing in the outlook. We drove along by the southern end of the bay and up the eastern side toward the ancient village, passing several vineyards and quite a stretch of plain, containing several thousand acres, which, if rain could fall frequently, would doubtless be very productiv. We passed several wells where water is raised by horse-power and other means to irrigate the land. At the south end of the bay we saw traces of the "Sacred Way," where the religious processions in olden time used to pass between Athens and Eleusis. We saw the grooves cut in the rock where the chariots and other vehicles used to pass. These processions took place once in four years, connected with the observance of the Eelusinian mysteries, and were festivals of great importance. In the same vicinity are the salt-springs, which once formed the boundary between the Athenians and the Eleusinians, and now turn a mill for grinding grain. Half a mile or so from this place is the narrow street where the battle of Salamis was fought, and under the "rocky brow," which is identified by tradition with the seat of Xerxes during the engagement. The islet at the entrance of the bay is Psyttalea, which was occupied by the Persian detachment.

The great plain mentioned as we turn north toward the village of Eleusis is the Thriasian Plain, so called from the demons of Thria. Half a mile from the salt-springs, toward the plain, is the Tomb of Strato, of which some ruins still remain. Many of the peasants were working at plowing; but what crops can be raised where it does not rain for six months I can hardly understand, save it is by irrigation. The vineyards look more thrifty than could be imagined. I saw signs of irrigation, however, in several places. If water can be applied when needed, a good crop is doubtless secured.

[TO BE CONTINUED]

We hav for sale the lithograph likenesses of the three leading Liberals of this country—Thomas Paine, D. M. Bennett, and R. G. Ingersoll. They are all splendidly executed, and with a neat frame around them—which can be procured from picture-frame makers at slight expense—will be an ornament to any home. They will be sent, secure from breakage, by mail at the following prices: D. M. Bennett and R. G. Ingersoll, 50 cents each; Thomas Paine, $1.

CHAPTER XV.

HOW THE CHRISTIANS CONDUCTED THEMSELVS AMONG THE JEWS.—THEIR RIDICULOUS EXPLANATION OF THE PROPHETS.

The Christians were never able to spread among the Jews as among the gentiles. Those who continued to liv according to the Mosaic law, as Jesus did all his life, and to abstain from eating what they pretended was impure, and who did not proscribe circumcision, were not regarded as a particular class of Jews, such as the Sadducees, Essenians, and Therapeuts. They maintained that they had been injured by the hanging of Jesus Christ, that he was a sainted man sent by God upon earth, and that he was resurrected.

That argument, in truth, was not favored in Jerusalem, nor in the life of Etienne. They replied to it thus, that schism only produced altercations between the strict Jews and the mild Christians. The Christians believed they found passages in the scriptures which could be interpreted in their favor. They pretended that the prophets predicted the coming of Christ and cite in their favor a passage from Isaiah. Speaking to the king, Isaiah says: "Behold, a virgin (Alma) shall conceive and bear a son and shall call his name Immanuel. Butter and honey shall he eat, that he may know to refuse the evil and choose the good. The land that thou abhorrest shall be forsaken of both her kings; . . . . and the Lord shall hiss for the fly that is in the uttermost part of the rivers of Egypt and for the bee that is in the land of Assyria. . . . And in the same day the Lord shall shave with a razor that is hired, . . . the head and the hair of the feet, and it shall also consume the beard." "The Lord said unto me, Take thee a great roll, and write in it with a man's pen concerning Maher-shalal hash-baz [make-speed-to-the-prey]. . . . And I went unto the prophetess, and she conceived and bare a son. Then said the Lord to me, Call his name Maher-shalal-hash-baz" [hasten-quickly-to-the-spoils].*

"Any one can clearly see," says the Christian, "that all this refers to the advent of Jesus Christ. The virgin who bore the child is Mary; Immanuel, or hasten-quickly-to-the-spoils, is Christ, our master. As for the hired razor with which he shaved the hair of the feet of the Assyrian king—why, that is another affair." All these explanations resemble those of Lord Peter in the "Tales of a Tub" (Tonneau), by our friend, Dean Swift.

The Jews answer: "We do not so clearly see that hasten-to-the spoils and Immanuel mean Jesus, and that the young woman of Isaiah is a virgin, and that Alma, which means either a girl or a young woman, signifies Mary." They laugh in the face of Christians.

When the Christians say: "Jesus was predicted to be the patriarch Judah, because the patriarch tied his ass with a vine and washed his mantle in the juice of a vine; Jesus entered Jerusalem upon an ass, therefore Judah was, figurativly speaking, Jesus," the Jews laugh still more at Jesus and his ass.

If they pretend that Jesus was the Shiloh who would come when the scepter no longer ruled in Judea, the Jews can answer them by saying that ever since their captivity in Babylon, and even since the time of Saul, the scepter, or wand, between the legs, has never been in Judea. So the Christians, far from converting the Jews, are despised and hated yet by them. They are regarded as bastards who wish to despoil the children of their home, under the pretext of a false title. They hav renounced all hope of gaining the Jews to their side, and now address themselvs entirely to the Gentiles.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE FALSE CITATIONS AND PREDICTIONS IN THE GOSPELS.

In order to encourage those who were preparing for baptism, it was considered well to quote the ancient prophecies and to rewrite them in an entertaining manner. For this purpose the fathers quoted the books of the ancient prophets without any consideration for truth. Matthew says: "And Joseph came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, He shall be called a Nazarene." No prophet said these words. Matthew speaks without knowledge. Luke ventured to say: "And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth: for the powers of heaven shall be shaken. And then shall they see the Son of Man coming in a cloud with power and great glory. . . . Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass away till all be fulfilled" (Luke, chap. xxi, 25-32).

The generation did pass away; and if nothing comes from all that, it is not my fault. Paul, a little after this, said in his letter to the Thessalonians, "Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air" (1 Thes., chap. iv, 17.)

Every one naturally asks here, What would happen if the deceptions and follies of fanaticism were tested to the utmost? When we see what is swallowed now, instead of as in olden times, the ancient history tales about dreams, the fathers of the church will not fail to say that Luke and Paul intended to predict the destruction of Jerusalem. But what shall I say, I pray, of the destruction of Jerusalem before Jesus came in clouds with power and great glory?*

There is a passage in the gospel attributed to John which proves that the book was not written by a Jew. Jesus says, "A new commandment I giv unto you, That ye love one another" (St. John xiii, 34). This is far from being new. It is in Leviticus, and expressed in a very clear manner: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" (Leviticus xix).

To conclude, whoever will giv himself the trouble to read with attention will find, in all the passages which the disciples quote from the Old Testament, wrong words and false marks on every page.

* Isaiah, chaps. vii, 18, and viii, 1. By what kind of faith do the maddened followers of Christ maintain that Alma always means virgin? There are in the Old Testament twenty passages where the word Alma means woman, or concubine, as, for instance, in the Canticles, chap. vi; Joel, chap. i. Up to the time of the Abbot Tritheme, there was no learned man in the church who understood Hebrew, except Origen, Jerome, and Ephram, unless perhaps it was a Jew. [1771.]

* For a long time the people were so absorbed with the idea that the world was coming to an end that even in the sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth centuries they began their wills thus: "Christ reigns, the end of the world approaches; therefore to protect my soul, I," etc.

The Sabbath in New York.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: While traveling one day last week on the elevated road, a rather old, and, I must say, imbecil looking lady saw fit to hand me, among others, a tract on that most absorbing subject, "The Sabbath." Taking it partly from a desire to see what inane stuff could be put into print in the form of a tract, partly to gratify the woman's mild insanity, I read, as a first paragraph, the law of the state of New York, "There shall be no shooting, hunting, . . . frequenting of tippling-houses . . . on the first day of the week, called Sunday; nor shall any person travel on that day, unless in cases of charity or necessity, or in going to or returning from worship; . . . nor shall there be any servil laboring or working on that day, excepting works of necessity and charity."

This is blue enough for any state, you will admit, and is well calculated, as indeed it is intended, to make us evil-doers who will not believe that three times one makes one, or that it is lawful to defraud our neighbor from his wife so we but repent before the Lord, or that a righteous God ever stopped the whole machinery of the heavens to allow a Jewish chieftain the time to slaughter a few more of that God's images in human flesh. It is well calculated, I say, to make us hardened unbelievers shake in our boots lest the law, awaking from her long slumber, should suddenly seize us by the collar as we stepped out in the street to buy a cigar or giv our children a little fresh air in the park on Sunday. But our terror knows no bounds when this distracted tract winds up by threatening us with the everlasting wrath of God should we any longer persist in breaking the Sabbath by showing our rebellious selvs outside of our dwelling. "Oh, turn not away from it," it entreats in tones of deepest concern, "lest its slighted privileges weigh you down in deep anguish, and woe at the last as you hear this word, 'So I sware in my wrath, They shall not enter into my rest'" (Heb. iii, 11).

This is all very fine, and its salutary effects were exemplified in our staying home this Sabbath to pen down these hurried words, but did the inconsistency of his dramatic appeal and reference to the blue, blue laws of our progressiv state ever strike the able writer of that able pamphlet? How many Christians would escape the penalties of the law were it put in force to-day? How many Christians (probably counting the tract writer in) will, for instance, abstain, and hav their servants, private or public, abstain from "servil laboring or working on Sunday?" Certainly not those with whom, for all their devotion, it has often been our good fortune to eat a good hot dinner after their returning from church in their coach or in an omnibus. How many Christians are there who do not or hav not these things done, saying nothing of Sunday paper reading, novel reading, vulgar jesting, and backbiting of neighbors? How many then will escape the final doom of the Sabbath-breaker, as awfully portrayed by the writer of our awful tract? It seems to me as if echo answered, "How many?" thereby intimating there will be none. Nevertheless, I suppose there do exist or hav existed a few mortals inane enough to keep in mind the blue state law and the lurid heavenly one. But admitting this, it is plain that at the end of time God could not gather enough of them to decently repopulate the frozen and desolated moon. And who can with equanimity contemplate the destiny of the numberless multitudes thus left out in the —— fire?

All of which, without taking in consideration the economic advisability of open air diversions and art or science instruction for the masses on Sunday, goes to show the baneful effect of superstition on the mind. Such inconsistency of belief and practice, of preaching and transgressing, of zeal in proclaiming the law while violating its dictates, would be astounding. Only we reflect that a mind capable of such acrobatic feats of belief as are required by the marvelous tales of the Holy Bible has no longer the faculty of discerning even the grossest contradictions, the most absurb incompatibilities.

Yet this dreadful mental and moral derangement, so produced results in wonderful activity, as instanced in the printing and wide circulation, through the means of humble and contemptible tools, of thousands and millions of these tracts that carry terror to so many weak human hearts and frighten back so many hesitating minds already scouting on the borders of independent thought and belief. Therefore, there is a lesson for us in this—the necessity of exerting ourselvs much more than we hav done heretofore in counteracting these widely disseminated and far as well as minutely reaching influences of what the French so aptly call Ignorantism. It is well the League feels the need of more work. And we hope soon to see the day when Liberal Sunday-schools and Liberal tracts will spread their teachings and reach the millions to-day left at the mercy of biblical tract writers and distributors. With no one to oppose their efforts and counteract the brutalizing effects of their appeals to the lowest elements of the human mind, it is no wonder the "black frocks" hold the multitude in the bonds of ignorance and superstition. Will they keep their ground long when we follow them up and battle with them where we hav so long left them undisturbed masters of the field? Certainly not, if we hav any faith in the capacity of the general mind to discern light from dark, common sense from nonsense, truth from error, if only it be given a chance.

EDMOND GASTINEAU.

Christian Plagiarism and Slander.

The religious press are almost unanimous in their expressions of horror at the charge that Col. Ingersoll is guilty of stealing a temperance speech from Dr. Gunn. The charge has been made and met time after time. Still, in the face of all this, the charge is repeated. The publishers of Dr. Gunn admit the temperance speech was not in the first edition of Gunn's book, but was in the second edition published in 1857. They judge he wrote it, because the style is like that of other articles in the book. Here is one ugly fact for them to meet. In the Mason City Journal of March 4, 1881, published at Mason City, Ill., is an article in which the editor admits that Col. Ingersoll denied the authorship of the speech as soon as his notice was called to it, and the editor charges that Dr. Gunn plagiarized it. With the exception of the following lines: "It does all that and more—it murders the soul. It is the sum of all villainies, the father of all crimes, the mother of abominations, the devil's best friend, and God's worst enemy," the temperance speech was part of a memorial from citizens of Portage County, Ohio, to the legislature, presented in 1837 or 1838. It was published in full in June, 1838, in the Illinois Temperance Herald, edited by A. W. Corey, and published by the Illinois State Temperance Society.

Ingersoll's address to the jury in the Munn trial was published in the Chicago Times of May 23, 1876, and does not contain a single word of the temperance speech. Yet the firm of Rhodes & McClure, who hav done a large business in pirating Col. Ingersoll's copyrighted books and lectures, publish this temperance speech as Col. Ingersoll's. Other Christians at once rush to the task of exposing the plagiarism. Most of them giv Dr. Gunn the credit. Rev. T. J. Reid says it was stolen word for word from a pamphlet published by Rev. Henry Harris, entitled "Old John Barley Corn." The question now is, What Christian stole the speech first?

The most persistent fellow in the exposure business is one who has made this charge of plagiarism the sponsor for other false charges, and who proposes to publish the full text of Ingersoll's lectures, with his reply. He thus publishes himself to the world as a thief of another man's property, and then assails that man's character. The church is welcome to its witness. If such a man as he is the result of revealed religion, of infinit faith, of the saving results of immersion, and such men are to be the elect, special attendants of the Almighty in heaven, it is better to believe in the utter annihilation of the saints as well as sinners. It is better to accept Materialism than a heaven full of such sainted spirits.

B.

California Letter.—Concluded.

Another all night's ride found me at Blalock, a station on the rail, on the Columbia, kept by B. W. Griffin, a red-hot reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who kindly cared for me while I rested and slept, waiting for the down train to Portland. He would take no money for my bill, and in addition gave me three dollars for your paper for one year. So I go happy again, for I had already forgiven that poor ignorant creature who threw the brick at me.

Reaching Portland on time, I found that I was already advertised for a course of lectures, which I opened the following Sunday on "Evolution; or, The World we Liv In," to a fine audience of bright and good people. I gave eight lectures at this time, being the seventh course of lectures given here within the past eight years.

By request I repeated my lecture on "Romanism and Our Schools," as the people of Portland are quite awake to the inroads of this Catholic mother of abominations, which drew a column and a half of wormwood and gall from the Catholic Sentinel of this city. By vote of the audience I promised to lecture on "Mind, Matter, and Spirit," on my return from up the Willamette; circumstances preventing, for which I am sorry and can only express my thanks to Mr. Beal, the President of the Liberal society here, as also to Walter Hyde, Father Hamilton, Mr. Robinson, Dr. Truesdell, and others.

Now I must bring my letter to a close, lest I transcend the limit of space kindly placed at my disposal.

But in justice to the friends and readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER in this far-off land by the sea, let me mention as briefly as I can the remaining appointments of this trip, that I may not appear to slight those people whose hearts and hands are ever ready to respond to the cause of truth.

Taking leave of Portland, I struck a bee-line for Eagle Creek, to giv three lectures, at the urgent solicitation of two constant readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

These people are cut off from the surging tide of human life which beats and throbs in the towns and cities, and yet through your paper and books their souls keep time and step to the music of reform.

Country people are usually good listeners, and I found them so in this case. They had never been favored with a Liberal lecture before, none but Christian preachers having ever attempted to stir the mental waters of this community, of which but a few silly sheep would drink, while the goats or sinners stood back, waiting for somebody to come and appeal to their reason and common sense.

We had no right to expect a large audience here in the woods, twelve miles from the railroad, with only eight or ten houses in sight, but I was agreeably surprised by finding not less than two hundred people seated in a fine, large hall, just finished, and to be dedicated to Freethought on this occasion.

So you may depend I braced up to the work with as full a tide of inspiration as though speaking in Paine Hall in Boston.

I gave three lectures here, with the promis to do so some more next year. I left these good people, thinking what a power for good two live men may be, if they are not selfish and stingy. A whole neighborhood for twelve miles around may be pleased, warmed, and fed through a little effort on the part of two live men, such as your subscribers and my friends, H. Wilburn and H. McElsander, of Eagle Creek, Oregon, at whose home I found rest and comfort during my short stay.

My thanks are due to others here, who chipped in to pay their preacher—as they called it, to help the cause—and one, a lady, who would not care to hav her name mentioned, put five dollars in my hand, with blessings on my head. Of her religion I only know her Bible is THE TRUTH SEEKER, and one of her gods is now at Jerusalem in the Holy Land.

So I left Eagle Creek, about forty dollars better in pocket and a thousand dollars better in spirit, and pitched my camp a day's march nearer home, at Silverton, a fine village in one of the richest sections of Oregon, about fifteen miles from Salem.

This town is preëminently an Infidel town, and, although an old town, has so far escaped the deviltry of sectarianism, for there is not a church in it. Score one for Silverton and two for Thomas Paine. And as I stood on the schoolhouse green and noted the large number of bright faces full of glee and gladness, I thought, How passable and refreshing to know that all the elements of a true and natural life may be reached through the schoolmaster without the priest!

I gave four lectures here to large and attentiv audiences.

My thanks are due to many friends here, and especially to the young ladies for their songs, in spite of the refusal of the Sunday-school organ, bought with the people's money for public use. But it is dedicated to God now by a handful of the meek and lowly, and hence is too good for human uses.

So it would be with the church, if they should succeed in cheating the people into the building of a chapel to memorize President Garfield, the last new dodge for Christ's sake. There are stanch Republicans and loyal Democrats here who mourn our nation's loss. But they love humanity too well to build a so-called free chapel, to be dedicated to the Christian God.

My next appointment found me on time at the picturesque and thriving town of Brownsville, twenty miles from Albany. This little town has six churches, and is almost rotten with so-called religion and bored to death with boomerang preachers and religious hypocrits, and yet moral life and true virtue starve under the shadow of these god-houses. The Baptist preacher here favored us with his presence at the close of his service on Sunday night, which was short and thinly attended.

He came in good time. My topic was, "The Religion of Nature vs. Creeds and Dogmas." My audience was good, and steam was well up, but somehow he did not take kindly to my style of handling sacred humbugs, but grew hot and beat a hasty retreat—I suppose to pray for me.

What cowards these godly men are! I go often to hear them, and quietly submit to a deluge of hell-fire and damnation nonsense and never think of getting mad. But then they are all right and I am all wrong, you know.

The Liberals at Brownsville are prompt, and left nothing undone to make our work a success. Our thanks are due to M. B. Crane, C. Hodes, and others whose names hav slipped my memory, for many expressions of kindness. With a promis to come again, I took my departure in good spirits for Halsey, a little town twelve miles from Albany, as full of religion as a dog is of fleas, with two churches, in which fashionable lies are told, but not a hall or public place where the truth may find utterance.

But somehow, real good women are always on my side, and so it happened here. The landlady of the best hotel gave me the use of her dining-room for the lecture, which I gave, served as hot as possible to meet the exigencies of the case, as I was to speak but once here on my way to Lebanon.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has a few stanch supporters here, among whom are F. A. Powell, Chas. Duyer, and Postmaster Koontz, and I thank them, together with the landlady, for all their kindness.

After a short but pleasant ride by rail I reached the splendid little town of Lebanon, grown double in size since my visit here six years since.

I gave four lectures here with great success, the last being followed by a social dance, which is in perfect keeping with my religion.

My thanks are due here to A. H. Peterson, a warm friend of the cause, and a true man. Also to Messrs. Cloughton, Seattle, and Irwin, all strong friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

On reaching Albany I found that I was well advertised for one lecture only on "Romanism and Our Schools." As the theater has recently been burned, no place except the court-house could be obtained, and that only for one night.

My audience was good, and I regretted that I could not giv a full course of lectures here at this time.

Albany is a prosperous town, with a fine water power, and is the finest business point between Portland and Roseburg, the present terminus of the rail.

Many thanks are due to my friends Mansfield, John Usher, G. B. Bruce, Mr. Richards, and others.

With a promis to come again in the near future, I left by stage for Corvalis, a handsome town on the bank of the Willamette, ten miles from Albany, where I gave two lectures.

This town is literally cursed with religion and a stupid indifference as to whether Christ was before the flood or after it.

Here liv Father and Mother Grimsley, almost ninety years of age. They were out to both lectures as bright as a dollar. They are the dread of all the hypocrits in town, hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER from the first, and swear by Bennett.

My thanks are due to one man, whom I would not forget for my right eye. He alone paid for the city hall two nights, advertised the lectures, gave me the comforts of a good home in his family, and money besides; and when I left Portland he said he was glad I came, and hoped I would come again, as the money he had invested was put to good use.

This man is a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hates all liars and shams. His book-case is full of volumes bearing the imprint of D. M. Bennett. He signs his name, B. F. Hyland.

And now, thanks to the pilot and engineer of the finest and fastest ship on the coast, the steamship State of California, I landed in 'Frisco safe and sound, to meet wife and children once more.

Remaining in the city over Sunday, I had the pleasure of meeting with many old friends of the First Society of Spiritualists in Ixora Hall, presided over by a lady president, Mrs. Matthews, and ministered to by Mrs. Watson, from Pennsylvania—and a fine speaker and noble woman she is, and as radical as fire, cutting clear to the bone of the old orthodox carcass. Dr. Dean Clark is here, just returned from the northwest, where he has been doing good work in the lecture field.

I am now at my home in San Jose, resting up for a few weeks, after which I shall do some work in Stockton, Sacramento, Modesto, Merced, and Fresno City. I want to say to the friends at Grand Round, Baker City, Prairie City, Canon City, and various points in southern Oregon, that I am sorry I could not reach them this trip, but hope to start north again next May overland from San Jose to Boise in Idaho, and from thence down the Columbia to Seattle and other points on Puget Sound.

With many good wishes for THE TRUTH SEEKER and its editors both at home and abroad, I am yours for every good word and work, J. L. YORK.

Atonement.

I believe in the Atonement.

On a visit to the land of my nativity, at St. Armand Station, a gentleman of Philipsburg came board. He, too, was going to Montreal. I asked if he was acquainted in Montreal. He said he was. I said, "Please tell me the best hotel." He responded, "Go to the Albion; I'll introduce you to the coachman; I will be there by and by and introduce you to my friends."

He came and introduced me to quite a respectable company, thusly: "Here is a gentleman who has come to visit the land of his nativity after an absence of more than three-quarters of a century. He says so, and were it anybody else I'd not believe a word of it."

They expressed surprise, and wanted to know how I had preserved my vitality.

I replied, "I've been a Shaker most of my life; that cuts off one heavy drain upon vitality."

One gentleman replied: "That's so, that accounts for it. You're a Catholic, you're not a Romanist; there are many Romanists that are not Catholics, but you are a genuin Catholic."

I responded, "I'll admit that Catholics hav all the religion, outside of Shakerdom, that is of any practical value."

One gentleman replied, "The Catholics hav the best religion, if lived up to; if not lived up to, it makes the biggest devils. For instance, here is my case."

With as much childlike simplicity as if I had been his confessor, he gave the history of his departure from purity and right, until about to make the final plunge, "when something struck me here" (striking his breast). "It was my religion! From that day till now I have been working my passage back. I find it an up-hill business, but it must be done."

That gentleman was making the "Atonement."

Let every "backslider" make the Atonement. The sooner he begins the better. The further he slides down, the further he'll hav to climb up, and he'll find it an up-hill business. Amen.

PRENTISS.

Col. John R. Kelso.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER. Sir: I am much pleased to learn by THE TRUTH SEEKER that Col. Kelso of California is to take the Liberal lecture field. I heard the colonel at the Chicago Congress, and was more than delighted with him. He is physically and mentally every inch a man, and a most eloquent speaker. His terms are liberal and he should be invited to speak in every town in this country.

H. L. GREEN.

THE Prussian National Gazette states that a few days ago Prince Bismarck received a Jewish gentleman, owner of a large manufacturing establishment, as a guest at his country seat. In reply to an inquiry whether he approved of the anti-Jewish agitation, the Prince readily answered: "Certainly not; nothing can be more unjust. I am most decidedly opposed to this agitation against the Jews, whether from the point of view of religion or race. With equal right they could one day fall upon Germans of Polish or French extraction and say they were no Germans. That the Jews show a predilection for trade is a matter of taste; their previous exclusion from all other professions may, perhaps, well justify it. But it is certainly not warrantable to talk about their superior wealth in that inflammatory way which I find wholly contemptible, as being calculated to excite the envy and hatred of the multitude. I will never agree to the constitutional rights of the Jews being restricted in any way. The intellectual organization of the Jews in general inclines them to criticism, and the greater number of them, therefore, are on the side of the Opposition; but I make no distinction between Christian and Jewish opponents of my economic policy, which I conscientiously hold to be profitable for the nation."

If evils come not, then our fears are vain;
And if they do, fear but augments the paine.

More Canadian Tyranny.

The Canadian custom house authorities are bound to write themselvs down as bigoted asses. It was to be expected that after seizing Paine's "Age of Reason" and Voltaire's "Pocket Theology" the collector of Toronto would hold on to them, because to rescind his decision would be to stultify himself and practically say to the world that he did not know what he was doing, and besides it would not be orthodox, for those peculiar gentry hav the characteristic of never learning or forgetting anything. But we did not expect, in view of the action of the Freethinkers of Canada and the attitude of the Canadian press, that the bigoted Christian who has control of the custom house would proceed further in his intolerant censorship of the literature which the people of Canada may choose to read. We thought it impossible in these times for hatred of heretics to go further than it has in the matter of heretical writings. In this, however, we were mistaken. Mr. Patton has evidently taken a slice of the sixteenth century and inserted it into the nineteenth. He has now seized Paine's "Rights of Man," "Common Sense," "Crisis," and Volney's "Ruins of Empires." It is apparent that the collector does not know what he is doing, and that he has never read the books he has detained in his house, for there is but little—next to no—theological opinions in Paine's political works. As to Volney's "Ruins," it has passed unchallenged for years. No Christian heretofore has even dreamed he could lay his hands on it and call it either blasphemous or obscene. But here comes this Canadian Don Quixote and fearlessly grapples with this enemy of his faith. That by so doing he is making himself the laughing-stock of all well-read men and women is nothing to him. So long as he imagins he can serve his God and his church he is willing to be not only a butt of ridicule, but to play the part of petty tyrant in a way that all decent people would abhor. This collector is evidently afraid of the name of Paine. The name has the same effect upon him that a red flag has upon a Spanish bull. For there is not in Paine's political writings a single sentence which could be objected to by the most violent Presbyterians, who are the meanest of all religious sects. The value to this country of Paine's "Common Sense" and "Crisis" are well known. They were more terrible than an army to the British, for they inspired the colonial armies to fight on for liberty and independence when they could not see a "star of hope in all the wide horizon of despair." The "Rights of Man" is Paine's unanswerable reply to Burke's infamous attack upon the French Revolution. The arguments are unequaled by any contemporaneous writer. As to Volney's "Ruins," everybody knows that if that book is to be tabooed by Christian censors, two-thirds of the best literature of this or any age must be denied the Canadian people. It cannot even be construed to be blasphemous except by such intolerant ignoramuses as the collector of customs at Toronto and his backers. Some time ago he seized some of Ingersoll's lectures, but they were released from his clutch. If he is going to build a fence between this country and Canada over which Volney's "Ruins" and Paine's political works cannot pass, he will hav to build it close and strong enough to stop not only Ingersoll but Draper, Huxley, Tyndall, Haeckel, and all the scholars who do not begin at Genesis and finish at Revelations.

That the people of Canada will submit to this petty despot's spite is a matter which can hav but one answer. If he persists in his course he will feel the weight of an outraged people's anger. If his party continues to sustain him it is only a matter of time when that party must go to the wall. Sir John A. Macdonald, the premier of Canada, is a statesman who appears not able to see this at present, for he has denied Mr. Cooke a hearing, intimating that he can do nothing, but that the case is one for the departments of customs and justice to decide. The department of customs has already given its infamous verdict, and it looks as though there were no justice to be had in a country which tolerates such high-handed outrages. But there may be, and we hope the Canadian people will, like Bradlaugh, carry their case clear to the House of Lords, and then appeal to the people before submitting to hav their reading matter revised for them like a parcel of school children.

It is pleasant to know that the press is as outspoken in condemning this latest outrage as it was in the previous case. The Toronto Telegram denounced the proceeding in no uncertain tones, and in commenting upon the rebuke administered by the London Free Press the Toronto World says:

"The London Free Press is severe upon the Toronto collector of customs for his second seizure of books. It puts the case much as it has been put in these columns before now. It is needless to demonstrate again and again that upon the literary shelves of many of our best citizens will be found such works as Volney's 'Ruins of Empires' and Paine's 'Age of Reason,' to say nothing of many others much more objectionable to puritanical and orthodox criticism. Not to possess and read Shakspere, to say nothing of Ovid, whom Mr. Crooks has condemned to be burned by the hangman, is to argue one's self illiterate, and we hav no doubt that Mr. Patton would permit Shakspere to pass through his sieve without a murmur. Yet there are things in Shakspere, Christian gentleman that he was, which Paine would not hav stooped to write.

"When the Free Press leaves Mr. Patton to belabor the minuter of customs, it proceeds logically, and, for a Tory organ, courageously. It tells Mr. Bowell, right at the heels of the great Tory convention, that his 'instructions to his officers smack of intolerance and reek with bigotry.' And if it had added that he has never read enough of any matter to be in a position to giv such instructions, it would hav piled truth upon truth. Our London contemporary asks why such 'Russianized methods, not to be tolerated by a free people,' are not practised upon the library at Ottawa?

"Emerson says that Methodists are saved by grace and Episcopalians by taste. Mr. Bowell thinks that Canadians are to be saved by book seizures."

We do not believe that seizure of all the heretical books sought to be introduced into what the custom officer evidently believes to be his pocket-borough will stop the spread of Freethought. If books cannot be imported they will be printed in Canada, and Messrs. Patton and Bowell can hardly hav authority to break all the printing-presses and melt up all the type in the Dominion. The two alleged gentlemen will find that what the people want they will hav, even though they thereby incur their august displeasure. It will undoubtedly take several little custom officers to effectually suppress Infidelity. Comstock, of this country, is meaner than either Patton or Bowell. Yet even his meanness was not sufficient to suppress Freethought, its newspapers and books. He has sunk into deserved obloquy, and we trust the time is not far distant when the two Canadian bigots will be laid in the same grave of dishoner. The world is bound to move ahead, and these little chunks of filth are not sufficient to stop its revolutions. By getting in the way they only flatten themselvs.

United States Postal Tyranny.

When writing about the Canadian custom house tyranny, we little thought that we should hav to chronicle an outrage worse, if possible, than that of Messrs. Patton and Bowell, perpetrated upon our old friend, Dr. Foote, by the officials of our own post-office. His letter will explain the situation better than any words of ours. As the case now stands, the Health Monthly is paying postage to Canada and then being destroyed by the postal officers of the United States. Such arbitrary proceedings are an outrage upon the rights of any and every American citizen. But it seems that there is no redress, as the post-office men are the sole judges, under the law, of what is mailable at second-class rates, or mailable at all. Such law is not good for a republic. There should be some apppeal from decisions such as the one Dr. Foote says has been made in his case, according to the following letter:

120 LEXINGTON AVE., N. Y., Dec. 5, 1881.

FRIEND MACDONALD: As I am sure that a good many of your subscribers take the Health Monthly, would you do me the favor to put in a little item to the effect that our November number has been practically suppressed by the U. S. government? Having received complaints from all quarters that the Health Monthly for November had not been received, we took pains to look around among our subscribers about the city, and found that no one had received a copy, although they were all mailed from Canada before the end of October. On applying at the New York post-office to know why the New York subscribers had not received their papers, we were coolly informed by Auditor Blakeslee that if they had reached the New York office they would hav been put into the waste-paper basket. He claims that the postal authorities of Canada violate their treaty with the United States by putting us in as second-class. As we hav to guarantee the payment of the transient rates in case the decision is against us in Ottawa, it will therefore be seen that we hav to pay postage at the regular transient rate, and than hav our paper go into the waste! As our December Monthly was out about a week or more ago, that has probably gone the same way as the November number.

Yours truly, E. B. FOOTE.

Fewer Fools or Hypocrits.

There has come over the very Christian Dr. McCosh a wonderful streak of honesty. He is reported as owning the fact that there is a decrease in the number of young men who appear anxious to devote their lives to propagating lies and upholding superstition. The Christian Union also cannot deny the fact, and givs its opinion as to the cause. It seems to us the reasons are sufficient not only to deter young men from entering the ministry, but affords excellent grounds for rejecting the Bible scheme of the "fall" and redemption of man in its entirety. Between growing up a minister of the Talmage stripe—the only kind that succeed in making a noise in the world—and committing suicide, we think any young man of ordinary self-respect would prefer the latter. From the reasons of the Christian Union—which lakes the matter seriously to heart—why the ranks of able preachers are decreasing, we quote:

"One reason is not far to seek. We can best interpret it by a biographical sketch—not altogether fancy.

"A young man enters college, with a real though possibly not very deep or very intelligent piety, and a sincere, though perhaps not very resolute, purpose to enter the Christian ministry. But he has been brought up wholly on traditional theology. He has been taught at home and at church, in family and in Sunday-school instruction, to regard the Bible as the very words of God. He has been brought up to believe in a six days' creation of the world, in a six thousand years' age of man, in a literal temptation of a first pair by a conversational serpent. He has heard theories of the antiquity of the race and the development of the species referred to in the pulpit only to be sneered at as exploded, or assailed as Atheistic. He gets to college, and he discovers to his amazement that no scientific men believe in a six days' creation, or a six thousand years' age of man; and very few in a literal fall. If at college his professor of moral philosophy and his professor of biology were in spiritual accord, he would perhaps effect a change of opinion without an impairment of faith. But, after learning all the week that innumerable scientific indications in the mounds of America and the chalk beds of England and the lakes of Switzerland point to an age of man running back many times six thousand years, he is taught from the pulpit, as before, the origin of man in Eden, and the fall of the race in Adam, 4004 B.C.. The date is even printed in his latest Bagster Bible. He becomes perplexed. He becomes, not a disbeliever, not a misbeliever, but an unbeliever. He is told, with great earnestness and all possible gravity, that the whole system of revealed religion depends on the Mosaic story of the creation and the fall; that to deny Moses is to deny Christ; that to deny Christ is to deny God; that to doubt the 4004 B.C. is to be an Atheist. He is not an Atheist; he has no sympathy with Ingersoll; he still desires to believe in God, prayer, Christ, the Bible. But he cannot believe, at all events he does not believe any longer, what he has been taught from his infancy to regard as the 'fundamentals;' and the intellectual bewilderment which ensues he rightly judges is no fitting preparation for a religious teacher.

"If now he comes to the right conclusion that doubtful disputations about the mode of creation, the antiquity of the race, the origin of sin, the method by which humanity has been brought into its present condition, and its biological relations to other races are no part of religion; that the world is equally God's, whether made in six days or six eons; that man is equally God's, whether he was created 4004 B.C., or developed out of a lower race in some remote and prehistoric antiquity; that sin is sin, whether Adam ate forbidden fruit or no; and temptation is temptation, whether the first tempter was an erect serpent or no; and discarding all such doubtful disputations, he resolves to enter the pulpit to preach Christ as a savior from sin, real, actual, every-day sin—sin in 1881 A.D., not 4004 B.C.—he finds an angel with a flaming sword guarding the pulpit against all such preachers. The Methodist church, which has just driven Dr. Thomas out of the pulpit for doubting the dogma of endless suffering, says, 'You cannot preach here.' The Presbyterian church, which has just ejected Robertson Smith for teaching that Deuteronomy was written in the days of the captivity, says, 'You cannot preach here.' The Baptists, who hav just refused to send abroad as foreign missionaries two devoted ministers of the gospel because they doubted the doctrin of plenary inspiration, says, 'You cannot preach here.' The Congregationalists, who hav just been agitating the question of setting up a guillotin, and who hav only been prevented from beheading heretics because they had none, say, 'Look out how you try to preach here.' What is the result? The majority of men who think for themselvs turn aside from a path beset by so many hostilities from without and so many suspicions from within to professions in which every doubt is a legitimate road to inquiry, and every inquiry is a broad, traveled highway to final and positiv conviction."

This, it seems to us, is an important admission by an evangelical newspaper. It shows that the church is fast breaking up. It is riven with doubts and beset with all sorts of difficulties in keeping the brain of the country within its folds. Already the brightest, bravest, and best are outside, and it looks as though they would be followed by all who hav strength of mind enough to think at all for themselvs on theological subjects—subjects of the gravest importance to the human race, inasmuch as at present the race is feeding and clothing thousands and thousands of men, for no earthly or unearthly good, who are doing incalculable harm in telling the people what they hav guessed about a world which they hav supposed exists. We are far from sorry to see the church losing the great power she has so long unworthily wielded. We see in her decline nothing but good to the human race. In her downfall we see the uprising of science, the supplanting of error by truth, of guess-work by facts, of prayer by work, of faith by reason, of ignorance by knowledge. It will be a glorious day when men are really free and the great majority of the world does not cast itself upon its face before the idols of a barbaric superstition.

"The Godly Women of the Bible."

Owing to repeated illnesses of the Ungodly Woman, the publication of this history of the female ornaments of the Bible has been long delayed, but we are happy to announce that it is at last completed, and ready for mailing to whoever wishes a copy. It makes a book of nearly three hundred and fifty pages. Its title-page is adorned with a syllogistic proposition which shows the absurdity of Biblical reasoning, and it is dedicated, hopefully, to the believers in plenary inspiration. It takes up nearly all the women who figure in the Bible, and shows just what they were. Among the characters treated are: Sarah, Mrs. Lot and her nameless daughters, Rebekah, Leah and Rachel, Tamar (Judah's mother-in-law), divers women, Rahab the harlot, various godly women, the Levite's concubine, Naomi and Ruth, Hannah, Michal, Abagail, Bathsheba, Tamar the sister of Absalom, ten concubines, Abishag and Bathsheba, Elijah's widow woman, Elisha's women, Jezebel, Athalia and Huldah, Queen Vashti and Esther, Mrs. Job and Hosea's women, Elizabeth and Mary, the Virgin Mary, genealogy of the Virgin Mary, a summary of the godly grandmothers and mothers of Mary, Joseph, and Jesus, the sisters of Lazarus, the anointing scenes, five women (Mary Magdalene, Joanna, Susanna, and other Mary and Salome), the woman of Samaria, the women taken in adultery, Herodias and her daughter Salome, sundry women, sundry nameless women healed and comforted by Jesus, the apostolic women, etc.

The facts are taken from the scripture, and the com ments are in the Ungodly Woman's inimitable style. Those who hav read it in THE TRUTH SEEKER will want to read it again, and those who hav not will miss a treat unless they order immediately. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Radical Pulpit

Is now completed and will be mailed to all applicants on receipt of one dollar. It comprises the following discourses by O. B. Frothingham: "The New Song of Christmas," "The Departed Years," "Life as a Test of Creed," "The Sectarian Spirit," "The American Gentleman," "The Dogma of Creed," "The Value of the Higher Sentiments," "The American Lady," "The Consolations of Rationalism;" and the following by Prof. Felix Adler: "The Ethics of the Social Question," "Emancipation," "Anniversary Lecture," "Our Leaders," "Hav we still a Religion?" "Conscience."

The reputations of the two gentlemen are too well known to need any words of commendation. These lectures are some of their best utterances.

Three New Pamphlets.

We hav just had printed and bound three new books, which we shall be happy to supply to all who wish them. They are:

Science and Theology: Ancient and Modern. By James Anthony Eroude. Price, 25 cents.

The Pyramid of Gizeh. The Relation of Ancient Egyptian Civilization to the Hebrew Narrativs in Genesis and Exodus, and the Relativ Claims of Moses and the Pyramid to Inspiration Considered. By Van Buren Denslow, LL.D. Price, 25 cents.

Ecce Diabolus, in which the worship of Yahveh, or Jehovah, is shown to be devil worship, with some observations upon the horrible and cruel ordinance of bloody sacrifice and burnt-offerings. By the Very Rev. Evan Davies, D.D., LL.D., Arch-Druid of Great Britain. Price, 25 cents.

The title pages of these little works giv a good and clear idea of their contents and nature, and the authors' names are guarantees of the ability with which the subjects are treated. The classic scholarship of Froude and Denslow is acknowledged by all, and Mr. Davies, the Arch Druid, is fully competent to tell of the early traditions of Judaism. As an initiated bard of the Drudic order he is well prepared to prove that the most notable gods of the orientals were only symbols and bardic myths deified.

As a historian Froude's reputation is world-wide, as is Denslow's for industry and ability in Egyptology.

A GREAT many of THE TRUTH SEEKER subscribers act as though they thought we did not mean it when we asked them to pay up. Now, we hope none will think we do not need the money, for we do. THE TRUTH SEEKER has no source of income but from its subscribers, and as it takes a great deal of money to maintain so large a paper, we are in need of every dollar due us. We ask all to examin their tabs and if they find themselvs in arrears to promptly remit. We only want what is honestly due us, but we do want that, and we would like to hav it immediately. Friends, don't delay.

WE would ask our friends who write us to change their post-office to always be careful to giv the old address as well as the new one, as it will save much unnecessary work in the office and enable the change to be made more quickly.

THE price of the elegant busts of Col. Ingersoll has been reduced to $1.50. They are cabinet size, the same as hav been heretofore sold for $2.50. They are splendid likenesses of the great Liberal, besides being fine parlor ornaments. By writing to us any one can hav them sent by express.

As we go to press the Institute of Heredity is holding a two days' convention at Republican Hall, this city. Three sessions a day are held. The Wednesday morning session was addressed by Loring Moody. He will be followed during the day by Messrs. Walsh, Newton, Samson, and Buchanan. Thursday will be devoted to reading of letters and discussions. In the evening Stephen P. Andrews and Samuel P. Putnam will speak, the former upon "Heredity: Its Place in the Scale of Subjects for Scientific Investigation," and the latter upon the "Philosophical Aspects of the Question."

Book Notices.

I hav been much interested in the little pamphlet, "Science and Theology: Ancient and Modern," by James Anthony Froude. It opens with a truism which all who reflect a moment must own to be a fact: "Each generation thinks highly of its own importance, and inclines to believe that it will mark an epoch in human history."

The book givs a digest of the teachings and sayings of Lucretius, a celebrated Roman writer and poet, one of the boldest Freethinkers and Materialists of ancient and modern times. He was born 96 B.C., and was a disciple of the great and good Epicurus. He taught the same philosophy that his celebrated master did, and his eloquent exhortations against unworthy ambitions, cruelty, luxury, lust, and all dishonest pleasures of the body, as well as all turbulent pleasures of the mind, hav never been excelled by any. He taught the "original generation of man from the teeming earth, and the production, at the beginning of the world, of a variety of defectiv monsters, which were not allowed to multiply their kinds;" that nothing could ever be made from nothing; and that nothing can ever be annihilated and returned to nothing. These ideas, conclusions, and utterances Mr. Froude compares with the Materialistic philosophy of the present day, and finds but a trifling progress in all the years between. The Lucretian creed was a noble one, and was "naturally accepted by resolute men who were too proud to play intellectual tricks with themselvs, . . . while the multitude continued their offerings at the temple, consulted the oracles, or affected to pray to the gods." Just as they do now. One cannot help thinking of the lines of Lincoln's favorit poem as he reads of the similarity between the ideas of the old Roman philosophers and the thinkers and scholars of to-day.

"So the multitude comes, even those we behold,
To repeat every tale that has ever been told.
For we are the same our fathers have been;
We see the same sights our fathers hav seen;
We drink the same stream and see the same sun,
And run the same course our fathers hav run.
The thoughts we are thinking our fathers would think,
From the death we are shrinking our fathers would shrink,
To the life we are clinging they also would cling,
But it speeds from us all like a bird on the wing."

I hope all our readers will enjoy this book as I hav, and feel grateful to the publishing house of D. M. Bennett for having given so many good, interesting, and useful books to the world.

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE BIBLE. By Bronson C. Keeler. Price 75 cents. For sale at this office.

This is one of the best little books that has been printed for a long time. It has received the favorable commendation of many prominent Liberals as being what its name implies—a short and thorough history of the Jewish Bible, and a popular account of the formation and development of the canon. In writing the book, brevity has always been kept in view, as the books heretofore written upon the subject are too voluminous for the average busy man or busy woman to study. And yet about all of importance upon the subject is presented. The Bible is shown to be an unsatisfactory record of the doings of semi-barbarians, and the canon the work of ignorant and incompetent men, among whom there was not one scholar distinguished for historical learning; not one who was fitted by special study for the examination of a subject in which the truth could alone be determined by the voice of antiquity. The fact is emphasized that the Catholic Bible is not what God said it should be, but what such men as above described said it should be. The absurdity of the positions maintained at various times by the religious world is shown by the fact that

"The Eastern church, which had for one thousand three hundred years declared persistently that Revelation was not written by John, and was not entitled to a place in the Bible, wheeled squarely about, and in a council held in Jerusalem in 1672, adopted the decree of Trent, Revelations and all, and to-day considers Revelations as much the word of God as any other book."

How the Protestant church came to substitute Bible-worship for church-worship is thus shown, and with this quotation we must end our notice of a book which could advantageously be quoted entire:

"The Protestant church is a book-worshiper. It makes a fetich of a book. The Catholics care little for the Bible, and ever hav. They say, 'Take away the whole book if you like, and the church will still remain in all its power. The book is the creation of the church, not the church the creation of the book.' The Protestants, finding themselvs confronted with an infallible church, had to oppose it with an infallible book. And they made a book infallible which before had not been considered so. And well they might, for they were compelled to. It is commonly the case that the overthrow of one superstition is only accomplished by the establishment of another in its place. By friction and contrast the two will in time wear each other away. But those minds hav been exceedingly few which could reject a theology and retain the calm equipoise, the philosophical attitude of non-belief in any. The Catholics had the prestige of antiquity and of being considered the only true church of God, and they threatened with eternal damnation every man who followed Luther. The masses of the people of the North, ignorant and superstitious, were naturally terrified and cowed by the awful threat, and the only wonder is that they ever stood before the storm. To meet it, Luther, Calvin, and others said that the Bible was supernaturally inspired. The origin of the books having been forgotten, men, credulous and in trouble, came to think that because the books were written of God they were written by God. The reformers declared that the Bible and not the church was the sole source of authority. This succeeded, and the thunders of the Vatican were answered by the thunders of artillery. Armies swept across the face of Europe, and it was amid the roar of cannon, the shock of battle, and the shrieks of the dying that the doctrin of the divine and infallible inspiration of the Bible grew."

An Open Letter to Talmage.

MR. TALMAGE, BROOKLYN, N. Y., Rev. Sir: In your sermon of Nov. 20th you take special pains to throw stones at some of your betters; notably Mr. D. M. Bennett of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who is now on his way around the world, where his many friends hav sent him. And as your sermons are pretty widely read, I deem it no more than justice that you be set right in some of your wild assertions, which you stand in the pulpit and hurl with all the venom and spite of a sixteenth-century persecutor at one of nature's noblemen, and as good as ever pounded a Bible, or led in prayer at a country prayer-meeting. Although you do not mention his name, it is easy to guess who you mean when you say that "one of the worst of the men who had been sending obscene papers through the mail was tried, condemned, and put in prison. President Hayes was applied to for pardon, but having examined the case and finding there was no excuse, and no mitigating circumstances for the villainy, he refused to pardon the culprit.

"Then a society of so-called Liberals passed a resolution of deepest sympathy for this filthy creature, and the resolution was presented by Robert Ingersoll and passed with great enthusiasm."

Now, in the above quotation, you hav either ignorantly or maliciously misrepresented the facts in the case; for, when you say that D. M. Bennett is one of the worst men who had been sending obscene literature through the mails, I must inform you that Mr. Bennett does not belong to the American Bible Society, who send out more filth and obscenity every time they mail a Bible than Mr. Bennett and all the Infidels is the United States ever penned (that was not quoted from the Bible). In fact, the very pamphlet, for the sending of which Mr. Bennett was sent to prison, was examined by the Attorney General of the United States, and pronounced "not obscene." And even President Hayes said that he could not see that Bennett had committed any crime, and had even gone so far as to order a pardon made out, when remonstrances from all the churches and Young Men's Christian Associations in the country, added to the personal appeals of the clergy (who hav always favored persecution for Christ's sake), were brought to bear upon a weak president, and it was decided to keep the "old Infidel" in prison, and to break down the paper of which he was the editor. But, in spite of it all, the paper livs and flourishes to-day, with probably double the number of subscribers which it would hav had if the church had let its editor alone.

And I am thankful to Infidels that to-day there exists a country upon earth where one-horse preachers and bigoted postmasters cannot define the word obscenity as suits their individual notions.

And now, Mr. Talmage, as you propose to demonstrate that "Christianity is the mother of all virtue, and Infidelity is the mother of all vices;" and, as in all probability, if you are honest, you want your proof to reach the greatest number of Infidels, I propose that you write out your proofs of the same and present them for publication to THE TRUTH SEEKER; and as I know that Infidels are, generally speaking, seekers after truth, there is no doubt but you can accomplish a great amount of good and reach those who are most in need of your medicin. For, if Christianity is true, the Infidel, of all persons, is the most in danger of hell fire, as only by faith we are saved, not by works. But after saying that any man who could petition Congress for the repeal of the obscenity laws is a foe to every decent man in America, and offers an insult to every clean-minded and pure-hearted man in Christendom, in all probability you will feel ashamed to look an Infidel in the face, and instead of seeking Infidels out and proving to their face that they are hugging to their bosoms such a vile monster as the "mother of all vice," they, on the contrary, will hav to hunt for you in that "coward's castle," the pulpit of Brooklyn Tabernacle, where you can squirt slime through your big-bored squirt-gun without the danger of getting yourself besmeared.

You also say that it is very remarkable that there are more of the publishers of these obscene books living in the City of Churches (Brooklyn) than in any other city of the United States. I do not think there is anything remarkable about it, for the churches and the Bible God hav dealt in those articles called obscenity and nastiness from time immemorial. And, to conclude, if we are going to hav a government in which every postmaster is to be the judge of what constitutes obscenity and morality, and as Christianity claims to possess all the morality and all the virtue, let us join the church to the state, and burn and hang, draw and quarter. every one who does not bow down and say that three is one and one is three. Yours, etc., T. J. ELLSWORTH.

Liberty, Science, and Humanity.

The Harmony and Meaning of the Scientific Gospels.

TWO LECTURES DELIVERED BEFORE THE N. Y. LIBERAL CLUB BY T. B. WAKEMAN.

LECTURE I.

THE OBJECTIVE ORDER.—CONTINUED.

XI.—THE CLASSIFICATION OF THE SCIENCES CONSTRUCTS THEM INTO A POSITIVE PHILOSOPHY, AS TO WHICH THERE IS GENERAL AGREEMENT AS TO ITS (1) EXTENT, (2) METHOD, AND (3) IMPORTANCE.

This is our eleventh harmony, and should be considered in each of the three aspects above named.

(1) First, then, as to the extent of the Positive philosophy. Theologians and metaphysicians have been much worried, as though science could or ought to be in some way fenced off from their domains. The impossibility of this endeavor is becoming more and more apparent. There is nothing outside of science but ignorance.

Science includes all of the knowledge that human nature is capable of; its only limit is the limit of human capacity.

There is no twilight domain or happy heaven that can be reserved in the human soul as the home of gods, goblins, or mysterious and unknowable entities. The philosophy built up by the classified sciences is in its method, promise, and potency, at once synthetic, cosmic, positive, and integral. In common parlance, this positive philosophy is called "Science," and thus it is distinguished from the special sciences, of which it is composed, and the theology and metaphysics to which it is opposed. It includes everything knowable, and even scientifically accounts for the limitations of human nature, and the very ignorance and Philistinism that deny its research, or refuse to become acquainted with its methods. Not long ago the view generally entertained was that science referred to a particular class of subjects—the outer, or material world, for example—but that it had no application to the inner world of man and its manifestations in society or morals or art or language, or the thoughts and feelings of man, or to "religion," as the sum and the coördination of these. It would be said, as Galileo and the first scientists used to do to save themselves from persecution, that the Bible was not revealed to teach science, but religion and morality.

The latter-day theologians try now to escape by this same excuse that their opponents formerly used. But the day for it has passed. When first used it was excusable, because then the method of science had only been extended and vindicated within the domains of the more general sciences, viz., in logic, mathematics, astronomy, physics, and then in chemistry, and gradually in biology. That its methods could be extended over the still higher domain of society and the whole of man's inner and emotional life, binding them all into a true or scientific religion, was not then supposed. Those subjects were therefore left to metaphysics and theology.

But this excuse avails no longer. There is nothing in Biology, Sociology, Art, Language, Emotion, or Thought; no Society so complex; no fancy or dream so evanescent; no real or imagined heaven too high or far; no ignorance so wilful or stupid, or learned or profound, that the laws of scientific correlation do not catch and account for and explain it, and so bind it to the world as a whole.

(2) About the method of Science we gain a clearer idea by considering it as the continued application of the most general law, and never forget that SCIENCE IS CORRELATION. We think and know by relations. Knowledge is co-relation tested by experience. The method—i. e., mode of application and testing—differs more or less in each of the sciences; that is, as to each general class of phenomena. It is this difference of method in each special science that caused the old belief that Science was limited to certain classes of things, and that beyond it there was a domain of faith rightly founded on something beyond the reach of scientific methods.

It is this difference that still causes many special scientists to regard the method of their own particular science as having greater value than any other, and as being par excellence THE science. This bias is particularly frequent when the specialist outside of his specialty is a theologian or a metaphysician, as is generally the case. How few are our scientists!

In America it may be said to be the object of our colleges and universities, in so far as they are under clerical control, to prevent the possibility of the existence of a generally and scientifically educated man, a man with the general education of a Goethe or a Humboldt, for instance. Our colleges have thus become to a great extent theological dwarfing institutions. There is no reason why a scientific man cannot be raised and educated in America. We have had and have a great number of specialists of great learning and ability. Could a man be educated in theory, culture, and practice in each of the sciences so as to combine all as the basis of his life, we should have a man at once scientific and in the highest degree, and in the best and truest sense, religious.

Such a man may be idealized from among our specialists by imagining that one man had attained to the culture and education of each science, if not to a complete knowledge of its details. Such men will, we hope, hereafter stand on American soil. The taint of theology, and the loss of time in pursuing its methods and fables, render such an ideal beyond our present hope or that of our generation. The time lost in youth, the seed-time of life, the time when the growing grain gathers its strength and material for life, who can restore? The life we can devote to truth and Humanity is now but a mutilated fragment at best. Had the time spent over useless sermons, catechisms, grammars, lexicons, and texts been devoted to the rudiments of the sciences and arts, and inspired by the enthusiasm and culture of humanity, we should not now have to look upon the world about us as mostly a sealed, because a neglected, book. Still, with what remains of life, we are bound to repair our loss so far as possible. To that end each must become his own instructor and do what he can.

To avoid the limitations of theology it is plainly the duty of every Liberal person to become acquainted with the rudiments and the general methods, laws, and results in each of the sciences. The money saved from tobacco, and alcoholic drinks (which I hope all Liberals will drop forever), or from frivolous amusements, may furnish the means; the time saved from gossip or novel reading may give the opportunity. As to the importance of this new philosophy, there is but one voice from all scientists. This knowledge will pay for the severest struggle to obtain it. For to progress in it is to rise in the scale of being, nobility, and usefulness. It is only by such education that every Liberal can hope to be ready to give a reason for his change from the old faith to the new. This study soon becomes the greatest pleasure of life—the pleasure of knowledge, of culture, and of power. Nor let any one despair if he has not had, or cannot have, a college education. The escape from that, as at present generally conducted, is rather a subject of congratulation. Get as close to "Nature" and Humanity as you can, and they will instruct, cheer, and comfort you. Remember Carlyle's word, "The true University of these days is a collection of books." Better had he said a wise selection of books. It is noteworthy that the great leaders of Liberal and constructive thought have been mostly what are called self-educated men, men who have had nothing to do with colleges, or who have left them in just disgust. Freedom is often the best master. So was it with Descartes, Bacon, Spinoza, Locke, and Gibbon; and still later with Comte, Mill, Grote, and Spencer. The love of learning and the earnest desire to be of some service to humanity are the best and the most successful incentives. The text-books that will give the substance of the twelve sciences are now abundant and within the reach of every one. To these may be added works of the concrete, practical, and descriptive Sciences and the Arts.

Such a library, arranged in the order of the sciences, would be a most useful collection and a source of constant information and pleasure. It would be a true and comprehensive encyclopedia ever at hand.

To students, schools and colleges this further suggestion may be of value; that is, that the mind acquires knowledge easier and faster, and retains it better, when the sciences are pursued and studied in the positive order. The reasons for this will appear to any one who will recall what has been said as to the historical, genetic, and accumulative nature of that order.

This educative value of the Positive Classification may sometimes also usefully determine the lectures, readings, or exercises for the several days of the week; for instance, let them be devoted, in part at least, as follows:

On Monday, Logic and Mathematics.
On Tuesday, Astronomy and Physics.
On Wednesday, Chemistry and Biology.
On Thursday, Sociology and Morals.
On Friday, Language and Æsthetics.
On Saturday, Psychology, Art, and Recreation.
On Sunday, Rest, General Culture, and "Worship."

Many of us can remember the earlier days, when it would have been a joy unspeakable to have pursued the Sciences under a competent teacher in the order in which each week would have furnished a partial survey of the whole of man's world. Alas, to many of us those days and opportunities are gone forever!

We can now only glance, in passing, at the fields we might have cultivated. It will be useful to do so much, at least, so that we may know the boundaries, methods, and main laws of each science, and not have them confused, as they very generally are, in the theologico-metaphysical chaos which we call the thought, literature, and art of our age.

That short survey must be, then, our next harmony. (TO BE CONTINUED.)

Notes and News.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Since the Chicago Congress my notes of travel hav been interrupted by stress of circumstances, but I hav not been idle.

Taken all in all, the Congress was a grand success, though I cannot but regard as a mistake the passage of the one resolution—rectified though it was in part by the adoption of Mrs. Severance's resolution reaffirming the repeal resolutions of last year.

In the Congress I met many men and women, now comparativly little known to the masses of the American people, who, in the years to come, will occupy very advanced positions in the armies of reform. They are men and women with ideas and purposes. They think and express their own thoughts, and they will liv their own lives, spite of the envious carpings and cankering criticisms of certain saints who are almost too good for this sinful world.

The Chicago concern has been wonderfully troubled concerning the Congress, the women prominent there, and the books and pamphlets exhibited for sale. But spite of its disapprobation, one sweet consolation remains to the Iowa bookseller. He had among his publications no copies of the Garden City What-Is-It. Therefore he has nothing to be sorry for or of which to be ashamed.

Here at Cedar Rapids Freethought ideas are slowly but surely spreading. There is more and more demand for books of a radical nature, and we may hope that in the not too distant future a good, live secular organization can be started here and flourish in spite of the great wealth of the churches. But our people must learn that Freethought means something more than mere opposition to the teachings of Christianity. We must learn to cultivate the broadest catholicity, and ostracism for opinion's sake must be unknown among us. We must work shoulder to shoulder with those from whose views upon certain subjects we dissent in toto. There can be no advance otherwise.

On Monday, November 7th, I started out upon a ten-weeks' trip through portions of Fayette, Allamakee, and Winneshiek counties, visiting Maynard, Randalia, Fayette, Postville, Ossian, Elgin, West Union, and Oelwein, and thence to Winthrop, in Buchanan county. The first week out wind reigned supreme, and travel off from the railroad lines was well nigh impossible. Then we had an Iowa change, and for the next week frozen mud was the order of the day, and travel was not much better than before.

At Maynard Ed Gould is a Liberal, and he is the proprietor of the hotel at the place—and such a hotel! If any of our friends go that way they want to be sure and stop off at Maynard and get a good dinner, supper, or breakfast, as the case may be. They will never regret it. E. B. Snedigar and Mr. Gregory are pronounced Freethinkers, and I think they are sowing more or less of the good seed in their neighborhood.

Jerome Carter and lady, Nelson Carter and Mrs. Carter, Sr., hav about killed old orthodoxy in Randalia. The once flourishing Sunday-school is a thing of the past, and they no longer talk of snubbing activ Liberals. So much for fearless expression of unpopular opinions and earnest propagandism of the religion of humanity. I regret that the Carters are about to leave Randalia for some new land of promis still further toward the setting sun. Ever hospitable and generous, may success attend them in their new home!

Daniel Davis, at Fayette, has never lowered the standard of secularism, and the light of science is darting its genial rays even through the heavily-shuttered windows of the Upper Iowa University, a Methodist institution of learning, located at this place. The students are reading a great deal of Infidel literature, and the faculty can't help it.

Mr. O. Caldren and A. S. Hollenbeak are outspoken opponents of churchianity. On the whole, I think that our cause is flourishing here. Our friends are talking of having some lectures soon, and I think that a visit from Mrs. Lake or W. F. Jamieson would badly frighten old conservatism.

At Postville Messrs. Ward, Douglass, Yonker, Bishop, and Blancheim are all interested in progressiv thought, and it seems to me that the time is now ripe for an organization of some kind at this place.

When I reached Ossian the weather was so very unpropitious that I saw but few of our friends at and in the vicinity of this town. Our people here nearly all liv in the country, and the difficulties usually attending organization are thereby much increased. But the church can never more flourish in this neighborhood until there is a very radical change in the character of that population. There are too many women and men here who think for Christianity to prosper.

I attended "divine service" Sunday at the church near Bro. Danaels's, and among the many atrocious sentiments uttered by the reverend blasphemer of humanity was this, "We should always liv and serve God, for he is much nearer and dearer to us than our mothers even." No wonder that the church is losing power when its ministers thus profane the sacred name of mother to glorify a myth.

Stopped at Clermont to see G. L. Henderson, but found that the apostle of liberty was up near Postville gathering corn, and so I bought a ticket, checked my baggage, and, taking my sample packages, walked down the railroad track to Elgin, where I found Peter Nicklaus and Mr. Cooley still alive to the needs of the hour. To Mr. Nicklaus I am under many obligations for kindnesses, and may his stave mill ever bring him good returns for labor invested is my earnest wish. Since the death of his brother, a few weeks since, friend Cooley has two stores to attend to, and it keeps him pretty busy, but not too busy to take interest in human progress.

West Union and vicinity boasts of such earnest Liberals as J. F. Smith, Jr., and lady, Thomas Reeder, Mrs. Reeves, C. H. Carpenter, and Messrs. Hogg, Kinser, Shaw, Whitney, and S. S. Ainsworth, last but not least. The West Union churches bemoan sparsely-filled pews, and now is the hour to strike, organize, hav good lectures occasionally, and proceed to develop the social side of our work. We hav some very enthusiastic workers among those first named above, and the future looks promising.

I hav never before stopped at Oelwein, but find here Mr. Phillips, H. C. Hollenbeak and lady, and George Thompson—all alive and willing to work for a higher, better, freer, humanity. One orthodox lady very spitefully remarked that Ingersoll's lectures had no use except for kindling, and were "hardly fit for that." She thought that no one should be allowed to go around selling such literature. She would hav made a prime inquisitor. Luckily, she lacks the power to do more than burn her weak husband's Freethought books.

At Winthrop Alexander Risk gave me cordial greeting and made me comfortable during my stay over Sunday. He has a fine library, and is an intelligent, appreciativ reader of the same. May joy ever be his!

Liberal School-Books.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It has been proposed by several of thy correspondents that some Liberal shall get up a set of school-readers that shall not be adulterated with the Christian mythology, and my name has been proposed as one who was to select or write some of the lessons for the books. But I think the time has not yet come for such a movement. As long as Liberals cannot start and sustain an Infidel Sunday paper for the young, it will be found that they will be totally incapable of getting a set of school-readers into the public schools of our country. Perhaps here and there a school where Liberals predominate might be induced to use them, but it requires more influence than we can at present wield to make such books pay in a financial sense. We must begin at the foot of the ladder, and go up slowly and carefully, if we hope to reach the top.

When we contrast the school-books of to-day with those of only forty-five years ago, we see such a wonderful dropping out of the old theological element that we can hardly realize it is a fact. I hav here before me Stephen Byerly's spelling-book, printed in Philadelphia in 1836, and I will make a few extracts from it, showing what was then considered the best reading matter for school-children:

Let us serve God in our young days,
For we can do no work in the grave.
. . . . .

I am a creature of the Lord,
He made me by his powerful word,
And he will bless me while I liv,
And when I die my soul receive.
. . . . .

The devil tempts one mother's son
To rage against another,
So wicked Cain was hurried on,
'Till he had killed his brother.

Let sweet works of prayer and praise
Employ our youthful breath,
Thus we're prepared for length of days,
Or fit for early death.

'Twas God who made the earth and sea,
To whom the angels bow;
'Twas God who made both thee and me,
The God who se·s us now.
'Tis God that sends us all things good,
Our harvest and our grain:
He makes the earth produce our food,
And sends us wind and rain.

Now let us contrast these superstitious and false utterances with the teachings of the schools forty-five years later. I hav before me a criticism delivered at a teachers' institute in California, and by one of her best teachers, and from it select the following paragraphs:

"As to the much mooted point of morality and religion in the public schools, that morality should be taught we all agree, but he that still advocates teaching religion in the public schools is but a poor reader of history. There has been for the past one hundred years a gradual, yet complete, revolution in this respect. From teaching but little theology, we hav now come to the point of letting all theology severely alone. Orthodoxy and good teaching are diametrically opposed to each other.

"That bent of mind which makes a believer is not that doubting, inquiring, searching, analyzing spirit which makes the first-class teacher. It is but a short time ago I heard a teacher talking to his class about 'angels' pinions'—taking his theology, as so many do, from Milton's 'Paradise Lost'—and I could not help wishing that teacher might receive at least enough training in natural history to know that feathers and hair, wings and arms, never go together, Sunday-school hymns to the contrary notwithstanding. . . . .

"The heterodoxy of one age is the orthodoxy of the next generation. We cannot emphasize too strongly or too often that to be a doubter is the sign of a thinker. Belief in a text-book shuts out thought, and the investigation thereof is the making of thought and of new ideas."

When teachers come out thus plainly in favor of banishing religion from our schools, we may guess the day is not far distant when our text-books will be purified from gods, angels, and devils, and be wholly devoted to science, fact, and real knowledge. Let us each one do a little every day and every hour to advance the cause of human progress and mental and moral growth, and

"Slowly, surely, brightly, grandly, speed the glorious light, Harbinger of all that's precious—freedom, truth, and right."

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

What I Don't Believe.

PART II.—NO. 62.

715. The seventh case was when Matthew tried to utilize the matter of casting out devils—more devils and more prophecies—to apply to this saying of Isaiah, "Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses." If anybody can see any connection between casting out devils and bearing one's infirmities they possess greater acuteness of vision than average people. There were no devils at the time of Isaiah, and it would consequently have been impossible for him to have alluded to casting them out. Besides, Isaiah spoke in the past tense, and was undoubtedly bewailing the death of some person who had already died; and it took the genius of a Matthew to metamorphose it into a prophecy. And still again, if the casting out of devils was a good and beneficent work to do, it would seem that Jesus should be willing to engage in it because of the good he would thereby perform instead of fulfilling some ideal prophecy that had been made seven hundred years before. Matthew is the first in the New Testament to mention the feat of casting out devils, and he is also the only one who discovered any connection between that occupation and the remarks of Isaiah about bearing the griefs and sorrows of others. Matthew's imagination seems always unusually active; he sees coincidences where others cannot.

716. Matthew's eighth attempt was to show that when the Pharisees went out and held council with reference to Jesus, and how they might destroy him; and that when Jesus discovered it he withdrew when great numbers followed him, and he healed them all, it was a fulfilment of the prophecy of Esaias: "Behold my servant whom I have chosen; my beloved, in whom I am well pleased. I will put my spirit upon him, and he shall show judgment to the Gentiles. He shall not strive nor cry, neither shall any man hear his voice in the street. A bruised reed shall he not break, and smoking flax shall he not quench till he sends forth judgment unto victory. And in his name shall the Gentiles trust" (Isa. xlii, 1–4). The language of this text is obscure enough in all conscience, and it is enough to puzzle a Philadelphia lawyer to tell who the writer was talking about. It could not be Jesus, for did he not strive against the wrongs of his time which he conceived to exist? Did he not cry against the evils which he opposed? Was not his voice heard in the streets and in all the public places which he visited? As the language was used by the Deutro, or false Isaiah, and was written in the time of Cyrus, it is far more likely that it referred to him than to Jesus. If it was meant for a prophecy of Jesus, it is very clear it was not a correct one, and it was only a forced construction on the part of Matthew to make it to apply to Jesus.

717. Matthew's ninth discovery of prophecy fulfilment was on the occasion when Jesus wished to ride into Jerusalem in a manner befitting his condition as prospective king of the Jews, and when he sent two of his disciples for an ass and colt for him to ride. In this incident Matthew finds a fulfilment of this prediction, "Tell ye the daughters of Sion, Behold, the king cometh unto thee meek and sitting upon an ass and a colt, the foal of an ass." Matthew was so anxious to make the fulfilment fit the prophecy that he had the disciples bring an ass and colt, which he says Jesus rode—awkward and difficult as the feat was—while neither Mark, Luke, nor John says anything about a colt in the case at all. But Matthew generally manages to overdo the business. The prediction was made of a king riding an ass to be a mark of humility; but that was far from being the case with Jesus when he rode the ass into Jerusalem, when his attendants waved olive branches, threw down their garments in the way for him to ride over, and shouted hosannas aloud in his praise; it was far from a mark of humility; it was rather a mark of hilarious enthusiasm and joy because they thought their favorite was soon to be crowned king or the Jews. It will be seen at once that what Matthew was pleased to consider the fulfilment was an entire different spirit from what he was pleased to consider the prophecy. Besides, the language of the prophet clearly referred to another occasion, when the Jews would return from their captivity, and did not refer to Jesus at all. Matthew was sure to be mistaken in his applications.

718. The tenth case is a very weak one. When, at the arrest of Jesus, Peter drew his sword and cut off the ear of the servant of the high priest, Jesus chided him and said those who drew the sword should perish by the sword. In the same hour he spake to the multitude, "Are ye come out as against a thief, with swords and with staves for to take me? I sat daily with you teaching in the temple, and ye laid not hold on me." To this Matthew exclaims, "All this was done that the scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled." But the joke of it is, there is no prophecy for this fulfilment to fit. I defy Matthew or any one else to find a prophecy which this fulfilled. There is nothing at all like it. Matthew undoubtedly thought it was time for him to introduce another prophecy, and presuming there should be something to fit the case, he vaguely alluded to the supposed prophecy, or several of them, in general terms, thinking that perhaps there ought to be a prediction to fit this fulfilment, though he had not time to hunt it up, and could not have found it though he had looked a month. In slang language, Matthew showed himself "too fresh." It has been thought it was extremely unlikely that Peter carried a sword. He was but an obscure fisherman, and as the Jewish people were in vassalage under the Romans, it is quite unlikely that obscure persons would have been permitted to carry swords. Neither is it likely that Jesus would have permitted his disciples to carry swords. The sword story is very improbable.

719. The eleventh case is in connection with the repentance of Judas after betraying his master, when he threw down the thirty pieces of silver at the feet of the priests and went out and hanged himself. Matthew's statement is that this money being the price of blood, was not put into the treasury, but used to buy a piece of land with for burial purposes, and then says, "Thus was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet, saying, And they took thirty pieces of silver, the price of him that was valued, whom they of the children of Israel did value, and gave them for the Potter's field, as the Lord appointed." Matthew was again at fault here; the language used by Jeremiah referred to a piece of land which he bought of his cousin Hanameel, the son of Shallum, and had no reference whatever to the land bought with the money returned by Judas. The money spoken of by Jeremiah was seventeen shekels of silver, and not thirty pieces, and that discrepancy alone is enough to show that the language of Jeremiah could not correctly apply to Judas's money. Besides this, the discrepancy between Matthew's statement about Judas and that given by the writer of Acts must not be lost sight of. Matthew says Judas threw all the money at the foot of the priests and went out and hanged himself. The writer of Acts says Judas invested the money himself, when he fell headlong and burst in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out. If this statement is true then Matthew's is false, and we are left to conclude that Matthew again falsified for the sake of weaving in another prophecy fulfilment. He seems to have had a perfect mania for prophecies and pointing out their fulfilment.

720. Matthew's twelfth and last effort pertained to the casting of lots for the garments of Jesus after he was crucified, and he says this was done "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, They parted my garments among them, and upon my vesture did they cast lots." This language is from none of the prophets, but in Psalms xxii, 18, occurs this language: "They part my garments among them and cast lots upon my vesture." No one knows who wrote the Psalms, but it will be observed that the language is in the present tense, and is not a prophecy at all. The writer was probably in a gloomy state of mind, and used that figurative language to give expression to the despondent state of his feelings. It is only Matthew who could see any allusion in this language to the old clothes of Jesus. This is the closing instance of Matthew's overstrained efforts to get up prophecies and their fulfilments. In twelve instances he strove hard to establish his pet theory, and in the twelve instances he signally failed. In not one of the attempts he made is there the slightest warrant for supposing that those persons called prophets had the faintest conception of or made the slightest allusion to Jesus.

721. Mark has but little to do with prophecies, though he tries his hand at it a few times, and once at the very beginning of his gospel—"The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the son of God: as it is written in the prophets, Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee." The quotation is from Malachi iv, 1, and is not quite correctly given. It reads thus: "I will send a messenger and he shall prepare the way before me." According to Mark, the way is to be prepared before the person talked to, while in Malachi it is before the person who is doing the talking, whoever that may be. Mark seemed to think the words applied to John the Baptist, but he was evidently in error. John was not a road-maker. We have no account of his fixing up roads at all. His occupation was hunting locusts and wild honey, preaching, and washing people in the Jordan, and had no possible connection with making roads. If John is to be regarded as a messenger, the words apply to him no more than to other messengers, and there have been thousands of them besides John. I would suggest that had either of the old prophets wished to make a prophecy about Jesus or his times, he should have done it in clear, exact language that anybody and everybody could understand without an interpreter or a guideboard. Language that applies equally well to hundreds of persons is not specific enough to be of any value in any given case. It is not at all likely that Malachi had the slightest conception of the Baptist, for if he had he would doubtless have made some allusion to the baptizing business, as he was more distinguished for that than anything else. Such a vague allusion as he made can be of no possible use in any way. In the third verse Mark continues what is meant for a recital of the words of the prophet, thus: "The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight," and applied that also to John the Baptist. But he changed his prophet rather suddenly, relinquishing Malachi and taking Isaiah (xi, 3, 4), which reads thus: "The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God. Every valley shall be exalted, and every hill and mountain be made low." Now this is not a prophecy at all, but simply a command and a promise which has never been fulfilled, and probably never will be. If the command was meant for John the Baptist, he did not obey it, for he neither straightened old roads nor made new ones. It would seem more appropriate for thousands of other persons than him. Perhaps when every valley on the earth is elevated to a hill, and every hill and mountain is brought low, we will know what Isaiah meant, or was driving at, but we will probably have a long time to wait. The writer of Mark concludes with an out-and-out prophecy, but unfortunately it lacks a fulfilment. It reads thus: "And these signs shall follow those that believe; in my name they shall cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents, and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover." Now here is a prophecy that amounts to something. It is definite, and one is not left in doubt as to its meaning. But the worst of the matter is, it is hard to find a fulfilment to match it. When we see believers in Christ casting out devils, little and big, speaking new languages, taking up rattlesnakes and cobras with impunity, drinking a solution of arsenic, corrosive sublimate, cyanide of potassium, and prussic acid, without injury, and curing all manner of diseases by the laying on of hands, we may begin to think that the days of fulfilment of prophecy have come; and it will be worth a thousand times more than all the vague talk about straightening highways and making straight roads in the desert; but probably it will be several years yet before all these things take place. The fulfilment of such definite prophecies come very slowly.

Letters from Friends.

SAGINAW CITY, NOV. 30, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to hav my name in that list of noble heroes who hav sent in their $5 to bear Mr. Bennett's expenses on his trip around the world. I am late, but better late than never. I inclose $5.25 to make it as good as an early one. I like the paper better than ever. Mr. Bennett's letters and Wakeman's writings, with a little now and again from M. Babcock, with all the other letters from kind friends, make life more desirable in spite of all the ups and downs of Christian hypocrisy and maladministration in our government everywhere. To Mrs. Bennett everlasting praise. W. G. ELMER.

ALTON, ILL., NOV. 22, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 for Mr. Bennett's trip around the world, as you hav so kindly kept the door open so long. D. R. SPARKS.

MARKHAM, VA., NOV. 28, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 for Mr. Bennett s book of travels round the world.

DALLAS, TEXAS, NOV. 21, 1881.

MR. E. MACDONALD: Please find inclosed post-office order for $6.50—$1.50 to pay for the paper, and $5 for Mr. Bennett's around the world books. Send them soon as published. Yours fraternally,

ALLEN JOHNSON.

SAN DIEGO, CAL., NOV. 21, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to say to you and the readers of your paper that I appreciate it very highly. I hav had many a hearty laugh while reading it, to see the great variety of thought therein contained. Some think the earth to be a huge intelligent being, and of course its mother, the sun, is intelligent too, as well as Neptune and all of the remainder of her descendants. Only think what a quantity of intelligence they all possess when in council they assemble. I will let this be as it may; true or false, it matters not to me. But rather let us think of the vastness of the power that is contained within this group, whose center and mother is the sun. Why does mortal man attempt to think that he has found out where the outer bounds of this great workshop begins to work or ceases to end its labors? I am at this moment using glasses, that I may the better see to pen these lines. Glass is a hard substance which air and water do not pass through, but light will readily penetrate. Must I necessarily suppose because I see through these glasses that there is no substance more than the air between my eyes and the paper I write upon. Of course I need not suppose any such thing, for I know that I am looking through a very hard substance. Now, as we are so constituted as to see clearly through a substance so hard as glass, which all may come in contact with, feel, and handle, I would ask why in the name of this vast workshop of both coarse and fine material, may not a very subtle material of matter exist in a solid, or in layers, in spheres, in all directions from the earth as far as the eye of man can see even with the most powerful glass that has ever been invented? May we not suppose that nature to us is unlimited in her capacities? And may we not also reasonably suppose that the wise of our time hav many things yet to learn before they know all that may yet be known, as well as to hav some things to unlearn?

Taking all of these things into consideration, who is prepared to say that there is not plenty of room in this vastness of so-called space for material and spirits too, if there are any such beings? May there not be materials so fine and beings so transparent that mortal eyes cannot see either? Nature, in my opinion, has no vacuums and no space unoccupied. Some say, "Disprove immortality, and the whole victory is won." Very good, but is that not a task which will be hard to do? Suppose some think that the child is plaster, and that spiritism is by teaching kneaded into the brains of the young as yeast is kneaded into dough. That does not make it a fact, even if they do think so, for it must be an admitted fact that mankind are as near alike mentally as they are physically, and that nature shows no partiality in her works; any given part is in harmony with all other parts of her works, and we cannot take from nor add thereto permanently. If any require proof of this fact they are referred to Gen. xvii, 10-16. It appears that the Jews hav been taking from the physical man for some thirty-five or forty hundred years, and still nature does her work just the same as though there were no cruel men to mar her works; and we infer that it is just as true of the mental man as it is of the physical; we can neither take therefrom nor add thereto. We also see that mankind naturally take to the belief of spirits and of spirit conditions as an infant does to its nurse.

There are in this vicinity a plenty of Indians who know nothing of God, Jehovah, nor Jesus Christ, and that is not all; they don't want to know anything of them. But they are all, to a man and woman, believers in the existence of independent life after the physical body has been laid aside as an old garment is laid away when of no more use. They never borrowed this of the Bible, neither did they get it of white men; only of nature itself. And what is true in this respect of the Indian, I believe to be true as a rule of all nations, that is, that mankind naturally take to a belief in spirits upon the same principle that ducks take to water that are hatched under a hen, and that is by attraction. So mankind are attracted to spiritual things and spiritual scenes, not much to holes in the ground to be smothered there for ages without a ray of light or a zephyr to purify their cell. I don't think I know any power outside of attraction and repulsion in their multifarious combinations. Some speak of death. Poor me, that is something I thought had played out. I see and recognize many changes, but know nothing of death because I see a substance at rest or undergoing a change. I see no sign of death therein. All things are alive, or the germ of life is within them. But perhaps some think as an elderly gentleman did when he heard a person make the remark, "I never expect to die." The old man's reply was very curious, as follows, "Well, by God, you'll see if you liv long enough."

If man retains an independent individual existence after the dissolution of the visible physical body he must hav an invisible physical body, which is formed simultaneously with the visible body. The visible physical body is easily dissolved, but the invisible physical body must be proof against dissolution. Let us call on our unfortunate neighbor who has had an arm amputated. We see that the visible arm is gone forever, but he tells us that he still has the same feelings of arm and hand as he ever had, even to the itching of a finger. You see at once that the invisible physical hand and arm has not been cut asunder, nor can it be; it still remains attached to the invisible physical body, and here I think we find something of a spiritualistic nature which will be hard to prove is not real spirit. This invisible body must, of necessity, be composed of the finest material which our mother sun has in all of her domains. And most assuredly man partakes of all things beneath him. And may not all of the forces of this planet center in man; and is not matter eternal? And as man is the climax of this plant production, and being composed of the real essence of this planet, this invisible physical spiritual body having passed through all of the refining processes of nature, culminates in a spiritual being, refined and powerful, possessing the strength to resist dissolution at the dissolution of the visible physical body with which it has made its growth, comes forth strong enough to pass through the Christian's hell whistling as merrily as when passing through the Christian's heaven; it, being composed of the finest of the essences of matter, can never be dissolved. Hell itself can never mar it or singe a hair. Some may ask where was the soul a thousand years before the birth of the child if by soul is meant what I call a spiritual being. I would answer that the germ of all living, moving, breathing beings has existed through all time, spirit included, and all that was necessary to bring them forth was proper or favorable conditions.

I am of the opinion that the publication of the many letters of your correspondents will do much good; no matter how widely they differ in their thoughts, the unprejudiced will see who has the best thought and make it one of their own. Which of the following lines are the most attractiv?

> "There are no acts of pardon passed
> In the cold grave to which we haste;
> But darkness, death, and long despair
> Reign in eternal silence there," or these:

> "In the sweet by and by
> We will meet on that beautiful shore?"

I was not in favor of Mr. Bennett taking the trip round the world, but as he is gone I inclose postal order for the books "Around the World."

Respectfully yours, D. THING.

PIKE, N. Y., NOV. 29, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Back from my nine months of wandering in western states, a portion of the time dispensing temperance gospel to the people—not "gospel temperance," if you please, Mr. Editor—to the old home again where THE TRUTH SEEKER comes each week, with its well-filled pages from the pens of those whose names hav become household words, to cheer and instruct.

As my work took me principally into the churches, and among professing Christians, I had little opportunity of gaining information relativ to our Liberal movement. Indeed, if any one were to judge of its growth by what they heard and saw outside the ranks, there are times when the most sanguin must conclude that that movement is retrogressiv instead of progressiv, and become as thoroughly discouraged concerning results as Mr. Frothingham seems to be after his twenty years of faithful service to the cause of Freethought, even though they should not be troubled with as many doubts whether, after all, the doctrins of Christianity may not be sufficient to meet the needs of the people.

As to the churches of New York city (which Mr. Frothingham asserts are better attended than they were twenty years ago, although certain newspaper correspondents of that city do not seem to agree with him) I know little, yet I will say this, that while I hav found in my journeyings not a few houses of public worship fallen into decay and disuse, and many more thinly attended, I hav also observed quite as many, if not more, far more costly and elegant edifices in process of erection, toward which many Freethinkers, or those at least who make no pretension of believing in the creed taught therein, hav contributed generously. Why? Simply because it is popular to giv in that direction, and a new, handsome church will be an advantage to their young and rapidly-growing railroad town, and their business proportionately. So they pocket their consciences and play the hypocrit. Again, human beings are such "creatures of habit," so pre-eminently social in their natures, that the more extended my observation the more thoroughly am I convinced that the great majority attend church more from force of habit and for the sake of getting out of the harness of everyday work, which too often frets and galls cruelly, donning their "best clothes," for none but the very best are deemed worthy to wear inside the house of the Lord, and exchanging a word with their neighbors, than for any spiritual good they may get or desire. Hence the necessity, as many hav already suggested, of organization among Liberals, of providing, so soon as can be done, places for regular meetings, where the people can receive not only such mental food as they can enjoy and appreciate, but can help one another over the rough places in life by a free interchange of thought and friendly greeting.

Some of the most radical Freethinkers I hav ever met—those who at their homely toil with plow or hoe hav settled for themselvs many of the problems which hav vexed the souls and bewildered the minds of erudite theologians for centuries—are to-day attendants of orthodox churches, and contributing toward the support of such ministers as a certain one of northern Ohio, who boldly asserted from the pulpit on the Sunday following the shooting of President Garfield that such crimes were the natural effects of the teachings of such men as Thomas Paine and Robert G. Ingersoll, while they never think of subscribing for a Liberal paper or giving anything toward the support of our cause in any way. When remonstrated with concerning their inconsistency, they invariably take refuge in the plea that the church is about the only source of recreation and social intercourse within their reach, that they are too few in number and too feeble in purse to organize and support a meeting of their own, etc.

Let no one imagin I say all this to dishearten or discourage any one in regard to the progress of "Liberalism;" far from it, I hav simply given a few facts which hav come to me from points of observation outside the great moving current itself, not forgetting, by any means, that one needs to be an activ, interested worker along the channel of any reform movement, to note all the signs and indications of the widening and deepening of that channel. I sincerely hope that those activ old veterans, who are endeavoring to kindle the fires of truth, justice, and liberty all along the shores of the grand channel of Freethought, will not weary in well-doing, nor yet faint by the wayside for want of proper nourishment and appreciation by those in smypathy with their labors. But I am making my letter too long. Please find inclosed $4, which giv credit as directed.

Yours truly, M. S.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Your lady reader from Seneca, Iowa, E. M. B., asks for a remedy for the catarrh. Please say to her and others that gum arabic, camphor gum, and loaf sugar, equal parts, pulverized fine and used as a snuff, is the only thing that has done me any good, and it has cured me and others. AN OPEN LETTER TO MRS. ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

NORD, CAL., NOV. 13, 1881.

RESPECTED FRIEND: "John's Way" and "The Darwin's"—these two domestic radical stories—were received, read, and forwarded to married friends of mine.

The above-mentioned two books portray characters that exist in every-day life. The dark creeds and dogmas of the Christian church, and the evolution from Christianity to Freethought, are both truly represented. In the place of such trashy, improbable Christian stories as the people are generally chained into slavery by, you gave the world two stories of real life, clothed in common-sense language, dictated by a rational mind.

There are, unfortunately, only too many men who prefer such—by church and priests chain-bound slaves—for wives. Men of a tyrannical character, who won't even allow their wives to do their own thinking or reasoning on any other matter or affair, can always be found willing to uphold their religious whims, thus not finding it difficult to press them in the yoke, as the priest perpetually is doing it for them. As long as she worships an imaginary idol and bends her knee in obedience to an angry God, who is supposed to hav a furnace constantly heated for those who don't, she is also forced to obey his command to be subordinate to man. So her husband finds no trouble to crack the slaveholder's lash over her. However, as we count millions of men of self-respect in our files and ranks, not all the women are doomed to such a wretched life. With such men my appeal to purchase your books will not fall on barren soil. Men who hav buried the selfish idea that God had placed one sex above an other will strain every nerve to rescue women from the grasp of the church, and restore to them freedom and equal rights. And as the great majority of women seem to prefer a literature of romance to one of a historical and scientific nature, your books, as an introduction of truth, Liberalism, and Rationalism, are urgently recommended as a death-blow to church slavery.

While "John's Way" and "The Darwins" contain nothing else but the true and real life, a book that just happens to lay before me on the table, known as the "Union Bible Companion," by S. Austin Allibone, and anxiously read and studied by all who consider it most important to prepare for death instead of learning how to liv, must, by the intelligent reader, be found full of false and hypocritical statements. It commences with that tremendous lie that we believe that the universe came into and continues in existence by chance. Everybody who makes this assertion either brands himself a liar or an ignoramus. Space and time don't allow me to comment on all the falsehoods that this book contains; however, I wish to refer to some of his comparisons between Christianity and Mohammedanism. He bellows about the rapid growth of Christianity, although Mohammedanism is the only religion of the day that shows any gain; and Rev. Talmage admits that Christianity has to giv up two to every one it gains. The Protestant church can't show thirty million members to-day. The author goes on in his comparisons and quacks of the superior knowledge and civilization of Christianity over Mohammedanism. He forgot that Mohammedanism is six hundred years younger than Christianity; that Christianity six hundred years—yes, even three hundred—ago was far behind the Mohammedan civilization of to-day. He forgot, or didn't know, that the Moors, after their conquest of Spain, had brought back knowledge and light to Christian Europe, whose population at that time was in almost the same savage state as the so-called savages of the day. This hypocrit won't admit that the youth of Europe went to Cordova to learn from the Moors. He won't admit that Christianity burnt at the stake all those who undertook to introduce knowledge and science. He won't admit that all the great inventions down to the present day that civilized the earth were the product of Infidels. He won't admit that all and every great scientist of the past and present is an Infidel. None can be traced further down toward the orthodox church than to Unitarianism. The orthodox church stands without a single scientific light of brilliancy. What little science they adopt is forced on to them by Infidelity.

The same author also twaddles about Jesus's inferiority of birth, being the child of a poor and unknown family, while Mohammed was of the most powerful family. Although this latter statement is not true, I shall refer only to the former. Does not Christianity claim that Jesus was the son of God? How can he be inferior in birth to the most powerful man? He speaks of his parents as an unknown family, although they tell us, beside "God the father," of two genealogies from which that remarkable child descended. The fact is, no man of a limited knowledge ever can read that book without stumbling over many errors and falsehoods on every page. This book, like commentaries on the Bible, twists, bends, and parableizes scriptures and their meanings, and the results derived therefrom, until it fits present conditions and satisfies the mind of the rabble. Schiller said,

> "Dangerous it is to arouse the lion;
> Annihilating is the tiger's tooth,
> Though the horror of all horrors
> Is the man in his delusion."

Yours truly, ERDMAN W. FITZNER.

BROOKSTON, TEXAS, NOV. 19, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Yours of the 8th instant is before me. The tracts came to hand in good condition. Please find inclosed $5.

Let me refresh your memory concerning my age by saying I was born January 31, 1799. My health and strength are very extra. I am the oldest man I know in Texas. I think I am as well satisfied with my Infidel religion as any thinker is with Christianity. Indeed, can any thinker who loves truth love the Bible? I expect to doubt the Bible being any holier than Paine's "Age of Reason" to my latest breath. But I try to be a good man all the time.

I hold to immortality. I also hold that no man should expect a heaven after death unless he takes it with him. I believe in a mental heaven, and also in a mental hell. I believe that all who fail to learn in this life that to be good is the best policy will learn that truth after death, and when they hav learned it they will practice it. And then the practice of doing good will receive its reward—happiness. All persons, sooner or later, will be happy, and happy forever. No everlasting misery for any person. Progression is my favorit theme, both in time and eternity.

In friendly recollection and good wishes for your safe return to your own dear home and thousands of friends, I giv you the name, J. A. RUTHERFORD.

MERRICK, N. Y., NOV. 30, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find $15, $12 for the renewal of THE TRUTH SEEKER for the four persons named and $3 for myself.

The wickedest man on Long I land has composed some lines that we would like to see it the paper,

> The Christian says there is a God.
> I do not know upon my word;
> There may be one, or a hundred more—
> Who ever thought of it before?
> According to the Christian creed,
> In ancient days those gods did breed;
> If they did ever breed at all
> There must be thousands great and small.
> But here comes trouble; we opine
> Those ancient gods they cannot find;
> They all hav died or gone away
> Or never were, as some do say.
> They never were, that is the truth,
> And should be taught now to the youth;
> They soon would see and understand
> Nature and her divine commands.
> For nature's laws all must obey;
> They are absolute, and we must pay
> The penalty for every crime
> No matter what excuse we find.

Yours for truth and right, E. HYATT.

MITCHELL CO., KAN., NOV., 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1.50, for which send me THE TRUTH SEEKER six months. We hav hoped for years to read a journal advocating the principles of right, and having the courage to investigate and denounce the unreasonableness of the scriptures. We think the masses of the people are getting too wise to be humbugged much longer by orthodox churchmen. The doctrin of so-called Infidelity is gaining ground fast. We want to see the church edifices turned into schoolhouses and the ministry into schoolmasters—in those cases, at least, where their moral character and qualifications will warrant it. JOEL MCCOLLISTER.

CARSON, NEV., NOV. 25, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I must mention that I am impressed by the great defeat we hav met with in the death of our late lamented President. When we consider the, as Rev. Powers said, "One million million prayers, hopes, and tears of Christians," and the hopes of a million Freethinkers that their prayers would be answered, it is certainly a great defeat. There is something wrong, and somebody is to blame for all this unrewarded issuing of proclamations and unceasing prayer. Is he to blame who said, "Again I say unto you that if two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my father which is in heaven?" Or are the Christians to blame, as Rev. Pool says, for praying "that which is against known laws?" I think they had better pray, "O Lord, teach us how to pray and what to pray for," as I hav often heard them pray. Then, if the Lord would answer that prayer and tell them what to pray for, he could not go back on himself; he would hav to answer it.

I would say that I am much in favor of a Freethinkers' orphan asylum. "Dwight," in the issue of Nov. 12th, givs an easy place to accomplish the end. I hav no doubt that each subscriber of your paper could giv ten cents per year, and it would be safe to say we could get one thousand dollars per year, which would soon build up a charitable institution which would be a credit and a lasting good to our cause, and which would be a great influence in general thereto. We are greatly behind the church in this matter, which is quite a consideration to the many who are sitting on the fence. I will pledge a dollar, for the cause, which will be forthcoming as soon as I find out where to send it, and will agree to send that every year as long as I am able to do so. If the enterprise is started I think I can raise ten or fifteen dollars from my friends, many of whom are inactiv or unconcerned Liberals, but generous to any charitable cause. Let me hear from others on the subject. Yours in earnest, A. J. STOUGH.

ADRIAN, MICH., NOV. 29, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to say a few words to the ever open, honest, and faithful TRUTH SEEKER. I hav just read friend Green's article in the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, which in the main was quite good. But when he came forward with his plan to increase the circulation of the paper, and then added that he did not do this so much to help the paper and its proprietor as to help the Liberal movement, with me friend Macdonald, this drawback in his article spoiled it all. Whatever mistakes the proprietor of THE TRUTH SEEKER may hav made in the times long ago, which was used as capital by his enemies, while he was serving out his time and his life in the penitentiary, and thus unable to defend himself, for no crime whatever, but merely to gratify Christian spite and Christian hate—I say that while the minions of the Christian church were treating Mr. Bennett in this way and his personal enemies were trying to ruin him as a man, and to break down his paper, so as to build themselvs and their papers up; there were a few of its friends that stood by it during these stormy time, determined, as far as we were able, to keep that noble organ of free thought, free speech, and free mails open to the Liberal breeze. How far Mr. Green was one of that number I will leave with himself and others to judge, and as he has now been some two months lecturing in this state, I would like to know how many names he has sent in for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Will our honest friend please tell us in his next article, so that when we go out to lecture we may hav a standard to work from? S. D. MOORE.

WEST MERIDEN, CONN., NOV. 16, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I would like, by your permission, to make a few remarks.

First, Mr. Bennett made, I think, a little mistake concerning the Irish Land bill. I cannot see any benefit for the Irish people from that bill unless England abolishes her aristocratic hereditary law which exists at the present time, and brings another compulsory sale under the Land bill, as under the present law. The father is not permitted to divide the land equally among his own children. The first son claims all the land property after his father. Suppose I want to buy a piece of land, and the landlord cannot sell it, or will not, as he has more benefit by renting the hall. What good could I do, or how much would I benefit by it in such circumstances? I suppose nothing. If it was not for that aristocratic hereditary law the land would be sold, or divided into little parcels among relativs to till.

Second, I am sorry that Mr. Bennett did not visit the Russian empire and giv his description, for the benefit of those fine Republicans and Democrats who sympathize with that civilized nest of despotism. I would like to read a description by Bennett of the oppression, tyranny, and butchery which are going on all the time, and a little about the czar—that tiger of Russia, and his family of hyenas. It is a burning shame that those fine Republicans and Democrats prevented poor Hartmann from giving his information to the public. I believe it is a disgrace to the Republican government to come so low as to bow humbly before the Russian czar and obey his bidding.

I hav read Mr. Truesdell's answer to Mr. Hull. It would make a dog laugh to read that reply, so full of contradiction and repetition, the author so persistently avoiding every kind of discussion about the affairs of the country that concern the well-being of every man and woman in the country. As Mr. Truesdell is a bond-holder and has something to do with banking affairs, and consequently is a Republican, we must expect nothing more from him than a desire to be left in quietness to pursue his occupation, either good or bad, and the business of the people that concerns the people the most may go to the dogs.

For example, let us look to that man of God, that perfect Christian and Republican, the cashier of the National Bank of New Jersey.

Yours most respectfully, JOSEPH FRANKOWSKI.

WHEELING, WEST VA., NOV. 20, 1881.

FRIEND MACDONALD: Inclosed you will find $3—half for three trial subscribers and the other half for a copy of Voltaire's philosophical "Tales, Romances, and Satires," which is for myself. I hav taken the paper for about four years and find that I cannot do without it, and will stick to it as long as I can get money to pay for it. A. J. SEIFERT.

To Jamie.

BY ALHAZA.

The sun would be dark without Jamie,
The dew on the violet's wreath
Is parched as the wind of the desert,
Compared with the balm of his breath.

He cheers the lone heart in its sadness,
While the priest and the Levite go by;
And the rose would giv half of her sweetness
To liv on his pitying sigh.

He mutters no wild incantation
To a brainless chimera above,
But thinks, like the dweller at Ferney,
That the purest religion is love.

He would never hav fought under crosses,
To humor great Charlemagne's whim;
For "freedom and truth" was the motto
On the banner that waved over him.

And when the dun war-clouds waxed paler,
The din of the battle at rest,
He called for no Bible to cheer him,
While wounded the cold earth he prest.

No missal, with quaintly lit margin,
Could whisper what Pericles said;
While Socrates, pleading in Athens,
Would wake the calm, beautiful dead.

O'er these, in some cool leafy arbor,
He bent, through the fierceness of noon,
While the wind in the branches above him
Seemed humming a Liberal tune.

The lute would lose all its best music,
The fountain's cool drop would be gone,
If Jamie should ever forsake us,
And the peace of our hearts would be flown.

God Was Once Blind—A New Revelation.

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

Jehovah, e'er creation's dawn,
Existed without sight;
Long, long ago, before he spake
And said, "Let there be light,"
One glimmering ray, or peep of day
He never shone upon.
The great I Am's benighted mind,
For darkness reigned alone.
The faintest tinge of color then
Did not exist in space;
In its vast realm, those forms of light,
Had never found a place.
He lacked the sense of taste and smell,
He was as deaf as a post;
He shared his wants in company
With Son and Holy Ghost.
With nought to see or hear or smell,
The senses could not be
To him of any use at all
Through past eternity.
E'er he began to make a sun,
In those dark times of old,
His only feeling possible
Was to feel dreadful cold.
He struck a light that dark, dark night,
And being nearly froze.
He made the sun to toast his shins,
And hell to warm his toes.
To tend its fires, old Nick he hires,
To fireman's office fill,
For fear the fire might fizzle out,
He won't the devil kill.
Great mysteries of godliness!
But faith knows why he bore
Those ills so long and patiently,
Nor sought a change before.
How he got his ears and nose and eyes,
The wisest never knew.
Faith leaps the chasm triumphantly.
And cries, His senses grew.
How once without them he could think,
May seem to reason strange,
But all such trifles faith can grasp,
They come within her range.
These views may seem dogmatical,
But persons we defy,
To point the smallest errors out,
Or prove a single lie.
But reason vile they must not quote,
Faith's rules alone must do.
We hearken to no other voice,
But stick to her like glue,
To silence those who ask the source,
Of news so long concealed,
We'll gag them with this holy gag—
Those statements are revealed.

WHAT OBJECTIONS TO
THE
Bennett-Mair Discussion.

BETWEEN

D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.

(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founded upon the doctrin and authority of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progress and improvement.

8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which mankind are capable of receiving.

Sixteen Saviors or None.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

Being a reply to John T. Perry's "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examins all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other, and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and themselvs, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. OPEN LETTER
TO
Anthony Comstock

In Answer to His Open Letter Sent to the Newspapers.

465 FULTON ST., BROOKLYN,

SIR: I hav before me a seven-paged open letter, addressed to myself, intended for publication in all the evening and morning papers, copies of which, I am prepared to prove, were sent to every daily and several weekly papers, the publishers of which refused to publish it, consigning the precious product of your labors to the waste paper basket. For this I am truly sorry, as it would hav given me an admirable opportunity to show the public the true inwardness of the man who could pen such a letter, and yet claim to be a Christian and a protector of the public from the vicious members of society. A more vicious letter could not be penned, and the evidence of malice crops out in every sentence. You first claim that the courts honorably acquitted you. If they did, then I know nothing of the words honorable acquittal. You were arrested for publishing a malicious libel, and taken in the charge of an officer before the magistrates. You then waived examination. If you had written truthfully, why were you afraid of examination? I was present in the court to confront you on your vile charge. You were silent.

After the lapse of several weeks I received an order from Judge Smith's court to attend such court respecting my charge against you, and believing that you would submit to an examination and giv some excuse for your act, I went, accompanied by over fifty witnesses, so that a special court had to be set aside for my special case against you. Well, let us examin as to what followed. I stood there without counsel, ready to defend my order of arrest. I was strong in the proof of my charge against you, and did not require an attorney to quibble on points of law. You, on the other hand, had an attorney—a man in whom any person may trust their case as a legal adviser, and outside the law I hav reason to know that Mr. Tenney, your solicitor, is a gentleman and a noble-hearted man. He must hav felt seriously the weakness of your case, as set forth in your libelous letter, and therefore, as an act of charity toward you, advised you not to submit to an examination. He, good fellow, by special pleading, decided to take exception on points of law, and attempted to show that not the spirit and intent of your libelous letter should be gone into, but the actual wording only should be considered, and that therefore the same should be adjudged as a privileged communication, and on this ground pleaded for a dismissal. This I objected to, whereupon your solicitor proposed that a brief be prepared, setting forth the reasons why my complaint against you should be dismissed. I then stated in the presence of that court, that all I required was a full investigation into the facts. It was then arranged that the District Attorney should take charge of the case as prosecuting counsel on behalf of the people against Anthony Comstock, I being promised at that time that such investigation should be made on the following Wednesday. But, feeling that there was some crooked business going on, and an attempt being made to frustrate justice, I employed one of our best attorneys, and he wrote a letter to the Judge, to the District Attorney, and your attorney for copy or nature of such brief. Not only so, but myself and attorney applied at Jefferson Market Police Court next day, and we were told that Justice Solon Smith had gone into the country, and would not be back until Monday following, the court officer to whom we spoke intimating that as the Comstock case was in the hands of Justice Solon Smith, nothing would be done until his return. Picture, therefore, my astonishment upon receiving a notice from the court, that the case had been dismissed without an investigation into the facts which led to the writing of your letter, neither myself nor one of my witnesses being called, and yet you hav in your letter the audacity to tell the public that you were honorably acquitted. May heaven save the public when such honorable acquittals shall follow the publication of such vile letters as that penned by you to hundreds of my patients! So much for your "honorable acquittal." Now, as to your having evaded arrest or not, the facts are these: I did not dream of having you arrested until after I had written my letter to you, which appeared in all the newspapers. I called at your office personally three or four times, as did also my half-brother, David Cotter. We were each told by persons in your office that you had gone into the country, and would not be back for a week; but on being told by persons on Nassau street that you were seen in the immediate neighborhood not long after my calling, I felt that you were evading me, and deliberately refusing to giv me the names of those whom you pretended had made statements against me. It was your thus evading me which caused me to take criminal proceedings against you, and forthwith instruct counsel to sue out a warrant against you for criminal libel. After such warrant was in the hands of the officer, such officer and several of my witnesses sought you at your office. They were told by persons in your office that you had gone into the country, as I had before been told. On the morning of your arrest my half-brother, David Cotter, called at your office, in response to a telegram received by me. He was then told that you were away in the country. He went straight from your office to that of Howe & Hummel, and there met a private detectiv who offered there and then to disclose the whereabouts of Anthony Comstock, if the $100 reward, which I had offered for his arrest, should be given him. This was promised, and David Cotter then went and apprised the officer who held the warrant, and they went in company to your office, when they were jointly told by persons sitting there that you were away and they did not know when you would return; whereupon the officer, acting upon the information given by the detectiv above named, proceeded to a room in the upper part of the building wherein several voices were heard. The door was opened in response to the knocking of the officer, when a number of gentlemen were seen sitting around a table as if in committee. Anthony Comstock was inquired for, and denied being there. Upon retiring voices were heard in a room close by. Inquiry was made if Anthony Comstock was within. The person who opened the door replied that Anthony Comstock was not there, when the door was closed. My half-brother, who was waiting in the lobby, made a ruse as if running down stairs, the officer, all the time standing outside, beside the door. The same person who had before opened the door opened it again. The officer, by a rapid movement of the foot, kept the door open and then walked in and arrested yourself, Anthony Comstock. If this was not hiding from arrest, I fail to understand what hiding means, and as you hav in your open letter mentioned the fact of my having offered one hundred dollars reward, and that I had refused to pay the person giving the information, I beg leave here to state that the hundred dollars was paid to the detectiv in the presence of several witnesses, one of whom was a merchant and manufacturer in your immediate neighborhood of Nassau street. So much for your arrest. Was it with or without evasion?

Now, as to the next portion of your open letter: You say there is a law prohibiting the transmission of letters and circulars concerning schemes to deceive and defraud the public or obtain money by false pretenses through the mails. You knew very well when you were writing that sentence that it had no application whatever to my case, inasmuch as the following open letter to the physicians of Brooklyn was before you, offering every physician or scientific man a free entry into my factory and consulting rooms, and in the same letter offering five thousand dollars' worth of my goods to the poor of Brooklyn. Why did you not avail yourself of the offer and hav called at my consulting rooms and manufactory for inquiry before writing your libelous letter to the hundreds of my patients? You could hav no excuse as to time and place, for this reason, viz., that my establishment is one of the most prominent in Brooklyn, and in close proximity to your own residence, so that nothing but malice aforethought could hav induced you to hav written such a letter, while the following offer to the physicians of Brooklyn was before you in the circular or pamphlet from which you obtained the names of my patients to whom you wrote. If you wish to excuse yourself re-read the following:

WM. WILSON'S OPEN LETTER

To the Physicians and the Commissioners of Charities of the City of Brooklyn.

GENTLEMEN—Two years ago in Europe I invented and patented a magnetic appliance for the relief and cure of disease. My system is one that was never before attempted, but its simplicity places it among the many great improvements in the history of science which, after its inception, has caused thousands to wonder why so valuable an addition to the necessities of our race should hav been so long overlooked.

The success of my appliances in the cure of disease in England was such that over THIRTY THOUSAND persons were clothed in them, and not one case of failure when the proper appliances were worn as recommended. In the face of such success in Europe, I determined that the people of America should be made acquainted with the fact. I arrived in Brooklyn only a few months ago and commenced the sale of my goods at No. 465 Fulton street, since which time I hav, in Brooklyn and neighborhood, over a THOUSAND persons wearing my appliances for the diseases above mentioned—all of whom came to me only as a last resort, having failed to get relief from any of their physicians. And these persons were as readily relieved as were those of Europe—NINETY-NINE PER CENT of whom will tell you to-day on application to them that my appliances gave time all the relief promised. A printed list of my clients is at your disposal so that you may satisfy yourself of the truth of the above statement. My proposition therefore is that I hand over to the medical men of Brooklyn FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS worth of my appliances, to be used only on the persons of the sick poor now and likely to be in my charitable institutions and hospitals. The only condition I make is that I myself confine the patients according to my own judgment and be allowed to retain watchers at my own expense that the patients do not receive any medicin during the wearing of my appliances, and that a proper report be supplied from time to time, so that I, at my own expense, can publish the record of the cures by my appliances. I further wish that every medical man in Brooklyn should call at my manufactory and examin for himself the processes of manufacture and make himself thoroughly acquainted with my system. My factory is open for inspection at all hours to any physician, chemist, or scientist, and in close proximity to my own business premises the same physicians may see for themselvs the patients who hav been relieved by my appliances. All physicians and chemists who hav examined my goods hav availed themselvs of my invention, are to-day wearing my appliances, and recommending the same to their patients with marked success.

The aforesaid gift of FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS' worth of goods will be delivered from time to time, as agreed upon by a committee of yourselvs, on application to me a few days n advance, stating the disease for which they are required, so that I can supply the best possible form of my inven tion. Hoping you will avail yourselvs of my offer, I remain, gentlemen. Yours obediently,

WILLIAM WILSON.
No. 465 Fulton st., Brooklyn.

In face of the above letter, what pretense can you find for your conduct? Why did you not giv me the names of the parties whom you pretended had written to you? The fact is, no one did write to you except a lot of conspiring doctors, and to please them you became their tool.

In the next part of your open letter you refer to a letter you sent me, and say as follows: "Why did you, like Ananias and Sapphira of old, keep back a part; why did you not tell the public that I wrote you personally on the 15th of September?" Your memory must be very bad in this particular, or you did not read the newspapers, inasmuch that this paragraph appeared in the Truth newspaper on September 20th, under the caption of "The Romance of Anthony Comstock's Arrest, and what Led to It," and directly following the $100 reward, I refer to the very letter which you say I never noticed:

"And the next morning I received a cringing letter, written after the reward was offered, as shown by the postal date on the envelope, Brooklyn postmark, 2 A. M., September 16. Now I was told in his office on the 15th of September, at two in the afternoon, that he had gone away for a week. Who told the lie? Did he order his subordinates so to do, or did they do so of their own accord? The next day, September 16th, my half brother, David Cotter, with the detective and the court officer, went to Comstock's office. They were told that he was in the country, and did not know when he would return. They were then told that a letter was written by Comstock to William Wilson the night previous. At this the clerks seemed surprised, and said, 'Well, we do not know where he is, nor when he will return.'

"A private detective then told my half brother where to find him, and said he was hid away in an upper room in the same building. There the officers went, knocking at one door where voices were heard within, but the door was locked. Then in another room adjacent an attempt was made to discover him among a company of gentlemen sitting apparently in committee, but Comstock could not be seen. A rush of running down stairs was made, only to retrace their steps just in time to find the door gently open that had before been tried and found locked. The officer slipped his foot between the door jamb and, walking into the room, arrested the great Anthony Comstock. He was taken before Justice Smith and committed in the following words of committal:

"'It appearing to me by the within depositions and statements that the crime therein mentioned has been committed, and that there is sufficient cause to believe the within-named Anthony Comstock guilty thereof, I order that he be held to answer and be admitted to bail in the sum of five hundred dollars, and be committed to the warden or keeper of the city prison of the city of New York until he give such bail. SOLON B. SMITH,

"'Police Justice.

"'Dated September 16, 1881.'"

You will therefore see, on referring to your open letter, that you admit that my first public communication against your act was printed on the 14th day of Sept., and yet you charge me with being like Ananias and Sapphira of old, by keeping back a part. How could I mention, in my communication of the 14th, that which was not written by you until the 15th? But you know very well that the letter you refer to as having been kept back was referred to as above on the 20th day of September, that being the first letter from myself after receiving the letter written by you on the 15th. You therefore utterly fail to show in your open letter that I had kept anything back. In the same open letter you refer to a lawsuit in Ireland between Wetton & Co., and William Wilson, of No. 64½ Patrick street, Cork, and the most malicious act that any man could conceive is the taking the trouble of writing to Ireland for information respecting a man, and when such information is received, telling one-half the story in a open letter to the public and keeping back the other half. This you know you hav done, and I challenge you to publish at your own cost your open letter, as I at my own cost shall publish this. Your malicious act in thus concealing the real nature of the lawsuit between Wetton and myself as rival manufacturers and large employers of labor is an act unworthy of the commonest informer. I hav a deed from the British government wherein, on the settlement of that suit as above referred to, such deed binds my opponents to pay me a large sum of money in settlement thereof. Your attorney, Mr. Tenney, or Mr. Colgate, your President, can see that deed whenever they choose to call at my offices. Yet you, in your open letter, attempted to show that I had been guilty of a crime. If this was not vindictiv malice, what was it? Again, in the same open letter, you would insinuate that my patent and Edgar Wetton's were the same. Yet you know very well that the circular from which you obtained the names of my patients contains also the following description of my patent:

"During the past few years seven or eight different patents hav been taken out for Electric and Magnetic Belts, but the vital defect in each and all of them has been a want of means whereby the magnetism once imparted to them could be retained. This defect has been fully overcome in the 'Wilsonia' invention. William Wilson struck the happy idea of attaching a series of Voltaic Piles to the Magnets, which by absorbing the natural exudations of the skin giv out a constant galvanic current, and thus keep up a continuous supply of Magnetism. Another very important feature of the 'Wilsonia' invention is this. Wearers of these garments never experience unpleasant shocks and are never afflicted with sores, which inevitably result from wearing galvanic chain bands—they having to be steeped in vinegar to render them capable of imparting any curativ property, and in this process they become the mother of an incurable form of erysipelas! And then, the 'Wilsonia' is as comfortable to wear as any undergarment. These appliances keep the body warm in the cold season, and, by their power of absorption, impart, in the summer, a refreshing coolness."

Also the Method of Manufacture.

"Wilsonia" Magnetic Clothing;

These goods are made as explained below, and every person following out the instructions here given can make for themselvs and their own wearing any garments to suit their malady.

Although I hav patented the invention, I giv any one the liberty to make for themselvs, but shall prosecute any one who dares to make them for others to wear, or to sell.

Process of Manufacture.

Take a sheet of cloth, or any woven fabric, lay it upon another sheet of gutta percha tissue, then lay a sheet of muslin corresponding in size; fasten these together. Then take hard steel plates (brittle as glass they need be for our purpose), cut them into narrow strips about one and a half inches long; perforate each plate, making a hole large enough to take in an ordinary shoe eyelet. These plates to the number of 250, with 500 eyelets, fastened to the cloth, are sufficient to make an ordinary NERVE INVIGORATOR. Over these plates, when fastened to the fabric, we place another sheet of india rubber tissue. Over this again we place another sheet of muslin and fasten the whole mass together with hot irons. We then puncture the eyelets the whole thickness of the fabric so fastened together, having about five hundred openings through the garments. Then we cover the whole with a lining of any material to suit the fancy of the wearer, but preferably canton flannel should be used. When the garment is so far finished it is magnetized by a powerful electro magnet until every plate of the whole series is thoroughly saturated with magnetism.

Having described the process as above, I again say that if you make the garments as I direct they will do you just as much good as though I made them myself. But the above being my patent, I shall prosecute any one who dares to make them for profit, and shall use the utmost rigor of the law in so prosecuting.

Now, then, where comes in quackery with with the WILSONIA?" Why do not the advertisers of quack nostrums tell purchasers how to make their compounds?

Now, as to Prof. White's great discovery: He told us a few weeks ago, through the columns of the New York Herald, that he had made a marvelous discovery, viz., that the whole secret of the electric charge in the Gymnotus, or electric eel, lay wholly in the fact that the said electric eel was enveloped in a film, whereby its electric charge was augmented. This marvelous discovery, he said, was only made after six and three-quarter years of fruitless research, and by an accident, he goes on to say, the whole thing was made complete.

Now it will be seen from reading the above formula, that WILLIAM WILSON'S patent was taken out two and a half years before Professor White made his statement through the columns of the Herald.

It is upon the Gutta Percha Film patented by MR WILSON, that the secret of the "WILSONIA'S" force wholly lies.

Physicians, electricians, and scientists are, therefore, invited to examin critically into the nature of the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING, and, with the formula before them, go into their laboratories and experiment for themselvs. They will then know that the

WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING

Is the Greatest Wonder of the Age, and yet withal one of the most Simple of Inventions

In the same open letter which you sent to the newspapers you maliciously attempt to belittle me by assuming that, because I had been a cabinetmaker, I could not therefore attain to a knowledge of curativ agencies distinct from the methods laid down by the schools. In answer to this assumption of yours, I can only say that I pity you for your stupidity. Do you not know that the celebrated Dr. John Hunter of London worked at the bench as a cabinetmaker at forty-two years of age, and afterward became the most eminent surgeon in Europe? and to-day the Hunterian Museum in London is a living monument of that cabinetmaker's skill? Do you not also know that all great inventions ever made emanate from among those whom we least suspect as the originators of new thought?

Another important reference in your open letter I refer to: On a board sign y u say as follows: "Read the Anthony Comstock letters in favor of 'Wilsonia.'" In answer to which I simply say that I hav the copies of fifty-five letters sent to you in favor of my garments, the parties sending such letters being those to whom you had conveyed your libelous communication. Therefore I call these letters of my patients the Anthony Comstock letters, and shall continue to publish them in a pamphlet dedicated to the Young Men's Christian Association of Brooklyn and New York; nor you nor your society shall intimidate me against such publication. Nothing shall be bidden nor held back. In conclusion, I again make the following challenge to you: To sign bonds for $5,000 if you can prove that I do not cure ninety per cent of the incurables given over by the doctors, or to produce one case where all the benefit was was not derived as promised on the purchase of the goods, such goods being worn as directed as to quantity and to time. I believe your society requires money to carry on its operations; here therefore, is a chance to add to its funds. I will also sign bonds for a like sum if you can show one testimonial published by me that was not genuin, and will pay all expenses of the six physicians on whom you relied, and will meet them singly or as a body on any platform in the United States, and prove to an audience of scientists that these physicians know nothing of the nature of nerve fluid, the constitution of the blood, nor the difference between electricity and magnetism as a curativ agent. WILLIAM WILSON.

Having thus openly answered your letter, and wishing the whole thing to be closed up, I herewith make you this offer, viz: That you shall, upon the examination of the deeds referred to in my letter as above, between your attorney and Mr. Colgate, upon the conclusion of such investigation, giv me a letter of apology for having been instrumental in casting discredit upon my invention. I am quite willing to accept your plea of ignorance of the facts, and that you were deceived by others.

Upon receipt of such letter of apology, I will withdraw all further proceedings. WILLIAM WILSON.

Important to the Suffering and Afflicted Who Hav Been Deceived by Advertising Nostrum Venders.

The great success attending the introduction of my world-famed WILSONIA GARMENTS has incited a host of speculators to place upon the market several bogus arrangements under the specious titles of "Magnetic Clothing" or "Magnetic Garments." One unprincipled person has actually copied my engraving representing my clothing, so that a person not seeing the garments would take it for granted that the goods so advertised were fac similes of the WILSONIA, the engravings representing the clothing being identical with those issued by myself thus tending to defraud the public by their purchasing a worthless article for the cure of some malady or other. This same person has copied, almost verbatim, the language of my own circulars. One of these garments was brought me direct from the vender. I find it to be a clumsy imitation of the first magnetic garments made in Europe some fifteen years ago. I would therefore ask the public to see the Wilsonia garments before purchasing anything represented as a magnetic clothing. They will then find that an attempt at imitation has been made by an engraved circular containing copies of my own circular as above stated, and so cunningly has the device been carried out that parties purchasing the goods from such circular will suppose that the garments so purchased were identical with my own, but when seen together they are as different as anything can possibly be conceived. If, however, persons will call at any of our STORES in New York or Brooklyn, or elsewhere in the United States where Wilsonia depots are opened, they may hav everything made clear to them. The claim of CHEAPNESS is a poor point to put forward when the matter of disease and life and death is in the balance. My reputation now is so unparalleled that never before in the history of the world hav such remarkable cures been effected as those following the timely use of the now world-renowned Wilsonia garments. The blind hav been made to see, the deaf to hear, the helpless-paralytic to walk erect, the demented to become sane, the martyr to catarrh and asthma to speak and breathe freely, the terrified with heart disease to walk forward among the public without the terror of impending death. All and every form of disease disappear when the Wilsonia Magnetic Garments are used as directed. I will undertake to cure 90 per cent of the so-called incurables now in the hospitals in the United States, and will place my garments upon such patients free of charge, the only condition I make being that the authorities governing such hospitals shall not allow any medicin to be given the patients during the wearing of my garments, and that the cures shall be publicly advertised as soon as made. CITIZENS OF AMERICA! when and where in the history of the world has such an offer as this been made? Here, in New York and Brooklyn alone, there are thousands of poor invalids in our hospitals passing through the ordeal of a protracted and living death who might, if my offer be accepted, be restored to the world as useful members of society, and this free of charge. If my offer be not accepted by the physicians of the hospitals, then the physicians must stand convicted of indifference and carelessness toward the poor invalids intrusted to their care. I hav sold my patent to a company with a view of manufacturing on a very large scale, so that with increased facilities in the form of valuable machinery specially prepared for our purposes, we shall be able to place upon the market an unlimited supply of these wonderfully curativ appliances.

After years of study in the particular direction of electrical therapeutics, I hav from time to time made many improvements on my first conception of what was needed for the relief and cure of disease until the "Wilsonia" in its present form contains all the elements of what has gone before in the same direction. The continuity of current is made complete, the dangers of non-ventilation are entirely overcome. This is an important point in the "Wilsonia." Thousands of persons are to-day suffering from the effects of retarded perspiration, having had thrown back into the organism the poisonous emanations of the body. The expensiv nature of the "Wilsonia" combination in all its entirety makes the price somewhat high, but yet it is far the cheapest in the end, inasmuch as the curativ force will continue for years, although a commoner kind will frequently result in marvelous cures. These commoner goods we sell at the following prices:

"DESIGN" IN NATURE.

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

Gems of Thought.

I CANNOT find one argument that proves the immortality of individual identities. It is there that I halt, and it is of this that I must first be convinced. It is true matter is eternal, and cannot be rendered obsolete—no particle can be destroyed. But is it true that light is a substance, or that electricity or magnetism are substances? Are they not, like life, mere forms of force, interchangeable and convertible one into the other, as heat and motion are, as different velocities in the rays of light create different colors? Is not what we call mind, soul, and spirit, an effect of organization? When the child is born it has no mind or soul, but the mind is created by impressions of external and internal influences. Everything that induces thought creates more mind. A child confined in a dark cellar from infancy to maturity, as Casper Hauser was, has hardly any mind at all, because it receives hardly any impressions from outward influences to create it.—Elmina Drake Slenker.

HENCE, vain, deluding joys!
The brood of folly, without father bred;
How little you bestead,
Or fill the fixed mind with all your toys!
Dwell in some idle brain,
And fancies fond with gaudy shapes possess,
As thick and numberless
As the gay motes that people the sunbeams;
Or likest hovering dreams,
The fickle pensioners of Morpheus's train.
But hail, thou goddess, sage and holy,
Hail, divinest melancholy!
—Milton's Il Penseroso.

DEMOLITION is undoubtedly a vulgar task; the highest glory of the statesman is to construct. But there is a time for everything—a time to set up and a time to pull down. The talents of revolutionary leaders and those of the legislature hav equally their use and their reason. It is the natural, the almost universal law, that the age of insurrections and proscriptions shall precede the age of good government, of temperate liberty, and liberal order—Macaulay.

IN fair nights, Henry, the Navigator, fourth son of John I., king of Portugal, might be seen for hours and hours on a Tower of Babel which he had built near Cape St. Vincent, holding a strange weapon in his hand, the astrolabe, and turning it toward the different quarters of the sky. There was an orthodox geography at that period, the middle of the eighteenth century, founded upon statements in the Jewish writings, and by the fathers of the church. The earth was in the center of the universe, the sun and the moon and the stars humbly revolving round it. Jerusalem was the precise center of the earth. In eastern India was the terrestrial paradise, situated on high ground, and surrounded by a wall of fire reaching to the sky. The fathers opposed the antipodes as being contrary to scripture. There could not be people on the other side of the earth, for how could they be able to see the Son of God or the Son of Man descending in his glory?—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

THEY say that had it not been for the first sin of Adam there would never hav been any devil in this world, and if there had been no devil there would hav been no sin, and if there had been no sin there would never hav been any death. For my part, I am glad there was death in this world, because that gave me a chance. Somebody had to die to giv me room, and when my turn comes I'll be willing to let somebody else fill my place. But whether there is another life or not, if there is any being who gave me this life, I thank him from the bottom of my heart, because, on the whole, my life has been "a thing of joy" and "a perpetual feast."—Ingersoll's Hell.

IT is a happy world, after all. The air, the earth, the water, teem with delightful existence. In a spring noon, or summer evening, on whichever side I turn my eyes, myriads of happy heings crowd upon my view. "The insect youth are on the wing." Swarms of new-born flies are trying their pinions in the air. Their sportiv motions, their wanton mazes, their gyrations, activity, their continued change of place without use or purpose, testify their joy and the exultation which they feel in their lately-discovered faculties.—Paley's Natural Theology.

BY ceaseless action all that is subsists.
Constant rotation of the unwearied wheel
That nature rides upon, maintains her health,
Her beauty, her fertility. She dreads
An instant's pause, and livs but while she moves.
Its own revolvency upholds the world.—Cowper.

IT was impossible for Moses to raise the minds of his people to a nobler conception of the deity; it would hav been as easy to make them see Roman noses when they looked into a mirror. He therefore made use of their superstition in order to rule them for their own good, and descended to trumpetings and fire-tricks, which chamber-moralists may condemn with virtuous indignation, but which men who hav known what it is to command a savage mob will not be inclined to criticise severely. —Mr. Reade.

THE present is better than the past, and the golden age of the world is in the future.—Underwood. Say not thou, What is the cause that the former days were better than these? for thou dost not inquire wisely concerning this.—Ecclesiastes, vii, 10.

WE sleep, and wake, and sleep, but all things move;
The sun flies forward to his brother sun;
The dark earth follows, wheeled in her ellips,
And human things, returning on themselvs,
Move onward, leading up the goldon year.
—Tennyson.

WHEN the polemic tells you that "nothing can be clearer," prepare yourself for what is specially obscure; when he insists that "there is nothing more certain," look out for what is singularly doubtful; and when he announces 'a positiv essential," expect a contradiction.—Martineau's Rationale of Religious Inquiry.

Odds and Ends.

"IS your father a Christian?" said a gentleman to a little boy on one occasion. "Yes, sir," said the little boy, "but I believe he has not worked much at it lately."—Detroit Free Press.

CURIOUS folks in Chicago. A clerical gentleman in Janesville, Wis., sent to a Chicago bookseller for Farrar's "Seekers After God" The bookseller simply wrote back. "No such persons in Chicago."

THREE FISSURES.

Three fissures went opening out to the East,
Past the East Wall, as the shaft went down,
And as they opened the ore increased,
And the news went spreading all over town.
For men must work while the world's asleep,
And the bullion yield must increase to keep
The stock at the Bay a-booming.

Three bankers sat in Nevada Block,
And they told their wealth as the sun went down—
Their wealth in bullion and wealth in stock—
And read the news from Virginia town.
For miner's work while the world's asleep,
And the bullion yield must increase to keep
The stock at the Bay a-booming.

Three brokers stood in the noisy street,
And they cursed their luck as the stock went down:
Each hour their ruin was more complete,
And nothing came from Virginia town.
For miners must work while the world's asleep,
And men must starve, and women must weep,
And stock is seldom booming.
—G. H. Jessop in Puck.

MR. SAWYER'S PROMISING CONVERT, AND HOW HE LOST HIM.

Brother Sawyer runs a gospel temperance meeting Sunday nights at Cooper Institute. He gets a salary of $1,800 per year for relating once a week the story of how he fell to the level of a common drunkard and then, through divine mercy, was permitted to rise again. He makes an occasional convert to the gospel of Christ and temperance, but, judging from the career of one of them, they do not all stay. The police officer whose duty it is to enforce the majesty of the law around the outskirts of Bro. Sawyer's meetings is an original and somewhat loquacious character, and has a way of embellishing his narrativ with shining streaks of profanity that might astonish any one unused to language illuminated in that way. He is also something of a philanthropist in his way, very lenient toward the offenses of extreme youth, and never arrests a criminal under six years of age. An individual connected with THE TRUTH SEEKER found this person one Sunday afternoon recently, dressed in citizen's clothes, in a wine cellar adjacent to the Institute. Conversation drifting toward the subject of Mr. Sawyer's labors, the officer was asked what he thought of them. "Damned little," said he. "It is my conclusion." he went on, profanely, "that there is more gospel than temperance about them meetings, and a damn sight more deviltry than either. I don't know what in thunder there is about Sawyer that entitles him to the salary he gets. He hasn't got anything but his experience as a bummer to fall back on, and every tramp has that; but he works it for all it's worth. But his nose givs him away. Did you ever get on to it? [The other party signified that he had tumbled to the rubicund appearance of the organ referred to.] Did you ever see such a prohoscis on a man that don't drink? My opinion is that if Sawyer hasn't had his booze every day for the last five or six years, he's found a fast color for his nose that beats the world. I heard him say once that he used to drink whisky, and kicked his mother one time when he was drunk. Now I've drank whisky ever since I was fifteen years old, and never thought of doing such a thing. A man that will kick his mother has got something in him that he didn't swallow. 'Twas born in him. 'Tain't whisky."

"Does Mr. Sawyer gain many converts to the cause?"

"He made one that I know of. It was something like this: one Sunday night one of them gaugers—a regular beer-keg drainer—came along and blundered in where Sawyer was a-holding forth. I never like to hear Sawyer spout myself, because he always reminds one of a man that's trying to talk and eat a hot potato at the same time. The fellow went forward to the anxious seat. He was all ready to reform and come to Jesus damned easy. He said he never would drink another drop of liquor, so help him God, and I don't know what he didn't say, for he was a ready talker and had a good deal of fluency into his speech. Hell! Sawyer couldn't begin to chin as that feller could. Well, the result of the whole thing was that the committe took him in hand and listened to his story. Then they dressed him up in a four-dollar suit of clothes and got him a job over on the west side at seven dollars a week. About a month after that I found him in the gutter on Fourth avenue drunker than an owl; couldn't lift his hand up to his head. I took him to the station-house, of course. Next time I seen Sawyer I says to him, 'Your new man Wilks, there, has sort of slipped back on you, hasn't he?' 'Is it possible?' says Sawyer. 'Well, it's damned probable,' says I, 'for I took him in the other day, and the judge fined him ten dollars for being drunk and disorderly. He couldn't pay the fine, and he's on the Island.' Sawyer felt cheap about it, but didn't say much. A fortnight later on Wilks came back. I said to him, 'Where are you going now?' 'For God's sake,' says he, 'don't say a word. I want to see Sawyer.' 'Well,' says I, 'you can see him.' So he went into the committee room. In about two minutes Sawyer called me. I knew what he wanted, and took Wilks out into the street, and havn't seen him from that day to this.

"Sawyer don't convert any man twice. He's satisfied there's grace enough to save all hands once, but he ain't sure about the second time. Wilks was a good deal like many another man—he could bear grief with a smile, but couldn't stand prosperity worth a damn."

VINELAND, N. J.
A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.
Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.
Spermatorrhea and Impotency,
as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an
EXTERNAL APPLICATION,
which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case. Some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.
SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.
Middle-Aged and Old Men.
There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and turpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.
Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.
PRIVATE COUNSELOR.
Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, his system based upon scientific fact."

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.
BY JAMES PARTON.
With Portraits and other Illustrations.
This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.
Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

PROF. HAECKEL is now in Ceylon for the purpose of extending his scientific researches.

WHAT is the matter with art in Boston? The Boston Herald says: "So you want to laugh, do you? Then stroll down to the Museum of Fine Arts, and look at the Christmas card designs."

THE Rev. T. E. Aldrich, a pastor of Middletown, Conn., has been arrested for beating his wife. He has been a successful temperance worker, but, it is charged, usually got drunk after every sermon, and whipped his wife when he got home.

THE Rev. Dr. Thomas, the Chicago expelled Methodist, has formed a People's church, and is preaching to twice as many people as before, for twice as much salary. The only creed the new organization holds is the Ten Commandments and the teaching of Christ.

THE list of agrarian outrages in Ireland is increasing. One Dublin paper prints a record of two hundred and fifty overt acts by the Irish tenants for the month of November. Free speech in that city is practically suppressed, and every one connected with the newspaper called United Ireland has been arrested.

THE Rev. Mr. Hull, of this city, said last Sunday that he had no objection to anybody's dancing the way David danced before the Lord, as described in 2 Sam., vi, 14–23. The passages in question state that "David uncovered himself in the eyes of the handmaids" to such an extent that his wife was ashamed of him.

SOME of the Danes living in Leadville belong to a religious body called Skages, who centuries ago practiced human sacrifice, and still hold to it in theory. The Leadville colony lately met on an anniversary occasion, and, as a part of the rites, their leader cut himself ceremoniously in the arm, shedding a bowlful of sacrificial blood.

WITHIN the last week Sir John Astley's house has been burnt, the library of the Duke of Sunderland has been sold at auction, the Earl of Crawford's body has been stolen from the grave, and a divorce trial has brought out the rehearsal of how the Earl of Shrewsbury stole the wife of Mr. Munday. All this in merry England.

PROF. ROBERTSON SMITH, the Scotch theologian, has received from his friends a liberal donation of cash, to be invested in books for his library. He is devoting his time to literary pursuits, largely in connection with the "Encyclopedia Britannica," in the early volumes of the present edition of which appears the articles which brought on him the condemnation of his brethren.

A MOTION was recently carried in the Washington territory legislature to exempt from taxation "all property belonging to institutions having for their objects the advancement of science and Freethought, and the education of the people, untrammeled by narrow theological dogmas or church creed." Motions to exempt the property of ministers and Masonic orders were lost.

SOME of the gentlemen who are wise in ecclesiastical arithmetic hav been summing up what has been done toward converting the world and comparing it with what is yet to be done. They hav concluded that by commissioning men enough as missionaries and providing them with money enough to do the work the whole world can be converted by the close of this century. Some of their estimates are a little wild.

AN old lady in Vermont sent President Arthur a box of butternut candy for Thanksgiving, which he acknowledged with thanks. The Woman's Suffrage Society sent him a copy of "The History of Woman Suffrage," elegantly bound in calf, with the compliments of the editors, and hav as yet received no response. Hence they infer that butternut candy is more dear to our President than the political rights of his female fellow-citizens.

Now murder is all the rage, and the hangman and the jail chaplain are likely to hav plenty of work on their hands; it is well to relieve our horror with a true story. A bishop out in America visited one of the state prisons and offered to officiate. "No need of you here, sir," said the head jailer, "we hav eight preachers safely locked up, who are brought out each Sabbath to minister to their fellow-prisoners!" Exit bishop.—Freethinker.

THEY hav some good men out in Montana One of them, who is a liquor-dealer, states in a card to his customers that he firmly believes in the sacredness of the Sabbath, and consequently, though he breaks old customs in doing so, he closes on that day; but in the same card he assures his friends that he keeps as good a stock of whiskies as any man in the territory, and urges them to make such arrangements as will enable them to buy their goods on week-days.

THE French Protestant church is seriously considering the issue of a revision of the Bible for use in France. The Synod which recently met at Marseilles appointed a commission to consider all existing French versions of the Bible, both Old Testament and New. It is thought by some that one of these versions may be adopted, but the prevalent idea is that nothing short of a new version will giv entire satisfaction. In this connection it may be mentioned that the late English revision of the New Testament has become a drug in the New York market.

A CHURCH-OF-ENGLAND priest in one of our agricultural districts walks about with his wife on one arm and a widow on the other. He carries a dog-whip and sports a terrier at his heels; and in church, we are told, he is fond of "carrying his mortar-board from the altar to the pulpit." A profane parishioner sent him a note to this effect: "I believe in the trinity of the three hats; first, the priest's hat; secondly, the field-marshal's hat; and thirdly, the money hat; and yet they are not three hats, but one old hat." The widow's name is Marshall.—London Freethinker.

PAINE'S "Age of Reason" has been seized at the Toronto (Can.) Custom House as indecent. This is quite a new way of suppressing heresy. Darwin's "Descent of Man" will soon be prosecuted for dealing with the habits of monkeys, and Huxley's "Lay Sermons" for indecent attacks on the cosmogony of Moses. Paine's works hav been lied about often enough, but until now we hav never heard them called indecent, and the charge comes with especial grace from those who put the Bible into children's hands as the word of God. That holy book contains some of the filthiest stories in existence.—London Freethinker.

GREAT bugler in the army of the sky!
Thy trumpet notes the faithful hear in heaven,
Glad note to knaves and fools who die forgiven,
And go to lounge in golden streets on high;
Apart the clouds at thy command are riven,
And he alone who best can cheat and lie
Shall through the folds of fleecy fabric fly,
While honest men, who dare to doubt, are driven
By thy dread blast to dark and sulphurous hell,
Forever more in torment fierce to gasp,
While thieves and murderers forever clasp
The golden harps that endless music swell;
Town clerk and crier of the angel choir,
Blow on, while skeptics shriek in endless fire.
Amen.

SOME of the clergymen of Cleveland, O., are much exercised as to whether it is right or wrong to giv the newspaper men the manuscripts of their sermons on Sunday for publication in the papers of Monday. A few of these gentlemen hav wisely discerned that the publication of the discourses carries them to a congregation of readers many times larger than that of the hearers in church. These gentlemen consider it no sin to hav the sermons put in type on Sunday that they may appear on Monday morning. But there are some who consider it a profanation of the day to hav the sermons set up. And there are yet others who are so exceedingly nice about it that they draw the line on the midnight hour. They are willing that the sermons shall appear on Monday morning provided no type-setting is done on them until after the final stroke of twelve has sounded. It is suggested that these clergymen shall preach about straining at gnats and swallowing camels.

EVERYWHERE the clergy are showing signs of alarm. Even in godly Scotland able doctors of divinity like Principal Caird and Prof. Flint hav been exhorting ministers and students to try and keep abreast of the thought of the age. They see that when the best intellect of a nation leaves a faith it is bound to decay. Inferior religionists are trying new sensational forms of revivalism. Both are unconsciously aiding the cause they least desire to aid. Supernaturalists are striving against a stream stronger than themselvs, and know not whither it is carrying them. We, mounted on the tide of Freethought, are bounding forward and know where we are going. With science at the helm our course is kept straight, and our topmast men begin to see the haven in sight. Driving backward by our tide, they dread untold dangers, and screech out that the ship of society is bound to destruction because it deserts them and the ways of steering laid down in their sacred, antique chart. You hav had your day, ye black-robed, white-chokered gentry; and a fine mess you've made of it. Clear the way.

THE assassin Guiteau is a devout Christian believes in God, Jesus, Holy Ghost, and Virgin Mary, and says that God employed him to remove President Garfield. President Arthur corroborates Guiteau's statement by saying, "It hath pleased the Almighty in his inscrutable providence to remove," etc., and the question is, Can the twelve jurymen (they are all Christians) deny that it is so? The Bible says that God commanded Samuel to butcher Agag, and the divine record also teems with butcheries ordered by this same deity. Can these jurymen believe the one story and not the other? If Samuel and Moses and David were God's chosen instruments to kill people, why should not Guiteau, Freeman, and others be so also? It might be well to establish this thing now by making "a man after God's own heart" of Guiteau for the "spiritual" benefit of nations yet unborn. But if Guiteau should perchance be pronounced guilty by his Christian peers, he will go straight to heaven to join the immortal band of villains, cut-throats, and murderers that hav gone before him.—Anti-Monopolist.

A METHODIST minister traveling in Michigan was entertained by a family whose hospitality was greater than their means, and who were short of meat. In order to spread a good dinner for the parson, it was decided to slay the pet hen which belonged to the little boy of the family. This was a sacrifice, but the interests of religion and hospitality seemed to demand it, and so the bird's neck was wrung. After dinner the minister was asked to lead in family devotions, which with true clerical courtesy he consented to do. The family being called together, all knelt down on the floor, which was of boards, liberally adorned with knot-holes. While the prayer was going on, a lonely little chicken, one of the children of the deceased hen, came running under the house, lamenting the loss of its mother. The afflicted little lad put his mouth to a knot-hole, and sympathetically said to the chicken: "Peepy, peepy, I didn't kill your mother. They killed her for that big old preacher's dinner." That "big old preacher" was startled out of all sense of prayerfulness, and suddenly brought his devotional exercises to a close.

THE Guiteau trial has developed but few new features in the last week. Testimony in rebuttal of the evidence of his insanity goes to show that Guiteau has for years had a morbid desire for notoriety; that as early as 1878 he promised to some day make himself famous all over the world; and that his conduct through life has been that of a depraved rascal rather than a lunatic. A Baptist minister in this city testified that six years ago Guiteau was expelled from his church for gross immoralities.

A Truth Seeker Around the World.

A Few Days in Athens.—Concluded.

Eleusis is still considerable of a village, though by no means beautiful, and stands near the bay. The ancient city dates from the most early times, and is supposed to have derived its name from the advent of Ceres, who, with Proserpine, was worshiped here with ancient processions and the celebrations of the Eleusinian mysteries already alluded to. The town was a mile in length, and was built at the eastern end of a low, rocky hight, parallel with the shore of the bay, and separated on the west from the falls of Mount Kerata by a narrow branch of the plain. The eastern extremity of the hill was levelled artificially for the reception of the Hierum of Demeter (Ceres) and the other sacred buildings. Above these are the ruins of the Acropolis. A triangular space of about five hundred yards each side, lying between the hill and the shore, was occupied by the town of Eleusis. On the eastern side the town wall is traced along the summit of an artificial embankment, carried across the marshy ground from some hight above the Hierum. The wall, according to the practice of the Greeks in military architecture, was prolonged into the sea so as to form a mole sheltering a harbor, which was entirely artificial, and was formed by this and two other longer moles, which project about three hundred feet into the sea, the foundations of which remain a foot or so above the water. There are many remains of buildings and walls along the shore, as well as in other parts of the town and citadel.

Upon approaching the town the first conspicuous object is a delapidated pavement, terminating in the portico of two temples, now in complete ruins, and the larger share covered with earth, upon which stand several humble dwellings. The first temple is that of Diana. The foundation of the portico, and the steps and fragments of pillars are about all that remain. The temple of Ceres close beside it is thought to have been far more imposing. The portico and portions of the columns, etc., are lying on the ground, but no part of it is in an upright position. Nearly all of it is covered with earth, which will have to be excavated before any facts can be arrived at with respect to the dimensions of the temple and the condition of the statuary in it. From appearances and the out-croppings of the pillars, etc., at the west end, we judged that the temple must have been from three hundred to five hundred feet in length. A company for excavating has the matter in hand, and will soon commence unearthing the temple, when it is thought many statues will be found and much of great interest. The ends of the two temples now to be seen were unearthed some twelve years ago. The temple of Ceres is said to have been the largest temple in Greece, and it is to be hoped that in a year or two much more will be known about it than is known now. Some fourteen houses are to be removed to make the excavations. In a humble building we saw hundreds of pieces of broken statuary which once adorned the temples.

After lingering around and meditating upon the ruins, a part of the company walked down to the waters' edge and looked at the mole, the walls of which project somewhat above the water. We also entered an oil mill, where we saw a pile of olives ready to be mashed up. The mill in which they are ground is a stone, weighing nearly a ton, traveling in a bed or circular trough. The pumice is put into stout cloths, and pressed in a heavy press, by much the same process as lard oil is manufactured. Many of you, doubtless, are aware what kind of fruit the olive is, but for those who do not know I will state that it is an oblong oval about an inch in length and about the size and shape of a pecan nut. It is of a fleshy character; some of them are black when ripe, while others are green. The trees bear very full, but only every second year, much as with apples.

We saw near the shore of the bay a modern-looking manufactory with a tall chimney, and learning it was an improved oil mill and soap factory we wished to see it. At the entrance we were met by a very gentlemanly person who spoke excellent English, and who, upon our making our wishes known, very kindly showed us over the establishment, which consists of two separate buildings, one for oil, the other for soap-making. The oil is obtained from the pressed pumice of the olive, which appears so dry that one would think very little oil is left in it; but by being ground up and treated with a liquid called sulphur-carbon, or sulphurated carbon, obtained by distilling sulphur in contact with charcoal, a vapor arises, which, in a condenser, is reduced to a liquid state. The oil cake, treated with this in close boilers, parts with its oil, and some fourteen per cent of oil is obtained which otherwise would be lost. This oil is not as colorless as first-class olive oil, but it is very good for soap making, for machinery, and many other purposes. As the oil cake is obtained in large quantities, the quantity of oil produced is very considerable. The oil, after separating, settling, and fining, is pumped into the other building and made into olive oil soap by boiling it for four days with a solution of caustic soda, which is much the same process as that by which soap is made from animal oils and fat. We saw the large boilers in which the union between the oil and alkali is effected. We saw the vats into which the soap is placed to cool and harden into large cakes ten feet square, and where, when cold, it is cut with a large knife into cakes two feet square, and afterwards cut up with wires into cakes of uniform size weighing a pound, when a company of Grecian girls pass the cakes through presses, stamping them in Greek The Eleusis Soap Works, and then packing them in boxes for market. As fancy soap making is one of the avocations I have pursued in my somewhat checkered career, I was very much interested in looking over this establishment, and was glad to find so practical an enterprise in this classical land.

The soap turned out is of excellent quality, and none of it is adulterated with rosin, as is the case in our country with all the common grades of soap. Here the oil is so cheap there is not the same incentive for adulteration as otherwise might be the case. A scented soap is also made in the same establishment, and pressed in cakes about one-fourth the size of those already alluded to. Upon expressing a wish to buy some for samples of Grecian-made soap to take with us, the very courteous gentleman presented us each with one of the large cakes and three paper boxes containing three cakes each, and utterly refused to take any pay for them. I expressed my gratitude, and said I should be pleased to mention the establishment and his kindness in the volumes descriptive of my journey which I am writing. Upon his saying he would be pleased to see the work, I promised to send him a copy when published. So here is a market for one more copy.

The firm which owns the works is Messrs. Charialaos & Ralli. The name of the gentleman who conducted us over the establishment is Deinitriades He is nephew to one of the firm, and has an interest in the business. He has spent some twelve years in England, which accounts for his speaking English so well. He said, however, that he is a native Greek, but not a brigand.

I must say that our ride to Eleusis, and all connected with it, was of the most enjoyable character. The weather was most lovely, the roads good, and the associations and memories connected with the locality such as to keep the interest hightened to the utmost. We were pleased to learn that next year the five miles of railroad now existing will be continued to Eleusis, on to Corinth, and perhaps to Thebes, which is still out beyond Eleusis. The latter town, so pleasantly situated on the lovely bay, is a charming place for a residence, and as Greece increases in wealth and improvements it will no doubt become a point of extra attraction. We got back to the city in time for dinner—6:30—feeling more than pleased with what we had seen.

MODERN GREEKS.

Any one who visits Greece to-day will inevitably be impressed with the conviction that the present inhabitants of the country have deteriorated from the proud standard once maintained by the people. The reasons for this are doubtless ample to account for the falling-away that has taken place. If the present race of Greeks are the absolute descendants of the ancient dwellers in this land, their repeated subjections by the Romans, the Venetians, and lastly by the Turks, under whom they long groveled in the most abject servility, were sufficient to seriously affect their manhood, and to account for the defects found in their character. It must be borne in mind that when Greece, fifty years ago, escaped from the heavy yoke of the Turks, she was reduced to the lowest condition compatible with existence. Athens was in ruins, but a single residence being left uninjured, and the whole of Greece being devastated and virtually in ashes. If we now find the inhabitants behind those of other European countries, we must remember the degraded state from which they have emerged, and that what she is she has accomplished in half a century. It is but a small country, and much of its lands are mere piles of rocks, while the aridity of the climate in late years renders the more level land far less productive than it would be under other circumstances. But the country has made rapid strides since obtaining its independence. Although at that time this city of Athens had but a single house uninjured and its inhabitants numbered but five hundred, it is now a well built city of nearly one hundred thousand. The population of the country, with the additions that have recently been made to it, is between one and a half and two millions.

The country has not had the time or wealth to engage largely in manufactures, but is perhaps doing tolerably well in that direction. One paper mill is in successful operation at Piræus. Several cotton mills are at work, some silk is produced, and several branches of minor manufactures are being prosecuted, including shoemaking, pottery, blacksmithing, stone-cutting, and the various other trades required in domestic life. The manufactures that have been started, especially the cotton works, have been done by people of other nations, notably the English. It must be said, too, that the Greeks do not show as much favor toward foreigners coming among them and engaging in such works of enterprise as would be well for them to do. A few years ago a Frenchman came here to engage in the silk business, bringing with him a capital of 50,000 francs, which he deposited in one of the banks of this city as a surety of the earnestness of his intentions. He set out a large number of mulberry-trees, and went to other heavy expenses; and when his business had progressed so far as to require the labor of many persons, both male and female, there were plenty here capable of performing the services, and who needed the money he had to pay them. But it was not long before he learned that a spirit inimical to him existed among the people. They were jealous of the success they perceived he was making and evinced a disposition to interfere with him. It was not long before the priests told the women working for him that it was improper for them to work there in company with men, and that they must desist. A similar influence was also brought to bear upon the men, and one morning the Frenchman was much chagrined to find that every one of his employees had deserted him, and that he could not induce them to resume work. What was he to do? He had invested too much money in his business to allow it to perish by default of labor. He went at once to France and Italy and secured such help as he required to conduct his business, and soon he was all right again. But the Greeks determined that he should not succeed among them, and ere long, on a certain night, his property was destroyed by evil-minded persons, and at a loss of his capital he was compelled to relinquish his enterprise. It seems singular that any people should be so short-sighted to their own best interests as to prevent an enterprise so useful and so beneficial to the country, for Greece is probably as well adapted to the silk culture as almost any other country in the world, and sadly needs just such industrial enterprises to prevent the necessity of importing, and also to assist in raising the revenue required to keep up a government. It is to be hoped that a better kind of sense is gaining ground here, and that foreign capital and enterprise will be welcomed here, which are needed to develop this beautiful country. I think the English and Scotch who are running the few mills in the country are now meeting with no opposition. The Greeks are an ingenious, active people, and they greatly need capital and enterprise from other countries.

I have looked around a little among the shops here, and while I see evidences of mechanical skill, the marks of thrift are not as conspicuous as one would wish. Many of the domestic branches of manufacture are prosecuted in a very primitive manner. Shoemakers sit on a stool by the side of the streets, and even under the shade of a tree by the roadside in the country or far outside the city, and their kit of tools is extremely limited. When in my youthful days I worked four years at shoemaking, I would hardly have felt that I could prosecute it under such conditions. I will remark, however, that these outside workmen are cobblers rather than makers of new work, though I have seen both branches going on in the open air. I have seen men reeling and twisting silk in the open air, on a vacant lot in the city. Their implements remind one much of rope-makers' apparatus, and the two young men I saw thus at work displayed much activity and skill in handling the threads, doubling, twisting, reeling, etc. It is very common to see women spinning cotton or wool before their cottage doors, and even while walking the streets; and the process by which they do it is extremely simple. On a small distaff which they hold in the left hand, or by the forearm passed against the side, is the material they are spinning; they draw out the thread much as is done on the spinning-wheel; the thread is wound upon a bobbin, which hangs dangling before them, and the twisting is done by giving the bobbin a skilful whirl. In several shops I saw wax being manufactured into large candles for worshipful and decorative purposes. Much fantastic work is put upon them, and decided ingenuity displayed. These candles vary in size from six inches to four feet in length.

It cannot be denied that the Greeks have an unenviable reputation in some directions, and particularly as regards truthfulness and integrity. To "lie like a Greek" has passed into a proverb, and is considered a very strong comparison. They are clearly sharp in trade, and it is notorious that they resort to trickery, misrepresentation, and downright dishonesty to effect their purposes. Jews exhibit much tact in buying and selling; they will buy as cheaply as possible, and will sell their merchandise to the best possible advantage, but when that is said, all is said; but Greeks have the reputation of resorting to conspiracy, intrigue, and downright rascality that a Jew would never be guilty of. This has been their character in the various cities to which they have emigrated, to wit, London, Paris, Vienna, Venice, Trieste, Constantinople, Smyrna, Alexandria, the cities of Syria, etc. They have usually been successful in getting wealth, but have not, as a rule, done it as honestly as they should have done.

They also have the charge of brigandage laid at their doors. There is probably nothing of the kind attempted here in Athens, but I am informed that in the rural districts it is scarcely safe for a stranger to travel by himself, and that he runs great risk of being attacked, all his money and valuables taken from him, and his person held to secure a ransom, much as the brigands of Italy have persecuted for centuries. In fact, the two peoples seem much alike. They have the same dark, swarthy skins; they have much the same features; they are just about as dirty in their habits, and their cries in the streets and jabberings sound much alike, and alike they are the degenerated descendants of two great and noble races of people who did great things for the civilization of the world, but unfortunately fell into dissipation and crime, and virtually passed from the earth. With regard, however, to the brigandage in both countries, it is to be hoped it has very much lessened, and is rapidly passing away.

The venality and corruption of the governmental officers of Greece are matters of general remark. Positions under the government are said to be procured by purchase, favoritism, and without regard to fitness in excess of almost any other country. Legislation is also procured by open-faced bribery and corruption, unheard-of, perhaps, save in our own country. It is a common thing for the cost of getting certain acts passed through the Parliament to be discussed, as the price of wheat or mules. Custom house officers are also said to be very venal; by slipping slyly into their hands a sum of money of suitable amount, merchants are able to get their goods through far below the usual rates; while on the other hand, those to whom favors are not to be shown have to submit to enormous exactions, heavy bills being presented, without enumerating the items in an honorable manner, and far in excess of the requirements of the law, and which have to be submitted to and paid before the merchandise can be obtained. I learned that this course is especially pursued at the Custom House at Corfu. Really, it is to be feared that the Greeks are nearly as dishonest as Americans.

The Greeks are apt scholars, and even small children learn with extraordinary celerity. Mr. and Mrs. Hill, Americans, formerly of New York city, and teachers, have been here in Athens for many years, and have had charge of the female schools, and they report the remarkable readiness with which Greek children acquire the English language, as well as other branches of learning. Many instances illustrate this, one of which I will repeat. A little girl about eight years of age attended their school, and among other studies took lessons in English for about six months, when on account of sickness she was compelled to remain three months at home, and where she had the advantage of no lessons, and where she heard no English spoken. Upon her return to school she was handed the New Testament and asked to read the second chapter of Matthew, which she did in good English without making a single balk or mistake. They also report the children of both sexes show great avidity for learning, and make astonishing progress. A very good system of free public schools has been inaugurated here. I learn, however, that but few books are published in Greece, and that the people are not specially fond of reading. Several papers, weekly and daily, are published here, but they are not large, and the living power which the boys exercise every morning to sell them argues that they do not sell very readily, or that their anxiety to effect sales leads them to make a great ado in accomplishing it. It seemed to me that so far as noise is concerned the boys of Athens throw the New York Arabs far into the shade. As these Athenian papers are printed in characters and words which I cannot understand in the slightest degree, I will not attempt to give you an idea of the editorial talent employed. I even have not attempted to rake up any editorial brotherhood. I will say in this connection that the modern Greek language, both in letters and words, is as different from ancient Greek as the modern inhabitants are unlike their illustrious predecessors. The modern Greek is in Roman characters or letters, with the addition of several with a decided Greek appearance. The modern Greeks cannot understand ancient classic Greek any better than people of other nationalities. As with the Romans, the old language of the ancients has departed, much as have the bravery and high character of the people.

The costumes worn by the natives vary not a little. The women seem to adopt modern styles more than the men. Most of the women in the city present no characteristics of dress materially unlike what are seen in other European countries, while the men very largely keep up the national or Albanian costume. Hats are hardly worn at all, but a kind of cloth skull-cap, a little like the fez of a Turk. Pants are largely dispensed with, or made of common muslin and not reaching down to the knees, with long stockings reaching above the knees and fastened with a kind of garter. They wear a kind of skirt or kilt, made of uncolored muslin, fifteen or twenty inches in length and about two thirds of a yard in width, gathered finely in plaits and tied about the waist, reaching nearly to the knees. Double the amount of muslin is used in making that seems necessary, but perhaps fulness is a mark of beauty in the eyes of a modern Greek. These skirts stand out like the short dress of a dancing girl on the stage of a theater, and the legs are seen at whole length. What there is in the way of pants or breeches are nearly as tight-fitting as the stockings. This dress is worn in great numbers, especially by peasants and country people, and is rather of Albanian fashion. There are several modifications of it hardly necessary to describe. In the rural districts but little of the modern European style of dress is to be seen, everybody wearing some variety of the national costume. The peasant women wear skirts of rather a small pattern, and made of a kind of wide stripes of plaid in high colors, and often of wool. The men seem partial to white garments, while the women show a partiality for bright and strong colors. Both go barefooted to a large extent, especially outside of Athens; and when they wear shoes they are of peculiar fashion, with sharp, turned-up toes, with a tassel or frizzly ball at the very point.

I cannot call the women of modern Greece pretty. I have seen some not absolutely repulsive, but no Helens that would need to be the cause of another Trojan war on account of their beauty. Many of them have high cheek-bones and rather short upper lips, so as to show their teeth much of the time. They remind me a little of American squaws, many of them being nearly as dark. The men are still darker, being more in the sun without anything to shade the face, and I presume they do not make an excessive use of the Eleusis soap. Without partiality, I must say I think the men are quite as good-looking as the women.

There is no theater in operation in Athens at the present time, or I am not sure but I should have yielded to the temptation of attending, although it would have been all Greek to me. The only amusement I have heard of is a sort of drinking-room concert, where there is one female actress and a band of Bohemian girls who play on musical instruments, and for pay take up a collection among the audience. There is a peculiar characteristic among these Bohemian girls worthy of mention. Great numbers leave their homes in Bohemia to visit Trieste, Venice, Corfu, Athens, Constantinople, Smyrna, Alexandria, Cairo, and other cities, to sing and play on musical instruments, which avocation is largely carried on in cafés and drinking-places, visited only by men, where they are subjected to the grossest insults and compelled to hear conversation most unfit for young girls to listen to. All this they submit to with becoming resignation, often taking part in the conversation, for it is from this class that their patronage is obtained. What is most strange is that though these girls pass the day and much of the night in those places, and are approached constantly by the most designing and unprincipled men, not one of them has been known to go astray. They will be very sociable, and talk and laugh freely with those who talk with them, but they will not transcend the line of female propriety. They travel in companies of from six to ten; they are together through the day and occupy the same room at night. A man and his wife and daughter frequently travel in this way and take six or eight of these girls with them. Every man who hires these girls to accompany him for one or two or three years to sing and play gives security to their parents that the girls shall be returned as pure and spotless as when they left home. My informant tells me that this contract is invariably kept. I have heard one of this band of Bohemian girls playing, some on one instrument, some on another, making altogether very good music. It is indeed singular that these girls of Bohemia should, under the most trying circumstances, maintain their virtue perfectly untarnished, while in localities not far from their homes—Vienna, Galatz, and other places on the Danube—a very low state of morals exists.

Of the Athenian girls it is to be said that, brought as they are in contact with the corrupting influences of modern civilization, some of them become prostitutes, but in the interior provinces, and away from the cities, such a thing is almost unknown. If some poor unfortunate girl is so unwise as to listen to the tempter's wiles and step astray, she becomes an outcast and is disowned by her parents and relatives; she is turned from her father's roof and is compelled to seek a home among strangers. If a person chances to see one of these unhappy exiles, and says afterward to the father or brother, I saw your daughter, or your sister, the reply is, "I have no daughter," or, "I have no sister." This hard-hearted severity may be productive of good, but it seems merciless and cruel. The sin which is thus execrated and visited so severely upon the head of the female is equally as bad in one sex as the other; and it is very wrong, very unjust, to crush the girl to the earth and abandon her to the fate of an outcast, while the male is just as respectable as ever, and is left free to repeat his conquests as often as opportunity may serve. The punishment should always be as heavy upon the male as upon the female.

The hotel where we stop is immediately in front of the king's palace, an esplanade or public square only intervening. Of course we could not do less than visit it, although the king and queen are not present to acknowledge our great condescension, being away looking after some of the new possessions that have recently been ceded to them. The palace is a plain, heavy structure, three stories high, and three hundred feet or more in length. The broad stairway leads up to the general reception room, more than a hundred feet in length and fifty broad, with a floor of marble. The throne room is rich enough, but still plain compared with the Quirinal Palace in Rome, where King Humbert is domiciled. But that, come to remember, was fitted up for the vicegerents of the meek and lowly Jesus, and which they were under the necessity of vacating in favor of their successful rival, the king. That palace is extremely rich, the gold and crimson being in profusion; but this palace of King George and Queen Olga is no finer than many private persons boast of, though the rooms are larger than those of most private mansions. The ball-room is large and pretty; it is three large room in one, separated by curtains, which are withdrawn when occasion requires. The floor is ingenious, made of wood of different colors, and laid in squares, diamonds, and various figures. The same is true of many of the floors in the palace.

The king and queen have each a chapel of their own under the same roof where they live. King George is a Dane, a brother of the Princess of Wales, England, and he worships God according to Martin Luther, while the queen, being a Russian princess, belongs to the Greek church and can take no lot or share in Lutheranism. If they both worship at the same time it would only seem reasonable that if God attends equally well to both of them he must get a trifle mixed as to the forms and desires of the same royal household. I imagine, however, he has a happy way of turning those things off very cavalierly, not caring a straw how they worship, what they believe, what they think, or what they do. With him kings and subjects stand upon a level, and he does not bother his head about either of them. It is as much as he wants to attend to to run his celestial domain about the clouds. The church which the king uses is much larger than the chapel of the queen, but hers is the more showy and has the most pictures of the Virgin and her somewhat noted son. She worships in Greek, while George goes it in Dutch, but God is said to understand one just as well as he does the other; in fact, he is said to be familiar with the three thousand different languages and dialects that are used among men. If this is so he is far the best linguist I ever heard of. Elihu Burritt could not compare with him. I wish I could borrow for six months his knowledge of eight or ten langnages I can name, but I am very sure he would not lend it. I have not asked him, because I thought it would do no good. If his defenders are correct, he knows perfectly well that I need a knowledge of Greek, Turkese, Syriac, Egyptian, Hindostanee, Burmese, Siamese, Chinese, Japanese, and Tahiatian, to get along conveniently in the long journey before me, and to be able to learn facts and to give the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER all they are entitled to; and still, though I am perhaps as deserving as the next man, he has not had the generosity to impart a bit of information upon the subject, and I know well enough he would not though I besought him in tears. If he would not even let good James A. Garfield live when millions of pious Christian men and women, backed by one hundred and fifty thousand ministers and priests, asked him so pretty, and said "Please," and repeated the request so many times, I have not the least idea he would teach me Greek any quicker than he would Choctaw, neither as a matter of gracious kindness, nor if I even gave him a half interest in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I used to try him, time and again, a good many years ago, before I learned better, and though my requests were varied and sincere, I cannot remember that he was influenced by one of them in the slightest degree.

I cannot think that would be my disposition. If I could only be God Almighty for six days and a half, and possess infinite power, as it is said he does, I would open my ears wide and my heart still wider. I would stretch out my hands—or it seems to me now that I would—and I would shower down blessings upon all the people of the earth, even if I thought they had not been quite as good as they might be; I would make everybody happy; I would listen to all the prayers that might be offered up to me, in whatever language they might be couched; I would answer them, too. In fact I would anticipate and answer them before the prayers were uttered; I would not allow a man, woman, or child, on all the face of the earth to suffer with headache, toothache, earache, backache, bellyache, cholic, gripings, cholera, gout, rheumatism, neuralgia, sore eyes, sore toes, sore heels, felons on the fingers, boils on the neck, or any other part, cancers, white swelling, salt-rheum, leprosy, bronchitis, consumption, scarlet fever, the measles, mumps, whooping-cough, influenza, epizootic, or any other form of ache, ailment, or disease that can be imagined. I should feel that if I possessed infinite power and did not remove these evils from the earth I would be just as responsible for their existence as though I had created them especially to afflict mankind. I would not suffer the feeble old women that live in the attics of our cities to be compelled to work eighteen hours a day making shirts, pants, and vests for the slop-shops for twenty-five cents a day, to eke out a miserable existence in a world which they were compelled to enter without having any word or choice in the matter; I would take good care of the widows, and provide the old maids with husbands. I would not let any of the old men go hungry; I would banish affliction and suffering from the face of the earth; I would not allow any one to die except of old age, and then like a little babe going to sleep; I I would cause the people to be so happy that their faces would never be long nor sad. I would have smiles take the place of tears. I would so order things that all human beings would delight to be good to each other and to always refrain from unkind conduct. I would banish sighs and groans and sorrow from the world; I would make everybody happy, loving, and healthy; I would cast out all the devils that trouble men and women, and would do it so effectually that every devil should die and never trouble man nor woman again. It might not be a practicable thing to make a first-class god of me, but if it can be done, and I can only be invested with infinite power, I will agree to acquit myself one hundred per cent better than any god I have heard of, and prove myself a blessing to the world, instead of a curse. I am sure it would add to my own happiness to increase the happiness of my subjects, and if I found it inconvenient to carry out the things I have enumerated, I would commission, if necessary, a million angels and archangels to accomplish it all with promptness and dispatch. But this is a digression. It may all be very idle talk; but as I am here in this very godly city, where so many gods have been believed in and worshiped, perhaps it is just a little excusable for me at the moment to wish that I might be a god myself, if only for a short time. I will, however, return to King George's palace.

On the wall over the main stairway is a magnificent painting of Prometheus, the son of a god, fastened to a rock, with the vultures gnawing at his liver, and this divine son writhing in agony in his unpleasant position. It is almost singular that Christians will allow this painting in their palaces; not that there is anything very bad in commemorating this heathen idea, but it is rather damaging to their system; or, in other words, it is proclaiming that the fundamental idea in their system is a borrowed one, and that the Grecians entertained it hundreds of years before Christianity had an existence. Prometheus was the son of the principal god in the heaven of the Grecians, and his father doomed him to die an excruciating death, and to be a propitiation for the sins of mankind. It was written in early times that he was crucified, while other authorities, perhaps to have the likeness to a later story less palpable, rendered it that he was chained to a rock. At all events, the poets of Greece put the story in beautiful language. Æschylus, one of the grandest poets of those times, wrote a drama upon the theme, and five hundred years before the dawn of Christianity the drama was played upon the stage of the theater here in this city of Athens, and the death of the Son of God for the sins of mankind was portrayed upon the stage. The drama has been carefully translated into English, and it must be admitted that the expressions sound extremely like those of Christians about their similar story of the death of their demi-god for a like purpose. Let me here quote some of the language of this drama, as translated by Potter:

> "Lo, streaming from the fatal tree,
> His all-atoning blood!
> Is this the Infinite? 'Tis he,
> Prometheus, and a god!
> Well might the sun in darkness hide,
> And veil his glories in,
> When God, the great Prometheus, died
> For man, the creature's, sin."

The similarity between the Grecian pagan idea and the Christian idea must be apparent to every reader. As the Grecian is fully five hundred years the older, I will leave it for every reader to judge for himself whether it is probable that the pagans borrowed the idea from the Christians, and if the idea is not as beautiful in the first instance as in the second.

The city of Athens has two sides, one consisting of small, poor dwellings, where the poor people have their homes. Here the streets are narrow and crooked. On the other side the houses are of a very pretty character, and the streets are wide and straight. When King Otho was in power here, he brought on a Bavarian engineer, who laid off the streets crooked and running in all directions. His services, however, were dispensed with, and a French engineer was next set to work, and he laid off the newer part of the city in straight and wide streets, which accounts for the diversity that exists. The buildings are mostly made of rough stone, and plastered over, while a few are of pressed stone. Marble is so abundant at the Pentelicus that doubtless many fine buildings will yet be erected. The city has a very new appearance, and the better share of the buildings are very creditable. The Parliament House, the Post-Office, the other government buildings, the universities, the museums, and many hotels and private residences are also of a creditable character. The streets are not paved, but macadamized with broken stone and rolled down smooth with a heavy roller. The better share of the improvements, however, have been done with money not made in Greece. Greeks who have been successful in making fortunes in other countries have contributed liberally to improve this city. If the Greeks have their faults, they certainly possess love of country and patriotism in no stinted degree. As regards King George, I think he is not very popular with the Greeks. They think he has very little love or affection for the people. They did not like King Otho because he had no son to succeed him, and he virtually vacated the throne, deeming himself safer out of the country. Since George has become king he has an heir, now almost a young man, who will be ready to succeed him, although the king himself is less than forty years of age. The Greeks entertain a higher opinion of Gladstone than of any other man, because he would not let the Turks pitch into them. They would like to have him come and be king over them. It is said that the king reciprocates the feeling toward him by not liking the Greeks very well. When the crown was offered him by England he hesitated about taking it, and declined to do so unless the Ionian Islands, including Corfu, which formerly were Greek possessions, were added to his kingdom. His request was therefore acceded to, and Corfu has since been part of his dominions.

Greece maintains a standing army of twenty-five thousand, which is obviously much too large for such a small country.

Greece follows the general fashion of the time by having a national debt, which was largely increased by her late preparations to engage in war with Turkey. She increased her army, and took other expensive steps for the expected struggle. I am told that her debt now amounts to $40,000,000, but am far from sure that this is correct. Her revenue from imports and exports amounts to $10,500,000, her annual expenses to about $10,700,000. She imports nearly all kinds of manufactured articles. Her principal exports are currants and olive oil. The amount of live stock in the whole country is thus given: sheep, 2,265,822; goats, 2,287,000; hogs, 38,353; oxen, 9,838; cows, 57,769; horses, 70,776; mules, 30,443; donkeys, 67,456; buffaloes, 743; camels, 67.

The amount of agricultural products, and the number of acres in cultivation I did not learn; but I think the general acreage in cultivation is small. It would doubtless be much larger if rains were more timely and frequent. If forest trees could cover all the surface of the country where they would grow, they would undoubtedly contribute essentially to the annual rainfall; but such a growth of forest trees can hardly be looked for so long as goats are so largely raised. Geese are said to once have saved Rome, and it is quite as true that goats are proving a curse to Greece as they have to Cyprus, by eating all the growing sprouts which would make trees if let alone. Here in Greece the peasants in the fall of the year, when everything is dry, burn off all the growth that has been made during the year, that their goats may have the early shoots of sprouts and new trees to feed upon in the following spring. In this way the growth of trees is retarded and the country kept arid and parched. Goats contribute largely to the sustenance of the people, and they also are a deadly enemy to growth of young trees. The Parliament have passed very stringent laws against this annual burning over of the land, and have even made the offense punishable by death; but it does no good. The fires are started slyly, perhaps in the night, and if it were even known who started the fire, the person knowing it would not dare to report it for fear of incurring the deadly enmity of the class who have an interest in those fires, as his life would doubtless pay the forfeit if they knew he had played informer. If Greece ever becomes a productive agricultural country, some means will have to be taken to encourage the growth of forest trees.

It is gratifying to learn that there are public spirited men among the Greeks who have made money elsewhere, who are disposed to use it in benefiting their native country. I have already said that a large share of the fine buildings have been erected with money made elsewhere. I have met a Mr. Theophilatus, a Greek sailor and speculator, who has made himself a millionaire, and is using his money to benefit Greece. His first fortunate enterprise was several years ago, when, learning that several articles of produce were scarce and high in England and very plentiful on the Danube, he engaged largely in the purchase of them, and hired every vessel he could to carry his produce. The result was he made a sum equal to $500,000 in that one venture. Subsequent ventures were also very fortunate. He has purchased ten thousand acres of land on the plain near Athens, and is engaged in various branches of agriculture, stock-raising, grain culture, vineyards, and the silk culture. He hires many of his poor countrymen and pays them fair wages for this country—three and a half francs to laborers, and five francs to mechanics. He also subscribed money to help cut a ship canal across the isthmus of Corinth, which will shorten the passage from Corfu to this point by a day's travel. A canal was cut there in the days of ancient Greece, but got filled up and was abandoned. He says he expects no return from the investment, but he thinks the good of the country requires the canal. He has also subscribed money in a line of steamers, and the company wish him to be one of the directors, but he declines. He has built a fine house for his deceased brother's children, and is very good to them. He seems like a most excellent man.

It is, of course, well known that Greece is a Christian country; she is no longer pagan, as she was two and three thousand years ago. Priests are as thick here as toads after a shower. I have not learned how many priests are in the country, but judging from the numbers I see in the city they must amount to a few thousands. One can hardly walk a square or two without meeting two or three priests going about with their long black robes and black stove-pipe hats or caps. Their hats are about the hight of an ordinary "plug" hat, but have no brim at all; but the top projects about an inch beyond the body of the hat. The people all belong to the Greek church, which bears much resemblance to the Romish church save they do not yield allegiance to the pope of Rome. The head of the Greek church is a Grand Patriarch, who resides at Constantinople. His position and power in the Greek church are much the same as that of the pope in the Romish church, though I am informed that it is not held as a dogma in the Greek church that the Patriarch is necessarily infallible. With all the vicegerents which Christ has to act for him on the earth, to wit, the Pope of Rome, the Patriarch of Constantinople, the Archbishop of Canterbury, with Howard Crosby, Prof. Cook, and any quantity of others in America, it is pretty hard to tell which is really the simon-pure vicegerent who has the power to act for Christ, and who most nearly represents the meek and lowly one who had not where to lay his head, and who taught that mendicants and beggars are the only true followers of him and the only ones who have the least chance of getting into heaven.

The churches here are numerous enough for the wants of a very pious people, and I think every church is supplied with several priests, who, for their services in inducing God to let this world to run on in about the way it does, manage to pick up a very comfortable living, and to work less and dress better than any other class of the people. The churches are generally built in the Byzantine style, nearly as large one way as the other, and they are sufficiently decorated with pictures of the virgin and dying gods, though I judge the Greeks do not go to the great extreme in this direction that the Romanists do. I have seen the paintings of many saints, but not as many as I saw in Italy, and I have seen very few statues of saints.

On Sunday morning Mr. Bridges and I attended the cathedral before breakfast. The services were in operation when we arrived. We found about one hundred and fifty men and boys standing in the middle of the cathedral, fenced off from the inner part by an iron railing, and three or four priests, in long white overgowns, were chanting the service and going through various genuflexions and evolutions, and on either side of the large space was a man with a number of boys around him, and these did essential service in doing the heavy singing, the man singing tenor and the boys coming in with sharp, shrill, and clear voices on the alto. The priests have a platform, something like a stage, on which they move about a good deal, and from which platform a doorway opens into an inner room—holy of holies or sanctum sanctorum. In the holy of holies a table, or counter, some ten or fifteen feet long, runs crosswise, and upon it stands an image of the virgin and a crucifix with a dead god impaled upon it. About half the time the priest is in the holy of holies, chanting before the statue and kneeling frequently; and half the time he is on the front platform motioning to the audience, extending his arms toward them and waving his sanctimonious benediction over them, singing, or chanting, with but little intermission. The men and boys which form the side-show keep up a constant singing at the same time; and when the company on one side seem to be a little tired out the company of a man and boys on the other side take up the refrain and come in most sonorously with the chanting. I must say the boys are capital singers; rarely have I heard clearer, shriller, and smoother voices. The tenor singers are also very good.

After chanting for some fifteen minutes, a tall priest with a long black beard took the censer and commenced swinging it all around the image and table in the holy of holies—making it all blue there with the holy smoke; and then he came forward with his smoke-pot and smoked the front stage in the most approved manner, swinging the censer toward us of the audience, as though giving us the benefit of the holy smoke also. I could not help thinking that if the Lord is fond of smoke he must have been particularly well pleased on that morning, for the priest made a thorough job of it and showed no disposition to spare the smoke. I judge it is not a very expensive article, or that the funds were sufficient to the expense. The singing, or chanting, was still kept up all the time, as it was, in fact, during the entire service when one of the priests was delivering his sermon.

The next thing was, four boys, dressed in long, sky-blue robes, came in from a side door bearing candles three or four feet long, and they were followed by two priests and a bald-headed old man about eighty years old, with a rich and fancy garment, which, perhaps, is called a "stole" (though I do not suppose this was stolen), and him I took to be the bishop, for more deference was paid to him than to the other priest. He marched at once into the holy of holies and kneeled before the image and chanted in a feeble voice, while the tenor and the alto outside acquitted themselves with extra vigor. After he had stood on his knees some five minutes he rose and put on a black whig, with long hair behind reaching a foot down the back, and then he went through various gestures and movements, which, of course, were very holy. He several times came forward to the front of the platform and spread his paternal hands toward the audience, as though to confer his blessing upon them, which they gratefully acknowledged by inclining their heads forward and crossing themselves several times. Then the smoke-pot was again brought forth, and all hands were well smoked down; and then a priest climbed up a circular stairway to the pulpit on one side, nearly twenty feet above the floor, and in a very good voice sang or chanted something out of a book as long as a full-length chapter in the Bible. Three attendants went round among the audience, each carrying a wide platter to collect the coin the pious worshipers were inclined to give. I had seen the platter with a few copper coins upon them, and very piously I added one to the number, doubting not I would get ten leptra's worth of religion; but when the men bore the same platters among the audience, fearing I had not paid enough for all that chanting, and all the smoke, and all the blessing, I put my hand into my pocket and gave another ten-leptra piece, equal to two cents; and that is as much as any one gave. I saw nothing but copper coins on the platter.

The last scene in the play was another very grave-looking priest ascended up into the pulpit aforesaid, and solemnly began to address the audience in about as good modern Greek as I remember having heard. I presumed he was explaining to his hearers just what God wished of them and what they had to do to enter Abraham's bosom. But as I have not been here long enough yet to understand modern Greek first-rate I concluded to not stay and see it out, but to return and partake of breakfast. Upon retiring I saw but one or two women in the audience, and one was kissing a picture of the virgin. None of the audience sit during worship; in fact, there is nothing to sit on save the floor. I am inclined to think one point is gained by having the audience stand during worship—they are less liable to go to sleep than as though leaning back in cushioned pews. I I concluded, moreover, that neither Jupiter nor Yahweh was offended at the ceremonies I had witnessed, for the sun was shining just as pleasantly as though nothing of the kind had been done.

I will state that the ordinary priests at service wear a long white overgown, which comes down to the feet, and many of them wear wigs with long hair reaching down the back. I noticed the old bishop took off his wig and put it on again several times during his performances. I could not gather why he did so. The cathedral is rather showy, with numerous paintings of virgins, priests, etc., and some mosaic figures in the dome overhead. The glass in the windows is stained, but not in figures as is so common in Catholic cathedrals, but is red, yellow, and blue in round pieces some eight inches in diameter, which, interspersed, make up the windows.

On a morning or two after visiting the cathedral I concluded to make another ascent of the Lychabettus and take a second bird's-eye view of the city and surrounding country. As I have visited the Acropolis and other interesting points, the second time I started before sunrise; but when I arrived at the summit I found a small company there already and worshiping in the little church of St. George. The audience consisted of three men, four women, and a little girl. I concluded to join them for a time in worship, but while they worshiped a dead god I worshiped living nature. The ceremonies were much of the same character as previously in the cathedral. The priest kept up a constant chanting, some of the ime from a book, but more matter that he had by heart, and besides what he did an old man also kept up a constant chanting of an independent character. The priest also did up lots of smoking with the censer, throwing it into corners and sending some of it toward the audience. Later on he brought forth a plate with something on it and a vessel containing wine. Both were partially covered. The plate had on it a portion of the body of Christ and the vessel a portion of his blood, which had been changed from bread and wine by the mysterious and miraculous process of transubstantiation. It was of course regarded as extremely holy, and the small audience towards whom it was presented, save myself, reverently bowed their heads in its presence. I did not care to partake of the viands, as I am not specially fond of dead god, fearing, too, that it might spoil my appetite for breakfast. He then retired into his little holy of holies and shut the sliding-door after him, so I could not see what he did. Whether he ate and drank the dead god I cannot say. After this he brought out a large book and sang a chapter from it, and at a certain point while reading two women advanced and bowed their heads low before him, and one of them raised his apron, which possibly is called an ephod, and put her head under the apron and held it there for several minutes. Afterwards at certain other points they kneeled, which, however, I did not join in, fearing I might by so doing obtain more religion than I wished. I should remark in addition that seven candles were burning, as well as the same number of lamps, though the morning was light and clear. It was the same in the cathedral. When I felt as though I had received sufficient religion to answer my purpose I concluded to retire and look after my breakfast, and as I descended the hill I meditated upon what I had witnessed, and, dear readers, verily, verily I say unto you that I believe the religious ceremonies and creed of the modern Greeks no better and no more sensible than those of the ancients.

The priests of the Greek church, unlike the priests of Rome, are permitted to take a wife each unto themselves, though if they are so unfortunate as to lose their wives they are not permitted to marry again. The result of this regulation is that the priests, unlike most of the Greeks, treat their wives very kindly, lest they may lose them and have to go without. The Grand Patriarch and the bishops are not allowed to marry. Confession of sins is enjoined in the Greek church the same as in the Romish.

We have seen three funeral processions while here. They have a style for funerals unlike anything I have hitherto seen. The corpse is preceded by a dozen or two of men bearing symbols and banners and carrying two poles with what look like lanterns on top. The corpse is not in the coffin, but seems to be laid on something which raises it above the top of the coffin, and the lid is not on. These in advance sing in a drawling voice a very unmusical sort of air, which, perhaps, answers the place of a requiem A larger company follow after the corpse. Mr. Bridges followed one of these processions half a mile outside the city to the place of burial to witness that part of the ceremony. They had little or no ceremony there. The grave seemed to have been badly dug, and, measuring it by the coffin lid they found it was not long enough, and the company waited while the grave was trimmed longer. Then the bed under the corpse was taken out and the corpse allowed to rest on the bottom of the coffin, but it was shallow and the body was still above the sides. It was a female, and the corpse was habited in a fine dress; but before letting it down to its final resting-place a man took a pair of shears and cut the dress into strips, so as to entirely ruin it. The coffin was then lowered into the grave without the lid being put on, but it was too long to go down easily, and a man stepped in on the sides of the open coffin and jumped up and down, and finally got it down, but considerable dirt fell in upon the corpse during the process. But this was not enough; several of those present took a handful of the coarse dirt and dropped it upon the corpse before the lid of the coffin was put on. After this the lid was laid upon the coffin, but it was not fastened down at all, neither did it cover the coffin properly—one foot of the corpse stuck up by the side of the lid when the earth was thrown hurriedly in upon it. The scene was a revolting one. We learned afterward that the cutting of the dress was done to spoil it so no one would be tempted to rob the grave for the sake of the dress—a bad commentary, indeed, on the morals of a Christian people! It must be a pitiful Christian who would rob a grave for the dress the corpse was buried in!

Possibly I have detained you quite long enough with details about Athens and Greece. Much more, of course, can be said, but perhaps it is hardly worth while to ask you to listen to me longer. Now it is approaching Wednesday evening, Oct. 26, and we are about to take carriages for Piræus, to embark for Constantinople, where we will be on the 28th. We have had most lovely weather here, the air as warm and balmy as summer, and the sky as blue and serene as you can possibly imagine. Our visit here on the site of the grand old city has been pleasant in the extreme.

I must say a word in behalf of the Hotel de Angleterre. It is a splendid house, and well kept. If any of you should visit Athens, let me recommend you to stop at the Hotel de Angleterre. I am off.

Good-bye, D. M. B.

Refused!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER. Sir: A correspondent sent me the California Morning Call, containing an article slurring Infidels and Infidel publications, and asked me to write a reply, and said she would hav it published in the Call. I was sure the paper would refuse it, but, nevertheless, I sent the article. It came back on the plea that the columns were too much occupied with other matter, and now my correspondent asks me to send it to our dear TRUTH SEEKER, and here it is:

"FRIEND EDITOR: A copy of the Morning Call has just fallen into my hands, and I hav read the article entitled, 'The Secular Press,' and, though only a woman, ask thy permission to say a few words in response. I agree with you that the 'secular press' should teach 'general righteousness;' that is, teach a pure morality and a correct mode of life; but I do not see why the opinions, arguments, and ideas of Infidel speakers and writers should be rejected from its columns as 'assumptuous and illegal' any more than should be those of Christians, Jews, Mohammedans, and Mormons. If only one side of the subject be presented, the readers will all become narrow, bigoted, and of one idea. The public press should be the voice of the people, and for all the people, and I claim that in this day a large majority of the reading, thinking, and really intelligent portion of the people are Infidels. Nearly all Unitarians, Hicksites, Quakers, Spiritualists, and Universalists are also really Infidels; that is, they do not believe the Bible to be the word of God, or that Jesus Christ was the real son of a god, nor do many of them believe in the personal identity of a God. A large majority of the regular preachers in all the Christian churches do not believe these things either, but they preach them for popularity's sake and for their bread and butter! Preachers are precisely like your "secular press"—they preach what is most popular at the time and what they think will most advance their pecuniary interests.

"In the olden days, when the gods of Olympus reigned in Greece and Rome, the secular press spoke reverently of these mythical deities and their oracles and priests, and the scientists, philosophers, and thinkers bowed submissivly, just as they do now (many of them), to the popular superstitions, and Atheists and unbelievers were stigmatized as immoral, licentious, vile, and wicked. Take, for instance, that grand, noble, and good man Epicurus, a man whose whole life was moral, temperate, wise, and good, and who devoted his existence to teaching a beautiful and loving system of philosophy that should bind the whole of humanity in sweet chains of true and tender sympathy. He taught a wise research into the laws of life and nature. Yet he was misunderstood, maligned, and vilified through life, save by his most intimate friends and pupils, who almost worshiped him as a god. But the outsiders, the 'secular press,' the great, ignorant, and misguided majority, treated him just as you are now treating the Infidel. His beautiful name, which should be engraved in letters of gold upon the pages of history, is merely a synonym for licentiousness and excesses of all kinds, for the very vices he most abhorred and labored hardest to destroy. He wooed virtue in her loveliest form. To her he sang:

> "'Come, goddess, come! not in thy power,
> With gait and garb austere,
> And threatening brow severe,
> Like stern Olympus in the judgment hour;
> Come with smiling eyes alluring,
> Moving soft to Lydian measures,
> Girt with graces, loves, and pleasures,
> Bound Basilea's zone.
> Come, virtue! come! in joyous tone
> We bid thee welcome to our hearth,
> For well we know that thou alone
> Canst giv the purest bliss of earth.'

The Taxation of Church Property.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The New York State Legislature will commence its session January first, and immediately thereafter the friends of state secularization should commence to send in petitions for the taxation of church property and clergymen and priests the same as other men.

Allow me to request the vice-presidents of the New York State Freethinker's Association of the various counties of the state to make the circulation of these petitions their special work during the winter. I hav no doubt but THE TRUTH SEEKER office will be pleased to furnish blank petitions. And I hope the Liberals of every state may move in this matter. Every man who believes in justice will willingly sign such a petition. H. L. GREEN,

The Tomb of Fanaticism.

AN EXTENSIV EXAMINATION OF LORD BOLINGBROKE'S DOCTRINS.

WRITTEN BY VOLTAIRE IN 1767.

[Translated from the French by Avery Meriwether.]

CHAPTER XVII.

CONCERNING THE END OF THE WORLD AND THE NEW JERUSALEM.

Not only has Jesus been introduced upon the scene predicting the end of the world during his lifetime, but that fanaticism was the product of those whom we call his apostles and disciples. Father Barjonah, in the first epistle attributed to him (chapter iv), says, "The gospels hav been preached to the dead, and the end of the world approaches."

In the second epistle (chapter iii), "Let us attend to the new heaven and new earth."

The first epistle attributed to John said (1 John ii, 18), "There hav been many antichrists, whereby we know that it is the last time."

The epistle which was accepted upon the word of Thaddeus, surnamed Jude, repeats the same folly (Jude xiv), "Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousands of his saints to execute judgment upon all men."

His ridiculous idea existed for ages. If the world was not destroyed under Constantine, it would then come to an end under Theodosia. And if the end did not come in Theodosia's time, it would come in Atilla's time. For a thousand years this idea has brought riches to the convents and monasteries. Reasoning like the monks, the people thought since there would be neither men nor lands when the world approached its end, therefore all the land should be handed over to the monks, the agents of the Creator.

Upon such madness as this is founded another wild idea—that a new city of Jerusalem would descend from the heavens. The Apocalyps announced that this event was near. All the followers of Christ believed it. They manufactured new sibylline verses, in which the new Jerusalem was predicted. It appeared in the same way as that new city where the followers of Christ would dwell for a thousand years after bidding farewell to the world. It took forty consecutiv nights for it to descend from heaven. Tertullian saw it with his own eyes. The time will come when all honest people will say, "Is it possible that they spent their time refuting that tale of a tub!"

Here, then, are the opinions for which half the human race has been plundered and disturbed. See how powerful the principalities and kingdoms of the deceiving priests hav become! See that influence which brings up imbecils in the cloistered cells of the Catholics! It is by the meshes of such spiders as these that we are surrounded and caught, and they hav discovered the secret of changing their webs into chains of iron. Great God! Is it for such foolishness as this that Europe has been deluged in blood and Charles I. was sacrificed upon a scaffold! Oh, destiny! When those half-fledged Jews wrote their astounding tables on their houses, little did they think that they were preparing a throne for that abominable Alexander VI., and for that daring rascal Cromwell!

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE ALLEGORIES.

Those whom we call the fathers of the church discovered a very singular method for confirming their pupils in the new doctrins. Afterwhile they found disciples who were capable of reasoning a little. They said to these that the Old Testament was only a figurativ part of the New Testament. They said that the little piece of red cloth, for instance, which the lascivious Rahab put over her window in order to shut out the spies of Joshua, signified the blood of Christ poured forth for our sins. Sarah and her servant Hagar, Leah, the weeping woman, and the beautiful Rachel represent the synagog or the church. Moses lifting his hands when he gave battle to the Amalekites very evidently represents the cross, because when he extended his arms to the right and left he formed the figure of a cross. Joseph sold by his brothers is Jesus Christ. The manna is the eucharist. The four winds are the four evangelists. The kisses given to the Shulamite (Cant. vi, 13) upon the mouth, etc, in the Song of Songs, evidently represents the marriage of Jesus Christ with the church. The bride had no dowry, for she was not yet sufficiently well established.

Here we do not know what to believe; no dogma is precisely stated. Jesus never wrote anything; he was a strange legislator, from whom we hav not had so much as a line. It became necessary for some one to write for him, so his disciples gave themselvs up to the glad tidings (bonnes nouvelles), to the gospels, to the acts of which we hav already spoken, and they explained the Old Testament in the light of being allegories of the New Testament. It is not at all astonishing that the catechumens were fascinated by those who wished to form a new party, and allowed themselvs to be seduced by the images, which always pleased the people. This one thing contributed more than all else to the propagation of Christianity, which extended in a secret way from one end of the empire to the other, the magistrates disdaining to take any heed of it.

A pleasant and easy thing of the imagination to turn the history of a troupe of beggars into figures of rhetoric and prophecies of all that which would happen to the world for all ages to come.

CHAPTER XIX.

CONCERNING THE INTERPOLATIONS AND THE FICTITIOUS BOOKS.

In order to gain novitiates in the first century the followers of Christ did not fail to represent that their sect was respected by the Romans and by the emperor himself. They were not satisfied with forging a thousand writings, which they attributed to Jesus, they even made him write to Pilate. Justin and Tertullian cited those letters, which were inserted in the gospels of Nicodemus. The following are a few passages from the first letter of Pilate to Tiberius. They are curious:

"It has happened recently, and I hav verified it, that the Jews hav brought upon themselvs by their envy a cruel condemnation. Their God promised them to send a saint from heaven who would be justly entitled their king, and be born of a virgin. The God of the Hebrews has sent him, in fact, while I presided in Judea. The leading Jews denounced him to me as a magician. I believed them, and had him well scourged, and even abandoned him to them. They crucified him. The guards being taken from the grave, he was resuscitated upon the third day."

This very old letter is an important one, inasmuch as it proves that the primitiv Christians did not venture to think that Jesus was God. They spoke of him only as the "one sent by God." If he had been God also Pilate would not hav failed to say so.

In the second letter he says if he had not feared a rebellion that perhaps that noble Jew would still hav lived. Fortasse vir ille nobilis viveret. They could hav forged another narrativ from Pilate with more circumstantial evidence in it if they had tried.

Eusebius of Cesarea, in book 7 of his "Ecclesiastical History," assures us that the woman cured of the bloody flux by Jesus Christ lived in Cesarea. He had seen, he says, her statue at the base of that of Jesus Christ. There were around the base of it the various herbs which cured all kinds of diseases. A request of that poor woman, whose name was, so they say, Veronique, is handed down to us. She told Herod of the miracle wrought by Christ upon her, and asked permission to erect a statue to Jesus. But this was located in Paniade, and not in Cesarea, which makes poor Eusebius very sad.

A pretended proclamation of Tiberius was found which declares that Jesus was ranked as a God. Letters of Paul to Senicus, and Senicus to Paul, were manufactured. Emperors, philosophers, apostles—all were made to contribute. It is a succession of uninterrupted frauds. One class are entirely fanatical, and another class are political in their nature. A fanatical dream, for example, is such as the Apocalyps, supposed to hav been written by St. John. This is only absurd. But a political dream is, for instance, the books of the Constitution attributed to the apostles. We find in chapter xxv, book 2, that the priests were to receive the tenths and first fruits. They are called kings in chapter xxvi: Qui episcopus est, hic vester rex et dynastes.

It is necessary, according to chapter xxiii, to reserve the best places for the bishop at the love-feasts* if he happened not to be at the table. It was also ordered that a double portion be given to the priest and the deacon. The titles of the bishops were then augmented, but above all stood the bishops of Rome.

In chapter xxiv the bishops are ranked above emperors and kings, a precept from which the church has departed less than is thought: Quanto animus praestat corpore tantum sacerdotium regno. By as much as the mind is superior to the body, so is the priesthood to kings. This is the secret source of that terrible power which the bishops of Rome usurped for so many centuries. All the fictitious books, all the dreams which they dared to label as holy, were only in the hands of people faithful to them. It was a great crime to communicate any of these to the Romans, who, for two hundred years, had little or no knowledge of their existence. Thus the sect increased every day.

* Many people accuse the early Christian societies of converting the love-feasts into scenes of the grossest character, and filled with the greatest mystery. It is necessary to observe that the Christians accuse one another. Epiphanos is convinced that the Gnostics, who were the only learned people among the sects, were more than dissolute. Here are the words he used in book 1 against heresy:

"After they protested themselvs before each other they brought to the light he who was elected. A woman takes him by the hands. Un homme remplit aussi sa main de l'ejaculation d'un garçon; et ils disent a Dieu. Nous te presentons ce tte offrand qui est le corps de Christ, Ensuite hommes et femmes avalent ce sperme, et s'ecrient; c'est la paque. Puis on prend du sang d'une femme qui a ses ordinaires, on l'avale, et on dit, C'est le sang de Christ." [The author deemed it best to leave this passage untranslated.]

If a father of the church was shocked at these horrible Christian rites, he was regarded as an obtuse calumniator, a worshiper of Zeus, of Jupiter. Perhaps they deceived themselvs. It is possible that the Christians were capable of these horrible things, and that they afterward corrected them just as the Roman court substituted, after a long interval, decency for their lascivious rites, with which they burdened the church for more than five hundred years. [1771.]

More Gods Wanted.

We are told that the fool hath said in his heart there is no God. Now I am not going to be a fool and say there is no god, although I sometimes think the fool may hav told the truth I never hav seen God nor any of his works, so far as I know. We are told that God will save a few men from fire in the next world, and that is very good, so far as the next world is concerned; but that which is most needed just at this time is a god who will save men from fire in this world.

Within the last two or three days I could see and smell the smoke of the fires that were consuming thousands and thousands of happy homes, houses, barns, stacks of grain—all were burning, burning, and the awful fires of this world were burning, roasting, and consuming hundreds and hundreds of men, women, and innocent little children. Thousands of good Christians were praying to God for help; frantic mothers and helpless children were begging, screaming, and crying for help; mothers threw their children into wells and cisterns, and then in their desperation leaped in themselvs, where their dead bodies were afterward found. Hundreds of the dead were found in all directions. Sheep, hogs, and human beings scattered about, dead and dying, was an awful sight to behold. It is estimated that fifteen or twenty thousand, who barely escaped with their lives, to-day are without homes. And where, oh, where, was God?

In my judgment, if there was ever an opportunity for a God to lend a helping hand in a good cause then and there was the chance. And I want to say right here that I would not giv a straw for the promis of a God to save men from fire in the next world until he shall giv some evidence of his ability and disposition to save men from fire in this world.

We are told that God knows best. Yes, he knew what was best for those poor, pitiable creatures. By hard work they had secured their bread; God saw it all burned; and in his Bible he tells them if they want daily bread to pray for it. But those empty stomachs to-day would giv more for a single bag of wheat than for all the promises upon the bread question that God ever made.

Whilst the fire was raging, in compliance with the governor's proclamation, thousands in our churches were on their knees praying God, if it was consistent with his will, to do about the right thing by the President by doing just what he ought to have done long ago without being asked. Now I am not going to find fault with God for not attending to the wants of the President and those poor creatures in the northern part of our state until I first know if possibly he may not, as I suspect, hav had too great a press of business on hand. If God is doing all that he can, what more can we expect? If it is all that he can do to attend to the things in the next world without bothering with the things in this world, it proves our need of another god or gods. There is business enough for a dozen gods to attend to the things in this world if we only had the gods and they would attend strictly to business. We want a set of gods who will be so good that everybody can't help loving them. We want them every time that they see a chance to help a fellow to pitch in and not wait to be asked. Yes, we want more gods—enough so that they will be able to kill the devil and narrow the broad road that leads to sin by filling it with rattle-snakes and making it less inviting than it now is.

And until we can find better gods, I don't know of any better way than for every man to set himself up for a god, and do all the good he can. If a neighbor's fence or house or woods are on fire, pitch in and help him and not wait to be asked. Help feed and clothe the poor, and try to get up more heavens here below and never mind the heavens above. And if you see a man raise a pistol to shoot the President or any other good man, go for the cuss with a sharp stick and smite him till he shall die. And remember that any god or being, human or divine, who has the power to prevent the shooting of a President and who neglects to do it, both legally and morally, is just as guilty as the villian who fires the shot.

No doubt there are some of those destitute creatures who are praying to God for bread and thanking him that things are no worse than they are. And if God can't restore their homes and barns and fill them with wheat in a single day's time, he ain't no great shakes of a God no how. But also they are praying to men and their prayer is being answered. Fifty or a hundred thousand dollars already has been contributed by the great whole souled gods of this world, and men are still sending forward bread or funds with which to buy it. Yes, giv us more gods and better gods—gods who will attend to the things in this world. If we ever get to another world we will then perhaps want a God to help us to attend to the things in that world, and if so we will say so when we get there.

I clip the following from to-day's paper, which is a sample of the many reports received.

"The closest research fails to find one single gleam of light to brighten the tale of horror coming from the fire-swept Huron peninsula, as will be seen by the following address:

"'PORT HURON, Mich., Sept. 11, 1881.

"'To the American People:

"'We hav to-night returned from the burnt district of Huron and Sanilac counties. We hav seen the burned, disfigured, and writhing bodies of men, women, and children; rough board coffins containing the dead, followed to the gaave by a few blinded, despairing relativs; crowds of half-starved people at some of the stations asking bread for their families and neighbors. We heard of more than two hundred victims already buried, and more charred and bloated bodies daily discovered. Already more than fifteen thousand families are found to be utterly destitute and houseless. They huddle in barns, in schoolhouses, in their neighbors' houses, scorched, blinded, hopeless; some still wander half-crazed around the ruins of their habitations, vainly seeking their dead; some in speechless agony wringing their hands and refusing to be comforted.

"'More than ten thousand people, who, only a week ago, occupied happy, comfortable homes, are to day houseless and homeless sufferers. They are hungry and almost naked when found, and in such great numbers and so widely scattered that our best efforts and greatest resources fail to supply their immediate wants.

"'Without speedy aid many will perish and many more will suffer and become exiles. Our people will do their utmost for their relief, but all our resources would fail to meet their necessities.

"'We appeal to the charity and generosity of the American people. Send help without delay. (Signed) E. C. CARLETON.

"'Mayor of Port Huron and Ch. of Relief Committee.'"

St. Johns held a relief meeting the other night. There were no ministers present. Their business is to save souls, but in my judgment the best way to save a soul is to feed the body. M. BABCOCK.

The Grounds, Importance, and Substance of Ethics.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The substance of the following was contained in a letter to the North American Review, in reply to that attack on Liberalism entitled, "What Hav We Left of Morality?" which was published in the May number. The editor declined to publish it. In writing it over for you, I hav changed the form sufficiently to make it intelligible to those who hav not read the article replied to. C. L. JAMES.

"What hav we left of morality? Such is the question raised in the May number of the North American Review by an anonymous writer, whose satirical purpose is sufficiently obvious. Will it be deemed a satisfactory answer that, of what this gentleman wishes us to understand by morality, we hav left just nothing? At all events, no fault can be found with this reply on the score of ambiguity. It clears the field thoroughly. The gentleman to whom I am replying enumerates two or three systems of morals—Christian, transcendental, utilitarian, etc., which, he justly reasons, hav been pretty thoroughly refuted by scientific progress. His scheme might be criticised as not giving all the systems, nor distinguishing very clearly between the teachings and the grounds of any; but let that go. He is mighty right in saying, or intimating, that science makes a clean sweep of them all. All your virtues, my dear sir, are "filthy rags." Not but what, likely enough, science will sometimes, even frequently, recommend conduct very similar to that which the theologians and moralists hav also recommended. But it will be on new grounds; a new sphere and weight will be assigned to moral teaching; and the differences in detail will be endless. Better hav a new deal. You cannot mend an old garment with new cloth. So we will start by saying that there is nothing left of morality, and that this gentleman was right to advertise for a brand-new article, which let us try to get. And with a little more system than our friend, let us consider separately: 1, the grounds of ethics; 2, the importance of ethics; 3, the substance of ethics.

1. The grounds of ethics. Our new-light moralist is very sensible in saying as much as that neither "intuitional" platitudes nor utilitarian theories will usually make any man do anything. He should hav added, however, that the fear of hell will not. In the days of the Albigenses, the Huguenots, the Puritans, the Covenanters, and all the other fanatical gentry whom he enumerates, only a small majority chose to suffer anything for their principles. Does it require the eye of a prophet to see that this small minority, in each case, consisted of persons who had a peculiar natural temperament? Is it not the same identical natural temperament which givs the martyr's spirit to the Russian Nihilists in the mines, at the electric battery, or on the gallows; and to the French Communists in the iron furnaces of New Caledonia? Dangerous fellows these; capable, perhaps, of deeds as cruel as those of the Puritans at Drogheda, the Albigenses just before De Montfort took them in hand, or the Huguenots when they drowned the priest and gave the eucharist to a dog; but able to suffer as well as inflict, not for the fear of hell or the hope of heaven, but for the right alone. Pursuing this line of thought, we may see that the grounds of a new ethical system apply only to born reformers. Very different considerations recommend it to other men. When it reaches them, it will be an old system. And that, O man-afraid-of-chaos—which you never will fall in with—that will not be until the older system disappears; neither will there be any interval between them. One displaces the other. The current morality of any age is the average man's idea of what he must do in order to avoid a muss with his neighbors. It changes, therefore, neither sooner nor later than the average man's idea of what he can exact from his neighbors.

2. The importance of ethics. The above reflections may lead us to see that the importance of moral systems has been a good deal exaggerated. They are but statements of what the average man in any age thinks right. To him who would be better than the average, they are a stumbling-block; to him who would be like others, only, are they any help. If we will but look around at the world in which we liv, or at the pictures of it drawn by our greatest dramatists, we shall see on every side that the art of the mere preacher is not very high or salutary—that goodness positiv is due to nature, and goodness negativ to custom and law. Let us take a random illustration or two from fact and fiction both. Whittier's ideal of a Christian martyr is the young sister of charity dying amidst the horrors of a cholera hospital in voluntary attendance on the sick. Yet how does this saint, whose whole previous life had been a training in holiness, surpass, after all, the courtesan, Annie Cook, of Memphis, whose life, until a few weeks before she laid it down for strangers during the yellow fever epidemic, had been only a training in profligacy? Has all the cant of chivalry produced a higher type of manhood than Hector, whose courtesy amidst labor, suffering, privation, danger, and the certainty of impending ruin, never admitted an unkind word to Helen, who was the cause of all this misery? Can any picture of feminin devotion surpass that of Draupadi in the epic of polyandrous India? Modern moralists, particularly Emerson and Carlyle, hav not been backward in pointing out the significance of these things. I am far, indeed, from thinking, as they appear sometimes to think, that there is no such thing as moral progress, but I do not giv the moralists credit for it any more than the theologians. No prevailing form of vice or crime ever disappeared in consequence of preaching, but only by the fall of a class among whom it was cherished as a badge, or through changes in the social frame which rendered it difficult or impossible. Dueling went out with aristocracy, highway robbery disappeared when railroads were invented. A single important modern discovery, such as vaccination, has more to do with promoting right living than all the talk since Adam. Napoleon is reported to hav said that in a battle the artillery make the noise, and the cavalry the show, but the infantry do the fighting. In the battle of human progress, the churches hav done the pomp, the schools the gush, but the unsophisticated men and women the work!

3. The substance of ethics. We come last to the question, What course of conduct modern scentific philosophy recommends. Now, our friend, the new-light moralist, knows very well that it recommends equity in dealing with others, control of the passions, willingness to submit disputes to arbitration, subjection of the impulses to reason, candor, industry, prudence; in short, all the negativ virtues. Furthermore, he knows, for he says as much, that the leaders of modern Liberalism lay less stress upon outward actions than inward feelings; they agree with all the sound moralists in saying that while civil law cannot look beyond the action, those who would judge character must regard the motivs as of much greater consequence, which, as he says, sets us free from the bondage of any given "Ten Commandments"—nine or eleven would spoil the pot—and makes men a law unto themselvs. All this, however, is hardly worth saying, for so far science does little more than reaffirm what, though somewhat higher than the average man's practice, has been accepted in theory for centuries. The doctrin of "altruism" (odious dog Latin word) is more truly the doctrin of Christianity than of Liberal people. The great improvement in moral teaching made by science grows out of the discovery that good conduct is mainly due not to moral teaching, not to superstitious fears, but to good conditions of life, including two main elements, viz., right conditions before birth, and right conditions after. This is what makes the moral requirements of science so much superior to those of any previous philosophic system. The scientific Liberal, who would be worthy of his profession, must not be content to observe the old "Ten Commandments." He must aspire to leave the world decidedly better than he found it, and this not by the blundering haphazard methods of the revivalist, the temperance reformer, and all the other wild-eyed fanatics who hav sprung from Christian "altruism," but by the inductiv system of discovery, which is the only source of useful inventions and real improvements. In proportion as science triumphs over superstition men will become free, well fed, well clothed, well housed, well taught, and in the same proportion they will become not necessarily virtuous—it is an error to assume that—but improvable. In order that the seeds of vice should be extirpated science must come to control generation The "New-Light Moralist" confesses having inherited several depraved appetites, and cries abjectly to be delivered from this body of death. Surely he must be sensible that people thus unfortunate were never the objects of so much philanthropical solicitude as now. But when science has her perfect work there will be no more such people. How very inconsistent and insincere it was for the New-Light Moralist, after the above confession, to complain that in the relations of the sexes "our leaders" had not spoken with their usual clearness, and that it seems as if they were afraid. Why should they not be afraid when the standing arguments of the conservativs in this, as other questions, are foul and beastly slander, the mob, the jail, and the assassin's billet? But the charge, however reasonable, is unjust. Nothing can be clearer than the utterances of the leaders, and many of the followers have spoken plainly enough, though it must be confessed that there is an animal which no human courage was ever required to face! When in the course of events the clouds of dogmatism and fogs of metaphysics hav disappeared before the all-searching analysis of science, it will come to be understood that their dispersion was the very first necessary step, not only to realizing but even comprehending morality. C. L. J.

Freethought vs. Intemperance.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Somebody signing himself "Law" sent you a letter from Kansas stating that the new Prohibitory law was a failure. I am astonished that a Liberal should be so wanting in morality and a desire to elevate the morals of his community as to decry the efforts any one makes to get rid of this crime-making, pauperizing, damnable thing we call alcohol.

When the Christians drop—though but for a moment—their miserable superstitions, to advance a genuin reform, we should giv them our most emphatic encouragement. More than that, we should press forward to their side with all our power to help them. A right action is just as commendable in a Christian as in an Infidel.

In Kansas they are talking temperance in the churches, says "Law." Does he not know that in nine churches out of ten in most of the states of the Union no temperance speaker is ever allowed to set foot upon their platforms or let his voice be heard in their sacred temples?

Take from the churches—as Anna Dickinson said in Chicago some years ago—every brick in their walls that the rum-sellers hav paid for and they would all tumble to the ground in absolute ruins.

If there is any real objection to Liberalism, it is not a "tendency to Materialism" or to negation, but that it has not as yet done positiv work for practical morality. Never can it succeed, never ought it to succeed, until with unabating zeal it strives to put right-doing in the place of creed.

The great crime of our age is intemperance; it is the father of every other crime.

A drunken Christian is a pitiable sight; but a drunken Liberal is a blight—a paralysis—to the cause of Freethought.

Liberalism is against vice and crime; against everything that is wrong per se; against all that makes the totality of human life less noble, less grand, less pleasurable.

I am ashamed that a Liberal will use the natural results of a still unperfected law while in the agony of its initiatory development, making, as it does, for the right—opening up, as it does, a highway toward a grander civilization—to strike it down, to wound its friends because they differ with him in religious matters. O toleration, where hast thou flown? Ah, bigotry, has thou set thy vile feet upon the banner of Liberalism?

Freethought has no greater foe than intemperance. If we recruit our ranks in the sinks of immorality, where rum is sold, decency, respectability, and intelligence must, of necessity, in pure self-defense, take refuge in the churches.

Liberty and Liberalism hav no reason to seek intemperance or crime for their bed-fellows.

We can never look for Spencers, Haeckels, Tyndalls, or Drapers in the pot-house or the brothel. Such men are not the products of such places.

The schools are the gardens in which to grow Liberals; the rum-shops are hells to everybody.

Obituary.

The whitening frost of death has taken from our midst another brother. Henry M. Smith, on the 12th of November, at the age of thirty-three years and six months, sank into that ast solemn sleep which, in this world at least, knows of no awakening. He died, as he had lived, a very radical Materialist. He hated with an intense hatred tyranny, whether exhibited in a man or a god. He had no respect for a god who would damn to eternal pain his own children, or for a religion that supports such a god; and he made many enemies among the strictly orthodox by his outspoken denunciation of their "damnable theology." I hav often heard him say that he considered priests as no better than a thief, for they got their living by pretending to giv that which they did not possess.

Friend Smith had been a victim of consumption for about a year. He had also a difficulty of the throat, from the effect of which he had been unable to speak above a whisper for about six months. He was a nativ of this town, but for several years has worked in adjoining towns. Since he has been sick he has been staying with his sisters in Stoddard most of the time, but came back on a visit to his cousin, George Smith, the first of November, and failed so fast that he could not leave. He was confined to his room but two days, but had been unable to go out of the house for a week. He had known for some time that he could not get well. His last hours seemed to be free from pain, and he passed away as quietly as a child would go to sleep upon its mother's breast. He was unmarried, but leaves four sisters and a half-brother to mourn his death.

Personally, I feel that the death of friend Smith is a great loss to me. He was but a few months older than I am, and I hav known him since he was eight years old. He was very kind hearted, always ready to help those who were sick or in trouble, no matter what their creed. No thought of future punishment, no hope of reward, controled his acts. His sense of right and justice was the law he obeyed.

It was his request that no priest should officiate at his funeral, and he selected form 5 of "The Truth Seeker Collection," and hymn No. 21, "What Art Thou, Death?" to be read at his funeral. But as some of his relations are believers in the Christian religion, though not of the bigoted class, and are honest in their belief, and willing others should believe as they think best, they thought it would not look well not to hav a priest. They tried to get a Universalist minister, but could not get one, so they had a bigoted ignoramus of a Methodist D.D. He had several flings at Infidelity; in fact, his whole discourse was against Infidels. He said but one thing that he can prove, and that was that all men die, while he said several things which I consider as genuin pious lies. If I had not known that I was at a funeral I should hav thought I was at a Methodist revival. He would not even read the hymn that had been selected by the deceased. I think that it is proved beyond all doubt that there is no spirit-life, for I think if there was any truth in Spiritualism friend Smith's spirit would hav been there and made it lively for the D.D. for talking as he did.

Bradford, N. H. J. A. ALLEN, JR.

WE hav for sale the lithograph likenesses of the three leading Liberals of this country—Thomas Paine, D. M. Bennett, and R. G. Ingersoll. They are all splendidly executed, and with a neat frame around them—which can be procured from picture-frame makers at slight expense—will be an ornament to any home. They will be sent, secure from breakage, by mail at the following prices: D. M. Bennett and R. G. Ingersoll, 50 cents each; Thomas Paine, $1.

IF I owe Smith ten dollars and God forgivs me, that don't pay Smith.—Ingersoll.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

D. M. BENNETT, EDITOR.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing nearly seven hundred square inches more of reading matter than any other journal of its kind.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1881.

Around the World.

We hope there will be no cessation in taking shares in the Round-the-World journey which Mr. Bennett is now engaged in making. The expenses of the trip will be close upon $3,000, and the cost of the books, with their illustrations, will not be less than $1,500 or $2,000. So his friends who hav sent him away will see that many more names are necessary before the bare cost of the undertaking is paid. The idea is that the work shall be a sort of joint enterprise, the people contributing the money and Mr. Bennett giving his time. It is not fair to ask him to giv the year necessary to make the circuit of our globe and pay for getting out the books in addition. And, besides, he is not able to do it. The work will be dedicated to those advancing the $5's, and their names will be enrolled in the first volume, which is being forwarded at the rate of thirty-five or forty pages per week. It will take until about next January for it to be finished, and until that time the starry roll of honor is open to those who want to be pioneers in getting the truth. There hav been plenty of books of travel written, but all hav catered to some pious church prejudice, and so far as telling the actual state of affairs existing in the "Holy Land" and the orient, were worth no more than what they would sell for as waste paper. Those who hav read Mr. Bennett's travels in Europe, written last year, will agree with us that his descriptions are faithful portraits of actual facts. He tells everything that he sees, and he has a shrewd way of seeing everything that is going on around him. His letters so far hav been marvels of descriptiv writing. The work, we feel sure, will be greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav, and we want all our friends and their friends to aid in disseminating it. There will be over one hundred and fifty full-page illustrations of scenes described, besides many smaller cuts. These will add greatly to the interest of the work, and with the faithful and close description will present Old-World places in a very familiar light. It will be as good as making the journey. And in order to pay for all this we shall keep the list open yet awhile longer in the hope that many more will yet send in their names. It isn't exactly square that the eleventh-hour laborers should get as much as the early workers; but if that is divine justice poor fallible human beings cannot be blamed if we giv the ones who subscribe now just as fine a book as those who subscribed to send the editor off. We can call it that the first sent him away and the last bring him back. Send on the V.'s.

We hav written to those whose names appear without stars, but they do not respond to their pledges, and the next time we print the list their names will be omitted, as we shall conclude they do not intend to send the V's, and we want the list to appear compl te. We had hoped that all who pledged would pay, but it seems that there are a few who will not, and as they hav had ample time and notification we shall reluctantly take their names from the starry roll. We shall also place the names in alphabetical order, preparatory to printing in the first volume, which we hope to see completed early next year. The exact time, however, will depend upon how much the traveler wishes to get in. At present it is thought that he will finish up Jerusalem in volume one, which will make the book of some eight or nine hundred pages. The illustrations are being rapidly forwarded, and when the letters are in it will be but a few days ere the book is ready for mailing.

Infallibility.

There are too many particular considerationns entering into the arbitrament of social and religious questions to allow the establishment of an infallible, general principle by which these questions may be solved.

The church, in its Roman form, asserted itself to be this principle, but it abused its power and became tyrannical; it pressed the infallibility dogma to such an extreme that it is now being shorn of authority by the inborn freedom of the human soul, and by the freedom of political and social development. The Reformation of the sixteenth century was a protest against the religious despotism of the church, and there could not but be a breaking away from the authority of its self-assumed infallibility.

But the Reformation was compelled to substitute some rule of faith for the papal infallibility now set aside. Therefore, it set up the Bible as its arbiter, making it the standard by which men were to regulate their lives. All political and social problems, as well as all religious questions, were to be decided according to the Bible. This Bible rule is the asserted rule of Protestantism to-day, and one reason, if not the main reason, for the general failure of Protestantism can be found in this assertion.

The Bible can no more be an absolute rule of faith than the church.

The one centers its authority in the priesthood and papacy, which are made of fallible men; the other centers its authority in a book written by fallible men and interpreted by fallible men; it is fallible men in the end, and anything fallible cannot be an absolute and universal rule of action.

Neither the church nor the Bible can be an infallible guide for any single individual.

The church is full of error, and so is the Bible. If a man is to totally obey the Bible in all its respects and strictly follow its inculcations, he will become the worst criminal on the face of the earth, that is, according to modern ideas of criminality. There is hardly a vice in existence that is not outlined and encouraged by the Old Testament. It really places a premium upon social and personal sins and crimes that shock human propriety and human decency. God's favorite characters, as represented to us in the Old Testament, numbered among them those who were polygamists, adulterers, drunkards, liars, and defrauders. In so far as we maintain the infallibility of the Bible, we giv our indirect sanction to these crimes, unmistakably condemned by Jesus and by every lover of purity aad morality.

The Bible, as such, cannot, therefore, be a standard of right and wrong.

In the New Testament we are confronted with a code of morality entirely different from that of the Old, and infinitly superior to it—the morality taught by Jesus. He added nothing new to the fundamental faith and hope of mankind; all that he said was simply the attestation of a sincere and good man to the moral teachings of preceding reformers. But his teaching has been so encumbered with tradition and miracle and dogma that the Christian church, taking its cue from Paul, has completely buried the original Jesus and substituted a wretched caricature of the simple Nazarene peasant. Based upon the vicarious atonement theory of his crucifixion—a theory of which he himself had not the slightest conception—the Christian church has formulated a code of belief which is an outrage upon man's reason and is really subversiv of morality.

This has recently been made prominent in the case of Guiteau.

According to Paul's Calvinistic theory of Christianity—a theory virtually held by all orthodox churches—Guiteau was a necessary part of God's plan and decree. Nearly every resolution of condolence passed upon the death of President Garfield asserted that he was removed "by the will of God," "by a mysterious dispensation of divine providence." Official state papers asserted the same thing, strangely forgetting that by doing so they relieved the assassin of all responsibility, and only emphasized what he is continually claiming, namely, that he was inspired by God to "remove" the President.

To say that "in his inscrutable wisdom it hath pleased God to remove from us the illustrious head of the nation," is simply saying that God authorized the assassination; therefore the sooner we release Guiteau, and look upon him as God's vicegerent, as a man chosen by an infinit deity to work out that deity's will, the sooner will we do him justice. Only, then, let us turn and deny the God who could be guilty of such an outrageous infamy.

According to the logic of the Brooklyn Tabernacle, God makes good use of such men as Guiteau, and he made use of the suffering of his victim to bring the people of this nation to their knees in prayer for his recovery. If this be true, if God rules the world by special providences, if he allowed the innocent victim of an outrageous crime to suffer so much in order to induce people to pray, only to deny their prayer in the end, knowing that he would deny the prayer, then the sooner every man in this broad land becomes an Atheist and denies the existence of a God like that, the sooner will we be rid of the vilest blasphemy that has ever been uttered against the character of the supreme ruler of the universe.

All these immoral notions spring Irom the vicarious atonement theory of Christianity, a theory in which Guiteau himself firmly believes. Liberal religionists are to be congratulated upon the fact that he is a warm adherent of the Christianity now called "orthodox." He believes in prayer, and if he only keeps on praying, some pious minister will be found to assure him of an immediate entrance into heaven when he dies—that heaven so generously promised every murdered who says he "believes in Jesus." His case illustrates the false code of morality which the Christian church has substituted as a rule of faith and conduct, instead of that simple, pure morality taught by Jesus in common with every other moral reformer.

The Bible has been set up to be rejected only upon pain of everlasting misery; a false hell has been built, and an imaginary devil introduced; God has been made to appear a blood-loving, revengeful, uncertain God who created man and then was sorry for it; who damned little children before they were born; who decreed one man for heaven and another, with a better moral character, for hell. These ideas hav been drawn from the Bible and set forth as an infallible creed for every soul that would get to heaven, but a creed (let us be grateful) that is now seen to be, by thinking men, unworthy the confidence and respect of any man who respects his own manhood.—Truth.

Murder and Bigamy by God's Command.

The following, from the Sacramento (Cal.) Record-Union, is a very sensible editorial on the revelation-from-God business, which at present is being very much overdone in this country:

"The Mormon delegate to Congress, George Q. Cannon, has filed a declaration in his contested election case, in which he admits that he is a bigamist, and also admits 'that in public addresses, as a teacher of my religion in the United States, I hav defended said tenet of said church (polygamy) as being, in my belief, a revelation from God.' The extent to which alleged divine revelations are being employed at present to justify breaches of human law is becoming embarrassing. Guiteau murders the President and claims that it was revealed to him that it was his duty to commit that crime. Cannon marries several women, and declares that he and his church hav been in like manner commanded to commit bigamy. The Catholics would no doubt say that this confusion grows out of the abandonment of the church of Rome, which, according to them, is the only organization possessing the right and authority to determin what God has revealed and what he has not. But in the absence of that final authority it is extremely difficult for those who believe in divine revelations at all to draw a sharp line and say that outside of it no alleged revelations are or can be genuin. We suppose it must be acknowledged that Mormons may and do really believe in their creed, however absurd it may seem to outsiders. And if the religious view was the one which controled American governmental policy and legislation, and if the Protestant theory of Christianity was officially accepted in our Constitution, it would be found very difficult to dispose of such allegations as those of Guiteau and Cannon.

"The pretense of a supernatural authority or command for certain lines of action or doctrins has been employed so frequently, and with so much success, that it was, until quite recently, had recourse to very naturally whenever difficulties arose. This pretense, however, could not produce its full effects save when the organization employing it possessed the power to enforce its views by temporal agencies. Where opinion is free questions will be asked, and when it becomes possible to investigate the credentials of those who claim supernatural authority, belief in the genuinness of the revelation is very apt to decline. It fortunately happens that the founders of this republic were wise enough to insist on a complete separation of church and state, and therefore, when the laws of the country are broken, and in defense of such law-breaking a divine revelation is set up, the plea need not be admitted. There is in fact nothing to prevent American courts from deciding that American law has precedence in the United States over alleged divine revelations, and recent events hav shown this supremacy of secular jurisdiction to be really quite necessary to the proper carrying on of government.

"We hav seen that there is literally nothing too extraordinary to be defended on the plea of revelation. From the assassination of the President to the marrying of many women this elastic and comprehensiv line of defense extends. It covers at once a Guiteau and a Cannon. It is employed to excuse assassination on the one hand and polygamy on the other. And it is evident that if such a plea were once admitted there is nothing to which it might not be applied. It is, indeed, more dangerous than the insanity plea, for it is still more impossible to test it by the ordinary rules of evidence. The usual custom in such cases has been to make the thing revealed the proof of the revelation, and the alleged revelation the proof of the authority of the thing revealed. This, of course, is arguing in what the logicians call a 'vicious circle,' but it is the only mode of argument these cases admit of, and heretofore this peculiar method of ratiocination has been successful, simply because any objection to it was denounced as wicked and blasphemous. The sincere Mormons no doubt hold that the laws against polygamy are sacrilegious, and they are consistent in that belief from their standpoint. But the weakness of their case lies in the circumstance that this government was not mixed up, in its foundation, with any supernatural theories whatever, and consequently that every citizen of the republic has fair warning that its laws are supreme, and that there is no supernatural appellate court in the United States.

"It has often, but loosely, been asserted that this is a Christian republic. That is not the fact. This government is a purely political one, and all who liv under it are free to believe what they choose, always provided that their religious beliefs do not lead them to adopt practices which are in contravention of the law of the land. And reflection will show, as indeed experience also shows, how very necessary it is to hav a clear test of what is permissible, such as the law give us. For if it had been provided that alleged divine revelation of any kind was, under any circumstances, to take precedence of the law, we should hav been plunged into confusion worse confounded. It might then hav been difficult even to get Guiteau convicted of murder, and as for Cannon, we really do not see how his present declaration could hav been met. But, happily, the American people do not labor under any embarrassments of this kind. It is not necessary to deny the alleged revelations even in any of these cases. Thus it may be said to Guiteau: 'Possibly God did order you to do what you hav done. But if so, he certainly must hav intended you to be hanged, for he knows that hanging is the punishment we inflict for murder.' And to Cannon and his people it may be said: 'Perhaps you are right about your revelation regarding polygamy. But if you are, God must hav intended you to be sent to the penitentiary, for he knows that the laws of the United States declare bigamy to be a felonious offense.' There is in fact no objection to the assumption of revelation by anybody, but it must be clearly understood that whatever the alleged divine commission may be, it cannot be advanced in arrest of the judgment of American courts, upon conviction for breaches of state and national laws. And we trust that Guiteau and Cannon may hav early opportunities of realizing this view of the revelation question."

Our enterprising monthly contemporary, the Kansas Liberal, began last month a serial story by those two able and eminent lady writers, Mrs. E. D. Slenker and Mrs. J. E. Ball. Although not professional novelists, they hav great skill in putting a story together, and always manage to giv much wholesome instruction. It is enough to say to all that hav read Mrs. Ball's "Clergyman's Victims" and Mrs. Slenker's "Darwins" and "John's Way" that this last joint effort is in no way inferior to those. The Kansas Liberal is published by M. Harman, at Valley Falls, Kan., at 75 cents per year.

H. L. Green informs us that he goes West on the 19th inst. on his second lecturing trip, and intends to visit most of the Western states. He says he will make a specialty of obtaining subscribers for Liberal papers, and we authorize him to act as agent for this paper wherever he may go. We bespeak for him a cordial reception by our readers and the Liberal public generally.

Our friend W. H. Burr is indefatigable in his efforts to prove Paine was Junius. His latest pamphlet is, without doubt, the best that can be said upon the subject, and we are free to confess he makes strong points. As will be seen by reference to our advertising columns, he is sending the pamphlet free to all who apply.

Book Notices.

"Ecce Diabolus" seems to prove conclusivly that the Jehovah of the Christian mythology is really the black Saturn, the black Jupiter, and the black desolation of winter. It makes the Bible an astronomical myth, with the sun represented as Christ, and the twelve signs of the zodiac as the twelve apostles, and that the Jehovah now worshiped by the whole Christian world is actually the devil, or spirit of evil, cold, and inhospitable winter, that must be propitiated by sacrifices, by worship, and by adoration. The Druids, who, like Epicurus, Voltaire, Paine, and others who were the real "salt of the earth," and who tried to teach truth, love, peace, and purity, hav been the worst slandered sect that the world has ever known, and yet the Druids of Great Britain were probably "the first people who taught the Christian mythology and commenced the work of civilization and education."

They were greatly opposed to all sacrifices of animals, and more especially of human beings, to the gods, while nearly all the nations and peoples around them believed in such barbarities. Moses, Aaron, and all the patriarchs of the Bible thought bloody sacrifices pleasing offerings to their deities, and it is judged from hints and expression found here and there in the Bible, that they all at times sacrificed human beings on their bloody altars. Our author says, "Probably human sacrifices of children, especially the first-born, was customary among the Jews during most of the time they held sway in Palestine, and later on than is generally thought! But the Christians hav resuscitated the idea in the worst form. They assert that it is the only way by which their own awful Jehovah could be appeased finally, to wit, the sacrifice of a human being who was innocent and the best of mankind. Are they willing to acknowledge that if their deity is not the devil deified, his attributes closely resemble him? And they who teach that their sacrament is eating the flesh and drinking the blood of that human sacrifice, which insures life eternal to the partakers of the horrible feast, are apt to be offended if we suggest that they are cannibals." In closing, he says of the Druids: "They were nature worshipers. They held that to win favor with the Deity they had to bridle their appetites, crucify their vanity and lusts, subdue all cruel and wicked feelings in their own persons; to devote their energies as a sacrifice for the common good, and obey the voice of nature. Their temples were never defiled by blood, idol-worship, or priestly delusions. Pure philosophical temples were they, and their motto was 'The truth against the world.'"

It is always a great pleasure to see character rescued from calumny and slander, and find something grand and beautiful where we hav expected only shuddering horrors and black ignorance. I confess I hav greatly enjoyed reading this testimony in favor of the Druids, and shall ever after hold them in memory as a pure, holy, and deserving people. With the Druids we too believe:

"No sin-atoning sacrifice
Can banish pain and woe;
But manfully we learn to liv
By reaping what we sow."

Now We Hav It!

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The child is born, and its name is Ecclesiasticism! The large-brained and large-souled Ingersoll thinks all good can be worked out in the old rotten Republican party, while others think the more rotten old Democracy would do all things necessary. While the cry comes up to us that it is too soon to form a new political party, the following new party program is clipped from the Detroit News of Dec. 6th. Will you please publish it? And I wish that the Boston Investigator and all Liberally-inclined papers will copy it that the Liberals of the whole country may be at once informed of the fact that the churches, or ecclesiasticism, is in the harness, full-fledged as a political party, to confront us with their opposit platform of priestcraft and a preacher for President. But enough; here it is:

"Rev. C. C. Foote, of this city has just returned from Galesburg, Ill., where he attended the convention of 'the American party,' held there on the 1st inst. The party is a new one, and Mr. Foote is filled with glorious visions of the future, to be attained through it. They hav begun early, he says, and will make great havoc in the ranks of the old parties in 1884 and celect their presidential ticket in 1888. He says the largest publi hall in Galesburg was filled with people who interestedly listened to the inauguration of this grand work of the American party, who there and then nominated for President of the United States in 1884, Rev. Jonathan Blanchard, president of Wheaton College, Ill., with Hon. John A. Conant, of Connecticut, for Vice-president. Mr. Foote was chosen to officially announce to Mr. Blanchard his nomination, and did so in language highly laudatory to the nominee, concluding with, 'If elected, your administration will be, we doubt not, honorable to yourself and a rich blessing to a grateful nation.'

"Mr. Foote was questioned as to the strength of the new party in Detroit and Michigan, but nothing definit could be learned from him. He was posted on its platform, however, which holds as follows: 1. Ours is a Christian nation, and God is the author of civil government. 2. God requires and man needs a Sabbath. 3. Liquor prohibition is the true policy. 4. Charters of all secret orders should be withdrawn and their oaths prohibited. 5. Civil equality of all citizens. 6. National arbitration preferable to war. 7. Bible in the schools. 8. Anti-monopoly, land or otherwise. 9. Ample and sound currency furnished by the government. 10. Maintenance of public credit, protection of loyal citizens, and justice to the Indian. 11. Election of president and vice-president by direct vote of the people.'

Yours, etc., Dr. Andrews.

Mrs. H. S. Lake.

To the Liberals of Illinois, Iowa, Indiana, Wisconsin, and Michigan:

I should like to receive calls to giv lectures and organize Leagues wherever my services are needed. My three months' engagement with the Elgin Liberal League has been successful, resulting in the addition of many new members and the promising inauguration of a Liberal Sunday-school. Those who wish my services for a revival of Freethought and the organization of Sunday-schools will address me at once at Elgin, Ill. Mrs. H. S. Lake.

LECTURE I.

THE OBJECTIVE ORDER.—CONTINUED.

XII.—THE ONLY UNITY OT MAN'S KNOWABLE WORLD IS MAN HIMSELF.—EACH OF THE SPECIAL SCIENCES IS AT LAST CLEARLY DEFINED, AND IS LIMITED TO ITS OWN PHENOMENA, METHODS, LAWS, AND RESULTS. TOGETHER, THEY EXPLAIN THIS WORLD.

We place this as our twelfth and last harmony because it is the cap-sheaf of them all. Until lately, that is, until the Positive Classification had been worked out, there never had been anything but confusion as to the limits of the several Sciences and the unity of the world. That confusion is generally prevalent to-day, and is likely to be for a long time to come. The truth is, that each science has its own phenomena, laws, methods, and results, and that it is only when the Sciences are positively and correlatively classified and centered in Man, the Knower, that they become a solution of the world, and the final Philosophy. The attempts to extend the methods and laws of only one Science over another, or over the world generally, so as to make an abstract ontology, has been for ages, and is now, the common fallacy of Philosophy, of which volumes furnish illustrations. All schemes of Metaphysical Universology are instances of this fallacy, usually supported abundantly by fanciful analogies between phenomena which are in no way correlatives of each other.

Such efforts of the fancy and imagination may have their uses in poetry and in the subjective method, as we shall see, but they must not be confounded with Science or true Philosophy. There are no general laws, except the Law of Correlation, which apply to all phenomena, and so hold all the world together. That is done by Man; the consciousness of mankind only, because that only is the final correlate of the whole knowable world. A Subjective—that is, a human—Synthesis is, therefore, the only one possible to Man. Even the law of correlation becomes difficult to follow or apply in the complexity of the phenomena which are close to and directly dependent upon Man; as, for instance, in the Sciences of Sociology, Morals, Art, Language, and Psychology.

In those domains of human science, which may be said to form or include the "Spiritual" world of Man, the correlates of the phenomena are of such complexity of changes as to the past, and in the surrounding environment, that it becomes difficult and often impossible to follow them all. They are therefore supplemented by the human will, and the phenomena are changed and ordered, to suit human needs, use, and pleasure. That is, the closer we get to man the more he subjects the objective to the subjective or moral order, and makes the social and moral order the law of the complex world which closely touches or concerns him. But this moral law and practical utility is but a part of his own will, and does not form nor belong to any objective order.

In any aspect, therefore, the modern student is to learn to respect the limits and methods of the respective Sciences, and never to confuse one with another, nor to make the mistake of supposing, because he changes or adapts things to his needs according to some moral or practical law of his own, that therefore there is a moral or human-like Law in the world outside of man's will and his administration of facts and phenomena. For fear our words may not be heeded, we ask your earnest attention to the following admonition from KANT, to which Science since his day has added increased emphasis:

"We do not enlarge, but disfigure, the sciences when we lose sight of their respective boundaries and allow them to run into one another."*

It would be well to take up the several sciences and show what each does cover, and then what it does not, and which are its true laws and what only hypotheses and pseudo extensions of each. Any one who would do this thoroughly would remove confusions innumerable.

Perhaps if we give a few intimations the reader may be assisted in this work of which so much remains to do.

1. LOGIC and MATHEMATICS are the deductive sciences. They are also general because they deal with relations which are common to all of the sciences; they are fundamental because there can be no science without them, and so they are placed at the beginning of the scale, yet are common to and applicable to each science to a certain extent. But in them we take up only the simplest and most general experiences of number, space, time, and motion, i.e., abstract relations, which are always invariable and which are therefore regarded as "necessary and universal." They are the general premises, propositions, or axioms which experience proves to be true the moment attention is drawn to them. What is the task and object of these sciences?

The task is to draw out from (Latin de, from, and duco, I draw) general axioms, i.e., conclusions of universal experience the particular instances and relations they involve. The method of logic is, therefore, one of the simple deduction from generals to particulars, or reversely it is one of simple induction of a general conclusion from observed particulars.

In mathematics the same method is applied, to numbers, and we have the calculus, that is, arithmetic and algebra; to space, and we have geometry and trigonometry, and conic sections; to time and motion, and we have theoretical mechanics, statics, and dynamics.

Now notice the confusions and pseudo extensions:

(1.) It will be noted that these sciences are limited to the induction and deduction of general laws and relations; that they are abstract and exist only in the minds of men who deduct or induct them. For instance, a dozen objects, lines, or triangles have no relations to each other except as men by their reason impose them. In other words, as far as man knows, logic and mathematics treat of relations existing in the human mind only. He makes them objective as he applies them and arranges and modifies phenomena according to them. They are his ideal means of interpreting the world to his fellows, but the idea is in his mind only. The things or phenomena he conceives as external to him, and so they may be, but their relation is purely his inference and idea and that of his fellow-men. This was explained fully in the Ninth Harmony, or the Subjective Synthesis.

(2.) This distinction of the subjective idea from the objective thing brushes away an ocean of pseudo science and false philosophy that has come down to us from time immemorial. The Pythagorean system of explaining the "universe" by the relations and "spirit of numbers," is a specimen of this false method, and still has its successors. Speculations upon the meanings of the numbers 1, 2, 3, and 7, etc., still fill large volumes; and that "God geometrizes" is an axiom of "Platonists," who still publish a newspaper and a periodical supported by great learning and zeal. Those people have yet to learn that our inferences exist in our own minds and not outside of them. It is merely anthropomorphic fetichism to assume objective existence for them. We laugh at the savage who projects his will into "dead objects," but the philosopher must not do the same with his intellect and so logicize or mathematicize the "universe," except that he frankly acknowledges that such a synthesis or philosophy is purely subjective and ideal.

(3). Again, the simple relations of number, space, and time, and the general relations of logic, in no wise include the phenomena which are treated of in the other sciences, and so they can be no philosophy or explanation of the world in and of themselves. It is only when logic and mathematics are applied to the laws and phenomena of other sciences that they are of immense value in extending those sciences; for example, when applied to the planetary orbits and to extend the law of gravity in astronomy, they helped to discover the planet Neptune. But such an application is entirely different from the pseudo extension of the "spirit of numbers," etc., to which reference has just been made. Mathematics can only explain the mathematical aspect of the world to man, and never the whole of it. It takes all of the sciences together to do that.

2. ASTRONOMY is the great observational science. It is also the transitional science between Mathematics and Molar Physics. The positions, movements, and order of succession of the heavenly bodies are objective phenomena, but yet little more than so many ideal points and lines to which abstract mathematics and deductive and inductive logic may be applied. The basis of this science, therefore, rests chiefly upon logic and mathematics, with the addition of observation of objective phenomena as the means of obtaining the data, and verifying the conclusions, to which the deductions of mathematics may bring us.

The splendor of the phenomena, the immensity of time and space they involve, the exactness and regularity of the motions and laws of the heavenly bodies, and their general explanation by the law of gravity, have made that science the grandest object of human contemplation. It is sublimity itself.

It is not therefore surprising that before the laws of celestial phenomena had been made out so as to clearly mark its bounds, it was also falsely extended over all other phenomena as the explanation and philosophy of the universe. The two words astrolatry and astrology mark well that rudimentary stage of science which became astronomy. The influence of the sun, moon, planets, and stars were believed to dominate all other, and especially all human, affairs, and so to furnish at once a philosophy and a religion. The order of the seasons, months, weeks, and week-days, and their names were derived from thence. All domestic and agricultural affairs were influenced by the stars and the moon, and still are to the ignorant majority of the world to-day. Among the more enlightened this survival of astrolatry has passed into poetry. The splendid apostrophe of Byron to the stars is a beautiful example of this sentiment that has become almost instinctive:

"Ye stars, which are the poetry of heaven,
If in your bright leaves we would read the fate
Of men and empires—'tis to be forgiven
That in our aspirations to be great
Our destinies o'erleap their mortal state,
And claim a kindred with you; for ye are
A beauty and a mystery, and create
In us such love and reverence from afar,
That fortune, fame, power, life, have named themselves a star!"
—Childe Harold, Canto iii.

This is grand as poetry, "the poetry of heaven," but it is not the science of heaven. The modern advertising Astrologist, the seventh daughter of a seventh daughter, is an interesting survival and monument of extinct worlds of faith which formerly held man supine under the celestial influences and control of the sun and stars. The great dead hierarchies of Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, etc., were instances of this great faith. China is the survival of such an empire under the "son of heaven;" and China and her people are not understood in our day because their religion, which is a fetichistic astrolatry, is not understood. It is not understood because our people neglect to study positive philosophy and sociology. It is only by them that the origin and succession of the faiths are explained; and by them it is done as successfully as the strata of the earth in geology.

3. Physics and Chemistry are the experimental sciences.

They give us not only the exercise of observation, as in the case of astronomy, but also of induction and experimentation. Their problem is to induce the general laws of the relations and properties of matter from the various forms in which it is found upon the surface of the earth. These are, therefore, particularly the inductive sciences.

Chemistry treats of the movements, relations, and properties of the elements, supposed to be atoms and molecules, which compose the masses of matter. Between and connecting these two sciences are found the motions or properties of matter known to us as Heat, Light, Electricity, and Magnetism, leading us up to, and beautifully illustrating by their phenomena, the law of correlation, which is the heart of the sciences.

The next step would take us from the inorganic or material to the organic or vital world. But between the two, completing the material world, lies the concrete sciences,

Stellar Geography,
Meteorology,
Physical Geography,
Geology,
And Mineralogy.

Notice that the provinces of these great material sciences are inductive. We do not know the whole of the world of matter and stars, etc. We induct such laws as we can from the facts which we can observe or experiment upon.

Are these material sciences the source of confusion and of pseudo extension? Certainly, much as was the case with their predecessors which we have noted. The error of extending the properties and methods of these material sciences to those sciences above them in the scale is the error of Materialism.

The "universe" was conceived of as a machine to be explained by mechanics, the elements thereof were to be explained by chemistry, and the phenomena of life, emotion, intellect, art, language, etc., were to be explained by extending the methods of material science over them. This was and is totally unscientific, for the phenomena are not explainable by any properties of matter or of elements, atoms, or molecules. The semi-assertion of scientists that such is the case has done very much to discredit scientific philosophy, and has given rise to false notions which it will take many years to eradicate.

Let us take the next step into the organic or vital world, and we shall see why Materialism can never be a philosophy, much less a religion.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

* This is the motto to Mr. J. M. Long's "Classified Scheme of Knowledge," a noteworthy pamphlet, to be obtained of the author, Chillicothe, Mo.

H. L. Green's Lecture Trip.

Since I wrote to you I have visited Homer, Jackson, Ann Arbor, Adrian, and Franklin of Michigan, and Freemont, Ohio. I stopped at Homer for the purpose of visiting some cousins there. I found them good people, but quite orthodox in their religious views; and in accordance with the rule that when you are with the Romans do as the Romans do, I attended the Methodist church with them twice on Sunday, and was also present at the Sunday-school. In he morning the old gray "servant of God" preached on "The Resurrection of the Body," and in the evening on "Salvation by Blood." The audience in the morning and evening numbered about two hundred, and among that number there were not more than twenty-five men, and so it is everywhere. The churches are made up most entirely of women. As a friend of mine said the other day, "The clergy run the women and the women run the churches." And the clergy appear to be satisfied with this arrangement. The clergy depend on the sisters to get money enough out of the pockets of their husbands to pay the expenses of the churches.

And, as I before said, I attended the Sunday-school, and it was a sad sight to see two hundred children being drilled for an hour on the bloody sacrifices of the Old Testament.

I could not find an outspoken Freethinker in Homer. It is a dark, superstitious place, and needs light. It is good missionary ground for the Michigan Liberal Association to do some Liberal work in. The inhabitants of Homer believe every word of the Old Testament, including the speech of Balaam's ass; and I should judge from what I heard at the Methodist church that the distinguished animal above referred to would fill a Homer pulpit with satisfaction to his hearers.

From Homer I went to Jackson, a large, pleasant town. There I made the acquaintance of Ira C. Billman, who is preaching for the Unitarian church. Mr. Billman is a Unitarian of the most radical character, and his society is made up largely of individuals who take THE TRUTH SEEKER and indorse its Liberal utterances. Mr. Billman had just returned from a visit to Boston, where he informed me that on Sunday he went, in the morning, to hear M. J. Savage preach, and in the afternoon George Chainey. I judge, from the talk I had with him that he is not far from Mr. Chainey in his belief. And I think many of the western Unitarian clergymen would like to accept of a "call" similar to the one that Paine Hall gave Mr. Chainey. They are waiting for the good time coming when they can be permitted to do so. Mr. Billman very generously offered me the use of his church in which to deliver a lecture, but his trusteees did not concur. At Jackson I made the acquaintance of Mr. B. F. Eggleston, a subscriber and great admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who rendered me some valuable aid. His clothing store seems to be the headquarters of the Freethinkers of Jackson. While at this store I accidentally met your worthy friend, S. D. Moore, of Adrian. He always carries with him sample copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER and TRUTH SEEKER publications, and he has done a good work for you in Michigan.

With Mr. Moore I visited Ann Arbor, and we stopped for two days with Mr. Moore's daughter and her husband. They are intelligent, worthy people, but I regret to say I have forgotten their names.

While there I visited the Michigan University, which is a grand institution of learning, but, I regret to say, is most entirely under orthodox supervision, notwithstanding it is a state school. In its reading-room I could not find THE TRUTH SEEKER. Some Liberal who has money and the disposition to do so should at once subscribe for a copy for that reading-room, so that the fourteen hundred students in attendance there may see it.

From Ann Arbor I went to Adrian, where, on account of a severe storm, I was compelled to lie by for a week. And I was lucky in getting into good and comfortable quarters at the pleasant home of Mrs. E. Comstock, the widow of the late Edwin Comstock. This house for thirty years has been the home of all the traveling Radicals, Liberals, and reformatory speakers. It reminded me of the home of Amy Post, of Rochester, N. Y. Mr. Comstock was an earnest antislavery man, and his home was an "underground depot" during the antislavery conflict. Your valuable subscriber and correspondent, Parker Pillsbury, will corroborate all I hav said of this home. Mrs. Comstock is a great admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and is a most intelligent, worthy woman, who is highly respected by all who know her. There is a large number of TRUTH SEEKERS taken at Adrian. During the week I stopped there I made some most valuable acquaintances, among whom are Dr. M. L. Sherman and his most intelligent wife, at whose home I received a most cordial welcome, and Prof. W. F. Lyon, who, with Dr. Sherman, is the author of a work entitled "The Hollow Globe," a very remarkable book, and one worthy of perusal by any intelligent person. Their theory is that the world is hollow and not filled with fire, and that it is a shell inhabited on the inner side, as well as outside. I also made the acquaintance of L. Vanderburg, the activ Secretary of the Adrian Liberal League, also of Mrs. Brown, daughter of Mrs. Comstock, Mrs. A. D. Carroll and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Taylor, at whose very pleasant home I enjoyed a most agreeable visit, and many others that your space will not permit me to mention.

Sunday evening I lectured at the Dean Opera House to a large and intelligent audience. The audience was so much larger than the friends there expected that it encouraged them to hope that hereafter they could often hav lectures. The Liberals at Adrian are made up largely of Spiritualists, and I found them to be admirable people.

The next place I lectured was at Franklin Post-office, Tipton. I was invited there by Mr. Otis Whelan, one of your activ subscribers, who succeeded in getting up a large meeting made up of the intelligent farmers of the town of Franklin. The Whelan family has done very much in that vicinity for the cause of Liberalism. Here, also, they were much encouraged by the size of the meeting and the interest the people appeared to take in what was said. Mr. S. D. Moore and Mr. Jas. C. Eccles, of Tecumseh, came some eight miles in a carriage to attend the meeting. The friends at Tipton think of extending an invitation to Mr. J. H. Burnham and Mrs. H. S. Lake to speak for them before long. I hope they may do so.

From Tipton I went to Fremont, Ohio, where I delivered a lecture to a small but intelligent audience. The audience here would hav been larger if the meeting had been more extensivly advertised. Messrs. E. R. More and E. B. Williams were the gentlemen who got up this meeting.

While at Freemont I was permitted to visit the ex-President and see his Methodist wife. Mr. Williams and myself took a walk up around Mr. Hayes's premises, and Mr. Hayes was walking out in front of his house, and, after speaking with us, he invited us in and showed us his library and the many curious and interesting things he had presented to him while President. He was very sociable, affable, and pleasant, and one could readily see what made him governor and President. It was not his ability, but his affability. I learned that he always speaks to every person he meets on the street, and does all in his power to make it pleasant for all who call on him. He entertained Mr. Williams and myself for nearly half an hour in conversation about matters in general. There was nothing said about his refusing the petition of two hundred thousand persons to pardon Mr. Bennett, but as I had been advertised in his village as the late Chairman of the National Liberal League, he may hav connected me with the League that pressed that petition. But one can readily see what the man is made of. He is merely a politician, and has no opinions on any subject. He cares no more for the church than he does for a Freethought association, and if Freethought was the popular religion he would be on its side. He would probably hav pardoned Bennett if it had not been for his wife and the clergy, for I think there is no superstition about him. What he lacks is back-bone. Mrs. Hayes, I judge by her appearance, is a good-hearted woman, who thinks she is a philanthropist, and probably would be one if she was not possessed of the idea that there is nothing good outside of the orthodox church. If it were not for her religion she would no doubt be a good woman; that makes her an intolerable bigot. Thousands, like her, are spoiled by their religion, and it therefore behooves Liberals everywhere to keep their children from its baneful influence. If we are to hav any religion, let it be the religion of humanity.

During the present month I desire to lecture in central and western New York, after which I intend to go West on a lecturing trip as far as Kansas. I desire to hear from friends who wish my services.

What I Don't Believe.

PART II.—NO. 63.

722. Luke touches prophecy very lightly. He mentions most of the incidents that Matthew did, but he never once says "this was done that it might be fulfilled what was spoken of a certain prophet." Probably he did not think those events transpired expressly to fulfil some vague prophecy, or perhaps he had a trifle more of good judgment than Matthew possessed. It does not indicate remarkable shrewdness to imagine that Jesus took pains to do certain acts, or that certain deeds were performed around him, that some blind hint an old Jewish prophet had made seven hundred years before might be matched. The supposition is extremely improbable.

723. John does but little in the prophecy line, but tries his skill in that direction a few times. In chap. v, 46, he makes Jesus say, "For had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me, for he wrote of me." But neither Jesus nor John takes the trouble to tell us what Moses wrote about Jesus, nor has anybody ever discovered it. The writer of Acts (ii, 22) undertook to tell what Moses said about Jesus, thus: "For Moses truly said unto the fathers, A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you, of your brethren, like unto me; him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever he shall say unto you." Here is a gross imposition by some Bible writer. The language of Moses alluded to is found in Deut. xviii, 15, and the reference Moses made was to Joshua, his immediate successor, and had not Jesus in his mind at all. It is most singular that those gospel writers must be constantly trying to make false representations, pretending a prophecy to be made and fulfilled, when nothing of the kind was the case. The truth is, Moses never wrote a word about Jesus, nor did he write the book of Deuteronomy from which this pretended prophecy of Jesus is taken. When this fact is borne in mind, the magnitude of the entire fraud can be better appreciated.

724. In connection with the crucifixion John uses this language: "Then came the soldiers, and brake the legs of the first [one of the thieves], and of the other which was crucified with him. But when they came to Jesus, and saw that he was dead already, they brake not his legs. . . . For these things were done that the scripture should be fulfilled: A bone of him should not be broken." The passage which John here calls a prophecy is found in Exodus xii. By reading the chapter it will be found that it is entirely in reference to the institution of the passover and of the slaying of the first-born of Egypt, with instructions relative to the eating of certain animals. It has not the glimpse of a prophecy about it. The forty-sixth verse reads in this way: "In one house shall it be eaten; thou shalt not carry forth aught of the flesh abroad out of the house; neither shall ye break a bone thereof." The reader can easily see what a forced and false construction it was in John to make those instructions about eating the passover to apply to breaking the legs of Jesus; and this is a fair illustration of all the claimed fulfilment of Bible prophecies. John was as far wide of the truth as Matthew. Neither of them in this particular, if, indeed, in any other, will do to rely upon. Every pretended claim in the New Testament of the fulfilment of Old Testament prophecies is nothing less than a falsehood. In every case there is misrepresentation.

725. At the very close of the gospel of John a statement is made which Matthew, with all his proficiency in that line, could hardly surpass. It beats the prophecies away into the shade. "And there are also many other things which Jesus did, the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written." What a monstrous supposition that is, to be sure! Just think of it for a moment, the world itself could not contain the account of the acts of an individual who lived to be a little over thirty years of age, when the smallest room, eight feet in hight, yes, the smallest closet, could hold the books in which every act performed by a person who lived to be ninety were written. Think then how many books could be piled over the entire surface of the earth if in tiers no more than twenty feet high. They could not only contain the account of every deed, every breath drawn by a man living to be a hundred years old, but ten thousand millions of them. I will leave it for the reader to decide whether a man making such an extravagant statement is a reliable man, and safe to be believed upon any subject.

726. Jesus himself seems to have tried his hand at prophecy, but not with remarkable success. Matthew gives five such instances; Mark, four; Luke, four; and John, three. Those in the first three gospels are mostly definite and positive. Here is a sample: "Behold we go up to Jerusalem, and the son of man shall be betrayed unto the chief priests and unto the scribes, and they shall condemn him to death, and shall deliver him to the Gentiles to mock, and to scourge, and to crucify him; and the third day he shall rise again" (Matt. xx, 18, 19). When it is remembered that this account was not written, at the shortest time, till thirty-eight years after the event transpired, and probably not till a hundred and fifty years afterward, and what a great story teller Matthew proved himself to be in numerous instances, it can be readily understood that he could easily have Jesus make a definite statement. But even here he could not state it correctly. Jesus was not three days in the grave, but one day and two nights. As a proof that Jesus made no such prediction, it may be stated that after the arrest and crucifixion of Jesus his disciples were perfectly in the fog as to what the finale of the matter was to be. They had no more expectation that their master would rise than that they would take wings and fly to the moon. When Jesus was arrested in the Garden of Gethsemane his disciples first attempted resistance, of course not expecting what had just taken place, and then the next thing they did was to forsake him and take themselves off like a lot of cowards, as they were. Had it not been for the benevolent Joseph of Arimathea, who took charge of Jesus's body and put it in the sepulcher, it is not at all probable that the disciples would have taken any decent care of it. They showed not the slightest respect to their late master but went off and left him alone. The women showed far more respect to the executed Jesus, for they "watched afar off" and brought spices to embalm his body. This trouble, however, would not have been taken had they known that he was so soon to be with them again. And when after another day these women reported that the master had risen, the disciples treated the story as an idle tale and believed not a word of it. The conversation of the two disciples on the way to Emmaus shows conclusively that they expected no resurrection. And when Mary ound the body gone she thought the gardner had taken it, showing clearly that a resurrection was the most distant thing in their minds. Now is it a likely story that if Jesus had told them a short time before just what was to take place, they would have been so taken by surprise and thrown into such a state of distraction when the very events transpired which he said would take place? No, not at all, and you may be sure that Matthew told a falsehood, as usual, when he narrated that pretended prophecy. If there was such a person as Jesus arrested and executed, it is not at all likely that he knew what would befall him any faster than it took place. But when such imaginative and interested fellows as Matthew came, seventy or a hundred and fifty years afterward, to write the story up and make the most of it possible, it was very easy to dress it up in striking colors and make a telling story out of it. I believe very little that he has to say about the matter.

Letters from Friends.

ANAHEIM, CAL., Dec. 3, 1881.

DEAR EDITOR: At the eleventh hour I hav been able te send you the long-coveted $5 for the Round-the-World fund. If it is as terse and telling as his other works, for instance, "What I Don't Believe," I shall never hav cause to regret the investment. I think that Worthy Putnam's experiences are duplicated in almost every one's life; if they dare to discard the God and heaven myths they are bound to be belied, traduced, and ostracized. But as long as I am found to be in such worthy company I am glad. Forty-five years ago, in Chan county, New York, I was proud of the honor of spelling on his side, when chosen next to him at the old school-house in Lacona village. Often time will banish memory, but Liberals are the thinking, growing element that will not be forgotten, nor hide their experiences from the world, for when we are freed from creeds and superstitions we feel like publishing the glad tidings. May our hero Bennett arrive home safe and sound is the wish of all the emancipated throng who read THE TRUTH SEEKER. Yours for light and knowledge,

MRS. K. PARKER.

NEWARK, N. Y., Dec. 12, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find post-office order for $5 for Mr. Bennett's book of Travel Around the World, as I wish to be enrolled as one of the truth seekers of our great nation. I hav read all of the letters published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like them very much. I wish some of our Christian friends would read some of them, and learn the true facts concerning the old ancient worshipers and their God, so they would be willing to grant equal rights and belief in regard to our future state to all human beings regardless of color or nationality, so the world's motto would be, "Truth, mercy, justice, happiness, and equality to all."

Yours with respect, WM. H. H. STEBBINS.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Dec. 6, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find post-office order for $8.75, $5 of which for the Round-the-Globe trip, and when the books are issued send them to my address.

Respectfully yours, GEORGE SMITH.

PALO, IOWA, Dec. 6, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5 for the Round-the-World trip. I would hav gladly sent it before this time if I could hav spared it, but I am not well off as regards this world, but hav enough to liv on by being saving and careful what few days I hav to stay in this world. I often wish I was well off, so that I could buy some of brother Bennett's books. I intend to hav some as soon as I can spare the money. I will renew for the paper as soon as possible. I remain Yours truly, JOHN STRATFORD.

CINCINNATI, O., Dec. 3, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find post-office money order of $6—$5 for the Round-the-World fund and $1 for "Voltaire in Exile. Yours respectfully,

LEWIS BENJAMIN.

NEW YORK, Dec. 1, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: You may put my name down for $5 more for the Round-the-World journey. I am glad that Mr. Bennett is going to publish a translation of Prof. Bruno's work on the "Latin Origin of Christianity," referred to in a previous letter. Please put my name down also as a subscriber to this latter book. Yours truly, EDWARD W. SEARING.

SANTA BARBARA, CAL., Nov. 21, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is a postal order for $8—$5 to be used in the fund for your trip around the world and three dollars to renew my subscription. As I hav the means at hand I thought, perhaps, it would serve to help you a little and lighten the burden of life during your absence. I often think of you and enjoy reading your letters so very much that many times they are so real and so life-like that it seems I can almost see the places that you describe. Hoping your journey may bring many pleasant impressions, and make you strong for your work when you return, I remain,

Your friend, MRS. M. E. ROCKWELL.

MARION, OHIO, Nov. 24. 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed draft for eight dollars—five for the Round-the-World fund and three for THE TRUTH SEEKER next year. I hav given hundreds of dollars to Methodist priests for telling me nonsense and falsehoods, but I hav now enlisted in a more glorious cause. I am after truth. I first subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER because its editor, Mr. Bennett, was persecuted by bigots, and I hav so fallen in love with it that, although I am a Spiritualist, you may consider me a life-subscriber. I notice a proposition in THE TRUTH SEEKER by Mr. Dwight (I think) for an Orphans' Home, constructed on Liberal principles. I am much in favor of it. I like the plan and location proposed, and shall hold myself in readiness to donate one dollar as soon as proper officers are elected, and will pay at least one dime annually until the institution becomes self-supporting. Would that Spiritualists and all other Liberalists would unite and organize. What a powerful body they would make, and how much good they would do! Yours for truth, FRANK EVERLY.

LOCK BERLIN, N. Y., Nov. 20, 1881.

FRIEND EDITOR: I am in arrears, and still the dear paper comes to me every week full of golden words teaching men how to liv right, honorable lives. May I exclaim in the language of the poet George P. Morris?

"Thou truest friend man ever knew,
Thy constancy I've tried;
When all were false I've found thee true,
My counsellor and guide."

Those grand and ennobling letters of yours just suit. My wife says I must send you five dollars to help you to circumnavigate this earth, for we will want to peruse them in years to come. You will find inclosed a "V" to help you travel around the world. I remain your Agnostic friend, TYLER ADAMS.

BARRE MILLS, WIS., Nov. 25, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find a draft for $8 for the Kound-the-World trip and your noble paper for '82. Respectfully yours, H. SANDER.

MASON CITY, IOWA, Nov. 28, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find draft for eight dollars—five for the Around-the-World fund, and three to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Respectfully yours, B. V. GLOYD.

BOZEMAN, MON., Nov. 17, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please accept the inclosed remittance for four trial subscribers, and $1 for "John's Way." And now that several readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER hav written me recently for information relativ to this country, I shall, as a matter of convenience to myself, by your permission, briefly answer through your paper; and for the sake of economizing space, will merely giv what seems its leading features, which will answer most of the questions asked.

Mining, grazing, and agriculture are the leading pursuits of this country, or at least the foundation of all others. The days of placer mining hav passed; now all mining interests center in quartz. This kind of mining, although in its infancy, is undergoing continual development, all the time presenting permanent improvement, and to-day is a leading industry of Montana, which the shipments of ore and bullion will attest. It furnishes the chief demand from the product of the farm. Hitherto the transportation of ores hav been exclusivly freight trains, in consequence of which the lower grades would not bear the cost of shipment to reduction works. The result is that thousands of tons of those grades lie on the dumps to-day awaiting the advent of railroad facilities for cheaper transportation.

The U. T. N. railroad has already reached the vicinity of Butte City, and it is claimed the e stern division of the N. P. R. R. will reach Bozeman late next autumn.

The grazing resources of Montana are truly wonderful. To appreciate, would be to see our immense stock ranges. Perhaps no country is superior to this in point of stock raising. Horses pass through the severest winters with no attention whatever paid them, and keep in good condition. In case of an unusually severe winter cattle and sheep require attention. Yet no winter, thus far, has been so severe but bands of cattle hav gone through, without having been fed a mouthful, with a percentage of loss less than the cost of feeding would hav been.

Irrigation is indispensable to farming here, but it is attended with but little inconvenience, and is a protection against drouth. Farmers view it as a blessing.

Without a doubt agricultural lands in Montana are destined to become valuable, as the percentage of that character of lands is so small in comparison with mountainous, mineral, and grazing lands. They are of a most prolific nature, with a capacity of yielding an incredible abundance. The health of the country is superb, having a healthy atmosphere and pure water.

Trusting this will suffice till my inquiring friends can come and see for themselvs; knowing, also, that justice to the subject has only been butchered, brevity having been my chief aim, I shall close with but one more statement which seeems as important as good health. 'Tis this, There are fewer thieves, beggars, tramps, and preachers, and less religion and less stealing in this section than any place I ever saw. I know not of a single beggar or tramp in this vicinity, unless you choose to promote clergymen to that dignity. Respectfully, THOMAS BURK.

SHERMAN, IOWA, Nov. 21,1 881.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER is causing quite a breeze among our strongest believers in the Bible here. I hav shown this "dirty sheet," as they called it, to a certain one-horse M. E. preacher, but he would only read Mr. Smith's letter about the ark. He commenced on the other side, looking up at me from time to time, and finally laid the paper away, saying: "Are you taking this paper? Before you are thirty years old you will be as bad as Mr. S over there. Why, this is worse than Ingersoll's doctrins. I'd not take and read this paper if you'd send it to me. Are you going to believe all that trash? What are you anyhow?"

That is the way they all talk and act. They won't read the answers in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but are willing to hear your belief about a hereafter, knowing that from you they, or I, will get an answer that will probably put us on the right track.

As I am among M. E.s mostly, and am also a churchman, you may know that the bigots will be trying their old game when I least expect it. I am not a master of the English language, as I would like to be, which is my excuse for not ordering some of your best books, but you may send me your catalog of pamphlets. I would like, if possible, to get some in German. Yours, FRED. GARING.

GRAND ISLAND, N. Y., Nov. 25, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find one dollar, for which send to my address the best and noblest paper I hav ever read for four months. Circumstances prevent sending any more at present, but rest assured I will renew my subscription when the time expires, for I would hardly lose a copy for a dollar.

I do not pray, for I do not know who to pray to. If there is a personal God that supervises all these planets and systems in the knowable and unknowable world, I think he has too much business to attend to without listening to a worm of the dust like me; and to pray to Christ, a mere man born of a woman. making him the equal of such a God, looks too much like blasphemy for me. If Christ ever existed, I am fully satisfied his resurrection was a stupendous hoax, and we may just as well pray to a wooden god or a stone god as to pray to gods that never answer and never can. If Christ was God, what made him look for figs on a barren fig tree? Why did he not foretell the art of printing his own teachings, and in place of telling about wars and rumors of wars, why did he not tell something about steam and electricity? Any fool might prophesy on war and not miss. But I do not think, as some do, that Christ was necessarily a bad man; on the contrary, I think, considering the age in which he lived, he was a good one and taught the best he knew in those remote and barbarous times. I think he suffered for free speech, and his death was judicial murder, just as friend Bennett's imprisonment was judicial barbarity. But I cannot believe Christ ever intended to be worshiped as a god, but if he ever existed, he certainly died for the common liberty of man. He was more humane than the rest of his fellows, and that was his crime. He spoke the truth as far as he knew it, as any truth seeker would do, and they nailed him up for it, just as Comstock would hav served friend Bennett had they lived in that age. He was put to death by Roman law. It was Roman justice that condemned him and Roman officers that executed him, and not Jews at all. And all this fuss about the Jews crucifying the Christian God is a silly lie. The Jews were the slaves of the Romans and could not put anybody to death lawfully at that time. It was Pontius Pilate and the Christian ancestors that butchered their own God, and now persecute the poor Jew for what they were guilty of themselvs. WALTER SIMONDS.

HEMPSTED, ARK., Dec. 4, 1881.

FRIEND EDITOR: Inclosed find $6 on subscriptions. I hav tried to get a new subscriber to send you, but the heathens here are afraid to read, their faith is so shaky. They prayed for Garfield here in Arkansas as well as in all other heathen lands. Ah! but a heathen told me the other dey that God knew best. Garfield might hav ruined this nation!

Yours, D. G. MELEAR.

ELMO, TEXAS, Nov. 7, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find one dollar, for which you will please giv me credit and continue to send me the paper, as I want to keep soul, body, and THE TRUTH SEEKER together as long as possible. As the most of your correspondents are Materialists, if you will giv this a place in your paper I would be glad if some of them will answer the following questions. Within the last three years I hav lost two of my children. About one month before the death of each one I was distinctly warned of their death. Of course I am a Spiritualist, but if the Materialist will explain to me how it is that I was warned of the death of my children weeks in advance when they were well and hearty, and all came to pass as I had predicted, and yet say that death ends all, then I will hav learned something new under the sun.

JOHN E. POLK.

WAMEGO, KAN., Dec. 8, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Through the editor's class-meeting of "Letters from Friends," Wamego wishes to tell her experience, so that all the great TRUTH SEEKER league may know she has been blessed, and be glad that the warm light of reason and truth is with us, and now occupies a friend's place in nearly all our hearts.

Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel lectured in our opera house to large and attentiv audiences, last Saturday and Sunday nights. As an exponent of Freethought and the practical religion of common sense Mrs. Krekel has no superior. She uses no manuscript or notes, yet she can hold an audience for hours in an attitude of attention, eager to catch the beautiful gems of thought as they fall from her lips. "Religion vs. Theology," and "The Coming Church and Coming Religion," were logically and eloquently presented. We hope to hav her speak to us once in every two weeks this winter, and look for good results. We advise all Liberal societies to secure the services of Mrs. Krekel if they can, and also advise all Western friends to subscribe for her paper, The Mirror of Progress, published at Kansas City, Mo., where she livs. It is a first-class Liberal paper, and should visit every Western home.

Mr. L. B. Leach, of Wamego, is Liberal enough to practically dedicate his opera house as a grand temple of Freethought, the like of which many communities cannot hav to enjoy. It is one of the best buildings of the kind in the state.

Yours for universal mental liberty,

A. T. McMillan.

Central City, Col., Nov. 26, 1881.

Mr. Editor: I suppose you begin to think me a deadhead. but if you do you are mistaken. Inclosed find post-office order for $6, to pay up and carry me a little ahead. I am glad to see that The Truth Seeker has such an able hand at the helm. Keep clear of shoal water while our beloved captain is absent. Giv us the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; and defy your enemies.

Yours for the truth, John Jordan.

Ashland, Or., Nov. 28, 1881.

Friend Macdonald: I inclose $6 as my mite to help send out the gospel of truth and righteousness another year. The Truth Seeker is our Bible; our Christ is the living Christ, D. M. Bennett. I hope he will return home to family and friends safe and sound from Yahweh's old stamping-ground, and may he liv and enjoy life to the fullest extent, long enough to see the grass grow over the graves of Judge Benedict, Anthony Comstock, and the last remnant of the Young Men's Christian Association, is the prayer of Your humble servant,

O. Coolidge.

Kent, O., Dec. 10, 1881.

Friend Macdonald: The canvassers for the Garfield Monument Fund in our state are making strenuous efforts to gather every penny they can, going into the schools in true Christian style, persuading the teachers to beg pennies of the scholars for the purpose. This is a shame and disgrace and insult, and I hope you will giv those gentlemen and their work a good airing. Yours truly. B. F. Conaway.

THANKSGIVING.

Morrill, Kan., Nov. 25, 1881.

O thou great and incomprehensible being, so much so that we with the feeble intellect that thou hast given us can't comprehend why there is so much misery in the world, why the few hav the comforts and the many the wants, but nevertheless, O Lord, we thank thee for the goodness, and especially for the misery, because we know that it is thy will that it is so. We thank thee for the shipwrecks, earthquakes, tornadoes, floods, fires, famins, wars, murders, sickness, in fact everything that will torture, plague, harass, and make miserable a great portion of thy creatures here, because we know it givs thee great pleasure. O Lord, prosper our foreign missions; make them see the great necessity of spending a hundred thousand dollars on every poor heathen to save his soul from hell, when we hav thousands of poor here at home, because there will be more joy over one such than over a thousand of our poor in our cities made comfortable with the same money. Be with them, O Lord, because it givs employment and a rich living to hoards of thy priests who liv off of the bounty of the people. O thou great Jehovah, look down with loving kindness and bless the millionaires for their bountiful gifts that they hav lavished upon the widow of our late much-lamented President. Bless them for the many thousands bestowed upon her; also for a few hundreds bestowed upon the poor Michiganders that lost their all in the late fires. O Lord, our great St. John has expressly called on us all to giv thee thanks this day. We do thank thee for short crops, chintz bugs, hot winds, and no rain, because it will aid many a poor mother and child to go hungry and wring many a father's heart to see his family crying for food and warmth. We thank thee for the floods that swept over our river bottoms last spring, causing a great loss of property and life, and creating much sickness and death afterward. We thank thee for the merciless fires that swept over Michigan this last fall that caused hundreds of deaths and left thousands destitute to face a winter in an inclement climate. In our reverence for thee we thank thee for removing our President whether we wished it or not; also for hearing and answering the prayers of Guiteau in place of millions that went up to you for his life to be spared. Inasmuch as it was thy will and pleasure to remove our President for our future benefit, which as yet we are ignorant of (the benefit), I sincerely thank you that you did choose Guiteau to do your dirty work instead of myself, because it will please me far better for him to pass into glory for the act than myself, not through any disrespect to you, but I abhor blood. Bless the rich so they can afford to giv to the poor when you send famin, fires, floods, and tornadoes. We thank thee for the great monopolies that hav fastened themselvs upon this country, for the humbugs, the thieving of men in high places, and of many more not mentioned. And we will also thank you if you will be a little more careful how you sling your tornadoes, thunderbolts, etc., around. All those favors we thank you for, and you can hav the honor. Amen. J. W. Scott.

Mr. Editor: Inclosed you will find an account of another disgrace of our country, the lynching of Christopher C. Davis. The lynching of criminals in the United States is almost an every-day occurence, and why is it the press of our country don't come out and condemn such work! Why are you so mum? Surely you are not afraid of losing subscribers by coming out and denouncing such barbarous work. I do not believe there is one Infidel in the United states in favor of capital punishment, to say nothing of the heathenish practice of lynching, which is getting to be of such frequent occurrence in our country. And I doubt whether you will find more than one Liberal in a thousand in favor of it, while in the orthodox you will find about nine in every ten in favor of capital punishment. Yes, I will bet my bottom dollar, if the truth could be known, ninety-nine out of every hundred of the lynchers are believers in the inspiration of the Bible. As poor as I am, I believe I would giv one hundred dollars to a society that will prosecute to the fullest extent of the law every person who has anything to do with lynching.

Respectfully, Morgan E. Lewis.

We do not approve of lynch law any more than our friend does, and are not afraid to say so. When any government gets so weak that it cannot punish offenders against its laws it is time for it to abdicate. This country has not arrived at that point yet. The Young Men's Christian Association and Anthony Comstock's society are species of mobs, and the recent imprisonment of Mr. Bennett and other heretical editors was done by a sort of mob law. Punishment should be meted out to offenders dy the proper government officers, and any ursurpation on the part of any mob or religious society is dangerous to the liberties of the people and the stability of the republic.—Ed. T. S.]

Mr. Editor: Surrounded, as I am, by a majority of people who still liv in the realm of the supernatural—in him, of whom Dryden says, "He whom I fancy, but can ne'er express"—you will find it nattural enough that I should take refuge under your wings once in a while. My surroundings don't consist of Christendom altogether. Nay, by far the greater portion of the Pacific coast people stand outside of that horrid institution, Christianity. There are, however, many of Frothingham's type, who, having arrived at "a half-way point of Freethought, with heaven above and hell below, recanted, but without having found the real heaven on earth, and came to a sudden stop. They belong to a class who are not superstitious enough to adhere to Christian myths, yet superstitious enough to be prevented from embracing real Materialistic happiness.

Lectures, like the one I read lately in the San Francisco Occident, on "Science and Religion," by Robert Mackenzie, are willingly listened to and believed in by men who hav not cast off the whole chain of slavery. Such lectures exercise a powerful influence over those who hav but half awakened to the realities of the day. Mackenzie made several false statements in regard to the present condition of science, and disregarded all the latest scientific discoveries. He also proved how well he understood the grade of the intellects of those to whom his labor was devoted, by finishing up with the assertion that the creation tale, as told by Moses, was the only true one, although he had previously indorsed the correctness of present geological arguments in regard to the age of the world and the appearance of life in the order of time. Most Christian papers, by mixing a drop of science with their mythology, manage to interest a class of people who stand somewhat above the common orthodox rabble. While speaking of the Occident, I am, however, compelled to admit that it is one of the few Christian papers that desist from slandering more than necessary for their existence, while some of our half-Christian press comforts the Christian portion of its readers almost weekly with some blackguarding remarks about Ingersoll and Infidelity at large. None more so than that leprous little sheet, the Chico Enterprise. Its editor, a hypocrit and a deacon (these two always form one), stands, like all little dogs, off at a distance, and barks at the larger ones. He is not man enough to answer a single Infidel's arguments, yet he continues throwing mud at them. Together with some of his half-deranged schoolma'am correspondents (half of California's schoolmistresses seem to be bodily and mentally half-deranged), he delights in such false statements as: "Thomas Paine and Voltaire were Atheists;" "Infidelity claims that the world came into existence by chance;" "Christianity is spreading," etc. Of course their Christian readers, not knowing any better, believe only too readily such infamous lies. Priest-ridden and gospel-suffering as they are, commanded by their priests to read nothing but their twisted, bent, and paralyzed Christian trash; and afraid even to touch a scientific or historical work, they cannot be expected to know anything but what their pastors think necessary for their (the pastors') self-preservation. In their ignorance and innocence, the people applaud such statements, some of which I see floating through the semi-religious press almost daily.

The fool, Josh Billings, said that he didn't giv a d——n to hear Ingersoll on Moses, although he would like to hear Moses on Ingersoll. One Michigan woman had seen Ingersoll intoxicated in company with her husband. Ingersoll was appropriating the language of others in his lectures. And so on. All these falsehood-spreading editors and priests remind me of that crowing Coo(c)k who among his congregation slaughters Infidelity to the last man, but when challenged, as he was, by Ingersoll in this country, and Bradlaugh in England, disappears in his own boots. They go so far as to call the Infidel lecturers sophists. As long as they only used the name skeptic toward us, I felt honored, as it means thoughtful, reflectiv, looking carefully about, etc., but to the term sophist I take exception. The Infidel's argument is founded on historical facts, scientific demonstrations, and good, sound sense. Christian theology is the study of a form of speech, which they deliver in graceful literary form; but, alas! without being able to prove any originality for the Christian system of belief; not being able to disprove the Infidel's assertion that Christianity is walking in the cast-off shoes of more ancient pagan systems. Every scholar knows this to be true, and can therefore easily decide on which side sophistry must be. The Infidel's desire is to know. His questions are: What do we know? How do we know it? By what reasoning? On what principles? The Christian is told to believe, and instead of questioning and investigating he snivels, "I believe." Infidels will say with Socrates, "We hav not yet found what we were seeking. We hav not yet got hold of the real and essential truth." What does the Christian say? "Believe, believe, or be damned!" What a contrast between the two! While one is marching onward, the other remains behind in the land of dreams and visions. I begin to believe that Yahweh used lice in Egypt as means for a soitening process, since I found in all my travels through the most orthodox Christian countries identical with them the softest brains and the most of those little vermin. To harden the brain of mankind once more, to get rid of insanity altogether, and that during a single generation, too, I would advise our orthodox religious brethren and sisters to refrain from matrimony and all sexual indulgence for that length of time.

New Commandments.

These commandments came to me in the night. How came they I need not state. Dear reader, who seeks the good and true, and longs for the leading of a better life, receive them on their own merit from your friend. W. P.

"Behold, I giv you new commandments!"

ETERNAL TRUTHS.

Honesty and goodness are in harmony with immutable law, and their reward is sure.

Dishonesty and crime are against all law, and by eternal fiat are sure of punishment.

THE FIFTEEN COMMANDMENTS.

1. Thou shalt hav no other god before him who is known to be God and good.
2. Thou shalt not take the name in vain of anythiug that is known to be sacred.
3. Thou shalt keep, by thy words and works, all days holy and pure.
4. Thou shalt be industrious and honor labor.
5. Thou shalt honor relativs that are true and all others that deserve honor from thee.
6. Thou shalt not assault another nor commit murder.
7. Thou shalt not practice lewdness.
8. Thou shalt deal justly with all thy fellow-beings, and not despoil another of his goods.
9. Thou shalt not lie for any purpose.
10. Thou shalt render justice for evil.
11. Thou shalt be temperate in the use of all things.
12. Thou shalt not persecute thy fellow for his religious opinion.
13. Thou shalt depress anger and use kind words in thy intercourse with mankind.
14. Thou shalt use domestic animals kindly.
15. Thou shalt be honest, kind, just, and true at thy home and abroad. Worthy Putnam.

Where is Heaven?

BY HOWARD C. TRIPP.

Where is the blessed clime of peace,
Where sorrows evermore shall cease,
And white-robed angels of the skies
Shall come with harps of shining gold
To guide us to the shepherd's fold,
Where all is pure to sinner's eyes?

'Tis true, the scripture doth not tell,
Where all the "churchites" yet will dwell;
'Tis true, the region is not found
Where ages will on ages roll
Without the dying of a soul,
And all men dwell in peace around.

Some say it is in climes above,
Where all is wondrous peace and love,
That we shall liv if we believe
The silly fables that are found
In God's own word of slime and sound,
Written by villains to deceive.

While others claim they comprehend
The soul of nature, and they lend
Their lives to find the hidden art
From nature's store, that they may share
The ills of life we all must bear,
Or fall beneath death's well-aimed dart.

Through superstition's fairy land
We often stray to meet the band
Of silent sleepers now at rest;
And while we roam o'er fancy's clime
We think we see a realm sublime
Where hearts are joyous in each breast.

Imagination in disguise
Leads us to lands with golden skies,
Where friendship nevermore shall cease;
And while we see that golden clime
We sail adown the shores of time.
And soon we sleep to rest in peace.

The Christian's Plea for God in the Constitution.

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

The only way we Christians can
Stamp our opponents out
Is giv us laws with which to crush
All blasphemy and doubt.

Religion must the nation rule
Is our priests' solution;
To giv it footing we would put
God in the Constitution.

Amend it so, religion is Established firm and strong,
And then to hell all Infidels
We'll hurry right along.

With sword and Bible in our hands,
We'll put down evolution
Just as soon as we can get
God in the Constitution.

With Comegys as president,
Comstock installed as vice,
Or else postmaster-general,
Then all will move so nice.

Then Ingersoll will hav to git;
We'll bring his clan confusion;
We'll gag 'em all when we hav got
God in the Constitution.

We will enforce the laws of God
That are laid down by Moses;
When jealous, we will kill our wives
With holy water doses.

Blasphemers and old witches will
Be brought to execution;
Stone Sabbath-breakers, when we get
God in the Constitution.

All those who tempt us into paths
The Bible bids us shun,
We'll take their heads, by God's command,
And hang them in the sun.

By God all friends of reason will Soon suffer persecution,
For God will reign alone when he
Is in the Constitution.

Yes, put him in, and he will lead
Our armies into battle;
He'll hurl great stones upon our foes—
Help us to steal their cattle.

All unbelieving scoffers, with
Their Liberal League pollution,
His she-bears will devour if he
Is in the Constitution.

Like Solomon and David—both Men after God's own heart—
Our priests may win a thousand wives
With their seductiv art.

And none must sneer, or by our God,
Who hateth such intrusion,
We'll giv 'em hell when once we get
God in the Constitution.

By law we will demand a tenth
To help support our preachers;
Our Cooks no more shall beg for bread—
Our Talmages or Beechers.

By force we'll make men go to church,
Is our firm resolution;
They'll toe the mark when once we get
God in the Constitution.

WHAT OBJECTIONS TO

THE

Bennett-Mair Discussion.

BETWEEN

D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.

(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission to the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men ill informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founded upon the doctrin and authority of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progress and improvement.

8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which man kind are capable of receiving.

OPEN LETTER
TO

Anthony Comstock

In Answer to His Open Letter Sent to the Newspapers.

465 FULTON ST., BROOKLYN,

SIR: I hav before me a seven-paged open letter, addressed to myself, intended for publication in all the evening and morning papers, copies of which, I am prepared to prove, were sent to every daily and several weekly papers, the publishers of which refused to publish it, consigning the precious product of your labors to the waste paper basket. For this I am truly sorry, as it would hav given me an admirable opportunity to show the public the true inwardness of the man who could pen such a letter, and yet claim to be a Christian and a protector of the public from the vicious members of society. A more vicious letter could not be penned, and the evidence of malice crops out in every sentence You first claim that the courts honorably acquitted you. If they did, then I know nothing of the words honorable acquittal. You were arrested for publishing a malicious libel, and taken in the charge of an officer before the magistrates. You then waived examination. If you had written truthfully, why were you afraid of examination? I was present in the court to confront you on your vile charge. You were silent.

After the lapse of several weeks I received an order from Judge Smith's court to attend such court respecting my charge against you, and believing that you would submit to an examination and giv some excuse for your act, I went, accompanied by over fifty witnesses, so that a special court had to be set aside for my special case against you. Well, let us examin as to what followed. I stood there without counsel, ready to defend my order of arrest. I was strong in the proof of my charge against you, and did not require an attorney to quibble on points of law. You, on the other hand, had an attorney—a man in whom any person may trust their case as a legal adviser, and outside the law I hav reason to know that Mr. Tenney, your solicitor, is a gentleman and a noble-hearted man. He must hav felt seriously the weakness of your case, as set forth in your libelous letter, and therefore, as an act of charity toward you, advised you not to submit to an examination. He, good fellow, by special pleading, decided to take exception on points of law, and attempted to show that not the spirit and intent of your libelous letter should be gone into, but the actual wording only should be considered, and that therefore the same should be adjudged as a privileged communication, and on this ground pleaded for a dismissal. This I objected to, whereupon your solicitor proposed that a brief be prepared, setting forth the reasons why my complaint against you should be dismissed. I then stated in the presence of that court, that all I required was a full investigation into the facts. It was then arranged that the District Attorney should take charge of the case as prosecuting counsel on behalf of the people against Anthony Comstock, I being promised at that time that such investigation should be made on the following Wednesday. But, feeling that there was some crooked business going on, a dan attempt being made to frustrate justice, I employed one of our best attorneys, and he wrote a letter to the Judge, to the District Attorney, and your attorney for copy or nature of such brief. Not only so, but myself and attorney applied at Jefferson Market Police Court next day, and we were told that Justice Solon Smith had gone into the country, and would not be back until Monday following, the court officer to whom we spoke intimating that as the Comstock case was in the hands of Justice Solon Smith, nothing would be done until his return. Picture, therefore, my astonishment upon receiving a notice from the court that the case had been dismissed without an investigation into the facts which led to the writing of your letter, neither myself nor one of my witnesses being called, and yet you hav in your letter the audacity to tell the public that you were honorably acquitted. May heaven save the public when such honorable acquittals shall follow the publication of such vile letters as that penned by you to hundreds of my patients! So much for your "honorable acquittal." Now, as to your having evaded arrest or not, the facts are these: I did not dream of having you arrested until after I had written my letter to you, which appeared in all the newspapers. I called at your office personally three or four times, as did also my half-brother, David Cotter. We were each told by persons in your office that you had gone into the country, and would not be back for a week; but on being told by persons on Nassau street that you were seen in the immediate neighborhood not long after my calling, I felt that you were evading me, and deliberately refusing to giv me the names of those whom you pretended had made statements against me. It was your thus evading me which caused me to take criminal proceedings against you, and forthwith instruct counsel to sue out a warrant against you for criminal libel. After such warrant was in the hands of the officer, such officer and several of my witnesses sought you at your office. They were told by persons in your office that you had gone into the country, as I had before been told. On the morning of your arrest my half-brother, David Cotter, called at your office, in response to a telegram received by me. He was then told that you were away in the country. He went straight from your office to that of Howe & Hummel, and there met a private detective who offered there and then to disclose the whereabouts of Anthony Comstock, if the $100 reward, which I had offered for his arrest, should be given him. This was promised, and David Cotter then went and apprised the officer who held the warrant, and they went in company to your office, when they were jointly told by persons sitting there that you were away and they did not know when you would return; whereupon the officer, acting upon the information given by the detectiv above named, proceeded to a room in the upper part of the building wherein several voices were heard. The door was opened in response to the knocking of the officer, when a number of gentlemen were seen sitting around a table as if in committee. Anthony Comstock was inquired for, and denied being there. Upon retiring voices were heard in a room close by. Inquiry was made if Anthony Comstock was within. The person who opened the door replied that Anthony Comstock was not there, when the door was closed. My half-brother, who was waiting in the lobby, made a ruse as if running down stairs, the officer, all the time standing outside, beside the door. The same person who had before opened the door opened it again. The officer, by a rapid movement of the foot, kept the door open and then walked in and arrested yourself, Anthony Comstock. If this was not hiding from arrest, I fail to understand what hiding means, and as you hav to your open letter mentioned the fact of my having offered one hundred dollars reward, and that I had refused to pay the person giving the information, I beg leave here to state that the hundred dollars was paid to the detectiv in the presence of several witnesses, one of whom was a merchant and manufacturer in your immediate neighborhood of Nassau street So much for your arrest. Was it with or without evasion?

Now, as to the next portion of your open letter: You say there is a law prohibiting the transmission of letters and circulars concerning schemes to deceive and defraud the public or obtain money by false pretense through the mails. You knew very well when you were writing that sentence that it had no application whatever to my case, inasmuch as the following open letter to the physicians of Brooklyn was before you, offering every physician or scientific man a free entry into my factory and consulting rooms, and in the same letter offering five thousand dollars' worth of my goods to the poor of Brooklyn Why did you not avail yourself of the offer and hav called at my consulting rooms and manufactory for inquiry before writing your libelous letter to the hundreds of my patients? You could hav no excuse as to time and place, for this reason, viz., that my establishment is one of the most prominent in Brooklyn, and in close proximity to your own residence, so that nothing but malice aforethought could hav induced you to hav written such a letter, while the following offer to the physicians of Brooklyn was before you in the circular or pamphlet from which you obtained the names of my patients to whom you wrote. If you wish to excuse yourself re-read the following:

WM. WILSON'S OPEN LETTER

To the Physicians and the Commissioners of Charities of the City of Brooklyn.

GENTLEMEN—Two years ago in Europe I invented and patented a magnetic appliance for the relief and cure of disease. My system is one that was never before attempted, but its simplicity places it among the many great improvements in the history of science which, after its inception, has caused thousands to wonder why so valuable an addition to the necessities of our race should hav been so long overlooked.

The success of my appliances in the cure of disease in England was such that over THIRTY THOUSAND persons were clothed in them, and not one case of failure when the proper appliances were worn as recommended. In the face of such success in Europe, I determined that the people of America should be made acquainted with the fact. I arrived in Brooklyn only a few months ago and commenced the sale of my goods at No. 465 Fulton street, since which time I hav, in Brooklyn and neighborhood, over a THOUSAND persons wearing my appliances for the diseases above mentioned—all of whom came to me only as a last resort, having failed to get relief from any of their physicians. And these persons were as readily relieved as were those of Europe—NINETY-NINE PER CENT of whom will tell you to-day on application to them that my appliances gave them all the relief promised. A printed list of my clients is at your disposal so that you may satisfy yourself of the truth of the above statement. My proposition therefore is that I hand over to the medical men of Brooklyn FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS worth of my appliances, to be used only on the persons of the sick poor now and likely to be in your charitable institutions and hospitals. The only condition I make is that I myself clothe the patients according to my own judgment and be allowed to retain watchers at my own expense that the patients do not receive any medicin during the wearing of my appliances, and that a proper report be supplied from time to time, so that I, at my own expense, can publish the record of the cures by my appliances. I further wish that every medical man in Brooklyn should call at my manufactory and examine for himself the processes of manufacture and make himself thoroughly acquainted with my system. My factory is open for inspection at all hours to any physician, chemist, or scientist, and in close proximity to my own business premises the same physicians may see for themselvs the patients who hav been relieved by my appliances. All physicians and chemists who hav examined my goods hav availed themselvs of my invention, are to-day wearing my appliances, and recommending the same to their patients with marked success.

The aforesaid gift of FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS' worth of goods will be delivered from time to time, as agreed upon by a committee of yourselvs, on application to me a few days in advance, stating the disease for which they are required, so that I can supply the best possible form of my invention. Hoping you will avail yourselvs of my offer, I remain, gentlemen, Yours obediently,

WILLIAM WILSON
No. 465 Fulton st., Brooklyn.

In face of the above letter, what pretense can you find for your conduct? Why did you not giv me the names of the parties whom you pretended had writ ten to you? The fact is, no one did write to you except a lot of conspiring doctors, and to please them you became their tool.

In the next part of your open letter you refer to a letter you sent me, and say as follows: "Why did you, like Ananias and Sapphira of old, keep back a part; why did you not tell the public that I wrote you personally on the 15th of September?" Your memory must be very bad in this particular, or you did not read the newspapers, inasmuch that this paragraph appeared in the Truth newspaper on September 20th, under the caption of "The Romance of Anthony Comstock's Arrest, and what Led to It," and directly following the $100 reward, I refer to the very letter which you say I never noticed:

"And the next morning I received a cringing letter, written after the reward was offered, as shown by the postal date on the envelope, Brooklyn postmark, 2 A. M., September 16. Now I was told in his office on the 15th of September, at two in the afternoon, that he had gone away for a week. Who told the lie? Did he order his subordinates so to do, or did they do so of their own accord? The next day, September 16th, my half brother, David Cotter, with the detectivs and the court officer, went to Comstock's office. They were told that he was in the country, and did not know when he would return. They were then told that a letter was written by Comstock to William Wilson the night previous. At this the clerks seemed surprised, and said, 'Well, we do not know where he is, nor when he will return.'

"A private detectiv then told my half brother where to find him, and said he was hid away in an upper room in the same building. There the officers went, knocking at one door where voices were heard within, but the door was locked. Then in another room adjacent an attempt was made to discover him among a company of gentlemen sitting apparently in committee, but Comstock could not be seen. A ruse of running down stairs was made, only to retrace their steps just in time to find the door gently open that had before been tried and found locked. The officer slipped his foot between the door jamb and, walking into the room, arrested the great Anthony Comstock. He was taken before Justice Smith and committed in the following words of committal:

"'It appearing to me by the within depositions and statements that the crime therein mentioned has been committed, and that there is sufficient cause to believe the within-named Anthony Comstock guilty thereof, I order that he be held to answer and be admitted to bail in the sum of five hundred dollars, and be committed to the warden or keeper of the city prison of the city of New York until he gives such bail. SOLON B. SMITH,

"'Police Justice.

"'Dated September 16, 1881.'"

You will therefore see, on referring to your open letter, that you admit that my first public communication against your act was printed on the 14th day of Sept., and yet you charge me with being like Ananias and Sapphira of old, by keeping back a part. How could I mention, in my communication of the 14th, that which was not written by you until the 15th? But you know very well that the letter you refer to as having been kept back was referred to as above on the 20th day of September, that being the first letter from myself after receiving the letter written by you on the 15th. You therefore utterly fail to show in your open letter that I had kept anything back. In the same open letter you refer to a lawsuit in Ireland between Wetton & Co., and William Wilson, of No. 64½ Patrick street, Cork, and the most malicious act that any man could conceive is the taking the trouble of writing to Ireland for information respecting a man, and when such information is received, telling one-half the story in a open letter to the public and keeping back the other half. This you know you hav done, and I challenge you to publish at your own cost your open letter, as I at my own cost shall publish this. Your malicious act in thus concealing the real nature of the lawsuit between Wetton and myself as rival manufacturers and large employers of labor is an act unworthy of the commonest informer. I hav a deed from the British government wherein, on the settlement of that suit as above referred to, such deed binds my opponents to pay me a large sum of money in settlement thereof. Your attorney, Mr. Tenney or Mr. Colgate, your President, can see that deed whenever they choose to call at my offices. Yet you, in your open letter, attempted to show that I had been guilty of a crime. If this was not vindictiv malice, what was it? Again in the same open letter, you would insinuate that my patent and Edgar Wetton's were the same. Yet you know very well that the circular from which you obtained the name of my patients contains also the following description of my patent:

"During the past few years seven or eight different patents hav been taken out for electric and Magnetic Belts, but the vital defect in each and all of them has been a want of means whereby the magnetism once imparted to them could be retained. This defect has been fully overcome in the 'Wilsonia' invention. William Wilson struck the happy idea of attaching a series of Voltaic Plates to the Magnets, which by absorbing the natural exudations of the skin giv out a constant galvanic current, and thus keep up a continu us supply of Magnetism. Another very important feature of the 'Wilsonia' invention is this. Wearers of these garments never experience unpleasant shocks and are never afflicted with sores, which inevitably result from wearing galvanic chain bands—they having to be steeped in vinegar to render them capable of imparting any curativ property, and in this process they become the mother of an incurable form of erysipelas! And then, the 'Wilsonia' is as comfortable to wear as any undergarment. These appliances keep the body warm in the cold season, and, by their power of absorption, impart, in the summer, a refreshing coolness."

Also the Method of Manufacture.

"Wilsonia" Magnetic Clothing!

These goods are made as explained below, and every person following out the instructions here given can make for themselvs and their own wearing any garments to suit their malady.

Although I hav patented the invention, I giv any one the liberty to make for themselvs, but shall prosecute any one who dares to make them for others to wear, or to sell.

Process of Manufacture.

Take a sheet of cloth, or any woven fabric, lay it upon another sheet of gutta percha tissue, then lay a sheet of muslin corresponding in size; fasten these together. Then take hard steel plates (brittle as glass they need be for our purpose), cut them into narrow strips about one and a half inches long; perforate each plate, making a hole large enough to take in an an ordinary shoe eyelet. These plates to the number of 250, with 500 eyelets, fastened to the cloth, are sufficient to make an ordinary NERVE INVIGORATOR. Over these plates, when fastened to the fabric, we place another sheet of India rubber tissue. Over this again we place another sheet of muslin and fasten the whole mass together with hot irons. We then puncture the eyelets the whole thickness of the fabric so fastened together, having about five hundred openings through the garments. Then we cover the whole with a lining of any material to suit the fancy of the wearer, but preferably canton flannel should be used. When the garment is so far finished it is magnetized by a powerful electro magnet, until every plate of the whole series is thoroughly saturated with magnetism.

Having described the process as above, I again say that if you make the garments as I direct they will do you just as much good as though I made them myself. But the above being my patent, I shall prosecute any one who dares to make them for profit, and shall use the utmost rigor of the law in so prosecuting.

Now, then, where comes in quackery with with the "WILSONIA?" Why do not the advertisers of quack nostrums tell purchasers how to make their compounds?

Now, as to Prof. White's great discovery: He told us a few weeks ago, through the columns of the New York Herald, that he had made a marvelous discovery, viz., that the whole secret of the electric charge in the Gymnotus, or electric eel, lay wholly in the fact that the said electric eel was enveloped in a film, whereby its electric charge was augmented. This marvelous discovery, he said, was only made after six and three-quarter years of fruitless research, and by an accident, he goes on to say, the whole thing was made complete.

Now it will be seen from reading the above formula, that WILLIAM WILSON'S patent was taken out two and a half years before Professor White made his statement through the columns of the Herald.

It is upon the Gutta Percha Film patented by MR. WILSON, that the secret of the "WILSONIA'S" force wholly lies.

Physicians, electricians, and scientists are, therefore, invited to examine critically into the nature of the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING, and, with the formula before them, go into their laboratories and experiment for themselvs. They will then know that the

WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING

Is the Greatest Wonder of the Age, and yet withal one of the most Simple of Inventions

In the same open letter which you sent to the newspapers you maliciously attempt to belittle me by assuming that, because I had been a cabinetmaker, I could not therefore attain to a knowledge of curativ agencies distinct from the methods laid down by the schools. In answer to this assumption of yours, I can only say that I pity you for your stupidity. Do you not know that the celebrated Dr. John Hunter of London worked at the bench as a cabinetmaker at fort-two years of age, and afterward became the most eminent surgeon in Europe? and to-day the Hunterian Museum in London is a living monument of that cabinetmaker's skill? Do you not also know that all great inventions ever made emanate from among those whom we least suspect as the originators of new thought?

Another important reference in your open letter I refer to: On a board sign y u say as follows: "Read the Anthony Comstock letters in favor of 'Wilsonia.'" In answer to which I simply say that I hav the copies of fifty-five letters sent to you in favor of my garments, the parties sending such letters being those to whom you had conveyed your libelous communication. Therefore I call these letters of my patients the Anthony Comstock letters, and shall continue to publish them in a pamphlet dedicated to the Young Men's Christian Association of Brooklyn and New York; nor you nor your society shall intimidate me against such publication. Nothing shall be hidden nor held back. In conclusion, I again make the following challenge to you: To sign bonds for $5,000 if you can prove that I do not cure ninety per cent of the incurables given over by the doctors, or to produce one case where all the benefit was was not derived as promised on the purchase of the goods, such goods being worn as directed as to quantity and to time. I believe your society requires money to carry on its operations; here therefore is a chance to add to its funds. I will also sign bonds for a like sum if you can show one testimonial published by me that was not genuin, and will pay all expenses of the six physicians on whom you relied, and will meet them singly or as a body on any platform in the United States, and prove to an audience of scientists that these physicians know nothing of the nature of nerve fluid, the constitution of the blood, nor the difference between electricity and magnetism as a curativ agent. WILLIAM WILSON.

Having thus openly answered your letter, and wishing the whole thing to be closed up, I herewith make you this offer, viz: That you shall, upon the examination of the deeds referred to in my letter as above, between your attorney and Mr. Colgate, upon the conclusion of such investigation, giv me a letter of apology for having been instrumental in casting discredit upon my invention. I am quite willing to accept your plea of ignorance of the facts, and that you were deceived by others.

Upon receipt of such letter of apology, I will withdraw all further proceedings. WILLIAM WILSON.

Important to the Suffering and Afflicted Who Hav Been Deceived by Advertising Nostrum Venders.

The great success attending the introduction of my world-famed WILSONIA GARMENTS has incited a host of speculators to place upon the market several bogus arrangements under the specious titles of "Magnetic Clothing" or "Magnetic Garments." One unprincipled person has actually copied my engraving representing my clothing, so that a person not seeing the garments would take it for granted that the goods so advertised were facsimiles of the WILSONIA, the engravings representing the clothing being identical with those issued by myself thus tending to defraud the public by their purchasing a worthless article for the cure of some malady or other. This same person has copied, almost verbatim, the language of my own circulars. One of these garments was brought me direct from the vender. I find it to be a clumsy imitation of the first magnetic garments made in Europe some fifteen years ago. I would therefore ask the public to see the Wilsonia garments before purchasing anything represented as a magnetic clothing. They will then find that an attempt at imitation has been made by an engraved circular containing copies of my own circular as above stated, and so cunningly has the device been carried out that parties purchasing the goods from such circular will suppose that the garments so purchased were identical with my own, but when seen together they are as different as anything can possibly be conceived. If, however, persons will call at any of our STORES in New York or Brooklyn, or elsewhere in the United States where Wilsonia depots are opened, they may hav everything made clear to them. The claim of CHEAPNESS is a poor point to put forward when the matter of disease and life and death is in the balance. My reputation now is so unparalleled that never before in the history of the world hav such remarkable cures been effected as those following the timely use of the now world-renowned Wilsonia garments. The blind hav been made to see, the deaf to hear, the helpless paralytic to walk erect, the demented to become sane, the martyr to catarrh and asthma to speak and breathe freely, the terrified with heart disease to walk forward among the public without the terror of impending death. All and every form of disease disappear when the Wilsonia Magnetic Garments are directed. I will undertake to cure 90 per cent of the so-called incurables now in the hospitals in the United States, and will place my garments upon such patients free of charge, the only condition I make being that the authorities governing such hospitals shall not allow any medicine to be given the patients during the wearing of my garments, and that the cures shall be publicly advertised as soon as made. CITIZENS OF AMERICA! when and where in the history of the world has such an offer as this been made? Here, in New York and Brooklyn alone, there are thousands of poor invalids in our hospitals passing through the ordeal of a protracted and living death who might, if my offer be accepted, be restored to the world as useful members of society, and this free of charge. If my offer be not accepted by the physicians of the hospitals, then the physicians must stand convicted of indifference and carelessness toward the poor invalids intrusted to their care. I hav sold my patent to a company with a view of manufacturing on a very large scale, so that with increased facilities in the form of valuable machinery specially prepared for our purposes, we shall be able to place upon the market an unlimited supply of these wonderfully curativ appliances.

After years of study in the particular direction of electrical therapeutics, I hav from time to time made many improvements on my first conception of what was needed for the relief and cure of disease until the "Wilsonia" in its present form contains all the elements of what has gone before in the same direction. The continuity of current is made complete, the dangers of over-ventilation are entirely overcome. This is an important point in the "Wilsonia." Thousands of persons are to-day suffering from the effects of retarded perspiration, having had thrown back into the organism the poisonous emanations of the body. The expensiv nature of the "Wilsonia" combination in all its entirety makes the price somewhat high, but yet it is far the cheapest in the end, inasmuch as the curativ force will continue for years although a commoner kind will frequently result in marvelous cures. These commoner goods we sell at the following prices:

"DESIGN" IN NATURE.

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

Gems of Thought.

OLD theology is doomed, but she will struggle long in her death-throes, and thousands will continue to marshal themselvs in her ranks, determined to save her at any risk. But ever the truth comes uppermost, and in the end error must yield. So let us gird on our armor for right and justice, and each do our level best to hasten the glad day when

> "Superstition bows her head,
> Falsehood sleeps among the dead,
> And bigotry's exulting tread
> Will ne'er be heard."
> —Elmina Drake Slenker.

THE continually progressiv change to which the meaning of words is subject, the want of a universal language, which renders translation necessary, the errors to which translations are again subject, the mistakes of copyists and printers, together with the possibility of wilful alteration, are of themselvs evidences that the human language, whether in speech or in print, cannot be the vehicle of "the word of God." The word of God exists in something else.—Paine's Age of Reason.

THERE are those who are very assiduous in reading, and yet do not much advance their knowledge by it. They are delighted with the stories that are told, and perhaps can tell them again, for they make all they read nothing but history to themselvs; but not reflecting on it, nor making to themselvs observations from what they read, they are very little improved by all that crowd of particulars that either pass through or lodge themselvs in their understandings. They dream on in a constant course of reading and cramming themselvs; but not digesting anything, it produces nothing but a heap of crude lies.—Locke's Conduct of the Understanding.

IT is important to remember that, in strictness, there is no such thing as an uneducated man. Take an extreme case. Suppose that an adult man, in the full vigor of his faculties, could be suddenly placed in the world, as Adam is said to hav been, and then left to do as he best might. How long would he be left uneducated? Not five minutes. Nature would begin to teach him through the eye, the ear, the touch, the properties of objects. Pain and pleasure would be at his elbow telling him to do this and avoid that; and by slow degrees the man would receive an education which, if narrow, would be thorough, real, and adequate to his circumstances, though there would be no extras and very few accomplishments.—Huxley.

COULD I begin my existence again, and, what is equally impossible, could I see before me all I hav seen, I would choose few acquaintances, fewer friendships, and no familiarities.—W. S. Lander.

WE may rely upon it that as long as we look upon an Atheistical writer as a moral offender, or even as long as we glance at him with suspicion, Atheism will remain a standing and a permanent danger, because, skulking in hidden corners, it will use stratagems which their secrecy will prevent us from baffling; it will practice artifices to which the persecuted are forced to resort; it will number its concealed proselytes to an extent of which only they who hav studied the painful subject are aware; and, above all, by enabling them to complain of the treatment to which they are exposed, it will incite the sympathy of many high and generous natures who, in an open and manly warfare, might strive against them, but who, by a noble instinct, find themselvs incapable of contending with any sect which is oppressed, maligned, and intimidated.—Buckle's Essays.

THERE is no more certain sign of a narrow mind, of stupidity, and of arrogance, than to stand aloof from those who think differently from ourselvs. If they hav weighed the matter in dispute as carefully, it is equitable to suppose that they hav the same chance as we hav to be in the right; if they hav not, we may as reasonably be out of humor with our footman or coachman; he is more ignorant and more careless of it still.—W. S. Lander.

SUCCESSIV generations, the purest and the most gifted of the race, hav sought to peer into the great unknown and tell its secrets, but in vain. How crude, absurd, ridiculous, seem to us now many of the theories of the life to come which they hav formed, and which, it may be, hav held no very limited sway over the minds of men! Even the last desperate attempt of the popular mind to penetrate the awful veil and make familiar to us the things that are hidden beyond it has ended in failure. Modern Spiritualism has revealed to us no new truth. It has given us nothing which we did not know before.—Rev. A. P. Putnam's Life to Come.

THE penalty nature makes us pay for hardness is dullness. If we are hard, our life becomes dull and dismal.—Matthew Arnold.

WHERE is the teacher who has not felt, at least, if not said, No man cometh to the father except through me?—Froude's Nemesis of Faith.

ALTHOUGH Epicurus laid down the doctrin that pleasure is the chief good, the life that he and his friends led was one of the greatest temperance and simplicity. They were content, we are told, with a small cup of light wine, and all the rest of their drink was water. An inscription over the garden gate promised to those who wished to enter in no better fare than barley-cakes and water. The charity of Epicurus was so incontestable that his opponents, in order to deprive him of all merit on the score of it, ascribed it to his being without passions. The calumnies which the Stoics circulated concerning him are unworthy of notice, and were at no time generally believed. The success of Epicurus as a teacher was signal; great numbers flocked to his school from all parts of Greece and from Asia Minor, most of whom became warmly attached to their master, as well as to his doctrins, for Epicurus seems to hav been characterized not less by amiability and benevolence than by force of intellect.—Chambers's Encyclopedia.

Odds and Ends.

"YES, Job suffered some," said an Illinois deacon, "but he never knew what it was to hav his team run away and kill his wife right in the busy season, when hired girls want three dollars a week."

A WORD to the wise is sufficient. A minister made an interminable call upon a lady of his acquaintance. Her little daughter who was present grew weary of his conversation, and whispered in an audible tone, "Didn't he bring his amen with him?"

THAT was a good, though a rather irreverent pun which was made by an Edinburgh student when he asked, "Why is Prof. —— the great revivalist of the age?" and, on all giving it up, said, 'Because at the end of each sermon there is a great awakening."

WHEN Anna Dickinson, as Hamlet, stoops to pluck a posy from the grave of Ophelia, and her back suspender buttons snap off, it will be worth the price of admission to see her grab the waistband of her trousers and ram the fingers of her other hand into her mouth in search of pins.

BIBLICAL lore: "Who was Lot's wife?" "The pillar of salt that Jacob lay his head on after he came down from Mount Sinai to offer up his son Isaac because his strength lay in his hair after fasting forty days and nights in the belly of a whale according to the scriptures."

"YES, I always make a practice of sending some poor family a Thanksgiving turkey," he was saying to the grocer, "and shall want an extra one this week. Yes, I must make at least one soul happy."

"Ah, heaven bless you!" called out a man who had been asking the price of onions, "you are the man who sent me that turkey last year."

"Is that so? You were living on —— street?"

"I was, and I was laid up with a lame foot and my wife was nearly dead with the chills."

"Well, I'm glad to meet you. I told the coachman to giv the bird to some deserving person, and I'm glad you were made happy."

"And I shall never forget you, sir. I put that turkey up at a raffle, raked in $3 on him, and, outside of a pint of whisky for my wife, I laid in enough of tobacco to last me six weeks. May you never know what it is to be poor!"—Detroit Free Press.

FARMING IN DAKOTA.

"Yes, sir," resumed the Dakota man, as the crowd of agriculturists drew back from the bar and seated themselvs at a little table. "Yes, sir, we do things on rather a sizeable scale. I've seen a man on one of our big farms start out in the spring and plow a straight furrow till fall, then turn around and harvest back."

"Carry his grub with him?" asked a Brooklyn farmer who raises cabbages on the outskirts.

"No, sir. They follow him up with a steam hotel, and hav relays of men to change plows for him. We hav some big farms up there, gentlemen. A friend of mine owned one on which he had to giv a mortgage, and I pledge you my word the mortgage was due on one end before they could get it recorded on the other. You see it was laid off in counties."

There was a murmur of astonishment, and the Dakota man continued:

"I got a letter from a man who livs in my orchard, just before I left home, and it had been three weeks getting to my dwelling house, though it traveled night and day."

"Districts are pretty wide up there, ain't they?" asked a New Utrecht agriculturist.

"Reasonably, reasonably," replied the Dakota man. "And the worst of it is, it breaks up families so. Two years ago I saw a whole family prostrated with grief. Women yelling, children howling, and dogs barking. One man had his camp packed on seven four-mule teams and was around bidding everybody good-bye."

"Where was he going?" asked a Gravesend man.

"He was going half-way across his farm to feed the pigs," replied the Dakota man.

"Did he ever get back to his family?"

"It isn't time for him yet," returned the Dakota gentleman. "Up there we send young married couples to milk the cows and their children bring home the milk."

"I understand you hav fine mines up that way," ventured a Jamaica turnip-planter.

"Yes, but we only use the quartz for fencing," said the Dakota man, trying the edge of his knife with his thumb preparatory to whetting it on his boot-leg. "It wouldn't pay to crush it, because we can make more money on wheat. I put 8,900 townships in wheat last fall."

"How many acres would that be?"

"We don't count by acres. We count by town ships and counties. My yield was $68,000,000 worth on wheat alone, and I'm thinking of breaking up from eighty to a hundred more counties next season!"

"How do you get the help for such extensiv operations?" queried the New Utrecht man.

"Oh, labor is cheap," replied the Dakota man. "You can get all you want at from $29 to $47 a day—in fact, I never paid over $38."

"Is land cheap?"

"No, land is high. Not that it costs anything, for it don't; but under the laws of the state you have got to take so much or none. I was in luck. Had a friend at Yankton who got a bill through the Legislature allowing me to take 420,000 square miles, which is the smallest farm out there, though it is——"

"Look here," said the bartender, as the Eastern husbandmen strolled out in a bunch to consider the last statement. "Is all this thing you've been telling true?"

"Certainly," responded the Western veteran. "At least, it is a modification of what I saw in a Dakota paper that was wrapped around a pair of shoes last night. I didn't dare to put it as strong as the paper did, for no one would hav believed me. You can just slate that last round of drinks and I'll pay in the morning. I liv right on Myrtle avenue."

LIBERAL HOMES
AND A
LIBERAL MAGAZINE.

The Liberal is a monthly magazine published by G. H. Walser at Liberal, Mo., at the low price of fifty cents a year. This magazine is issued in the interest of true Liberalism and givs full and accurate information concerning the town and colony of Liberal—founded for Liberals and Spiritualists, where they can enjoy the full fruition of universal mental liberty. The town is growing rapidly. It has no preacher, no church, no drunkenness, no saloon, no God, no Christ, no hell, no devil. But peace, civility, truth, happiness, and sobriety reigns supreme among the people. Address G H. WALSER, Liberal, Mo. tf

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.
A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.
Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.
Spermatorrhea and Impotency,
as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an
EXTERNAL APPLICATION,
which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylume, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.
SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.
Middle-Aged and Old Men.
There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.
☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.
PRIVATE COUNSELOR.
Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, his system based upon scientific fact."

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.
BY JAMES PARTON.
With Portraits and other Illustrations.
This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.
Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.
In two vols. 8vo. Price, $6; half calf, $11.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Jews' Free School, London, is attended by 2,293 children, and is the largest elementary school in England.

CHARLES BECKER, the forger, convicted of counterfeiting one thousand franc notes on the bank of France, has been sentenced to six years and six months imprisonment.

Two Philadelphia mechanics claim to hav invented a device for running street cars by a series of powerful steel springs. At the end of each trip the car is wound up like a clock.

TOWN COUNCILLOR KELLY arrested, United Ireland suppressed. Parnell very sick in jail, and a farmer who paid his rent shot dead are the latest aspects of the troubles in Ireland.

AN Anti-Polygamy Society exists in Brooklyn, and three thousand "Christian" women hav signed a petition to Congress asking for a speedy abolition of the plural wife system in Utah.

A ST. LOUIS prayer-meeting was broken up by a deputy sheriff, who levied on the church furniture for debt, after allowing "just one more hymn, and one more prayer, if not too long."

WALT WHITMAN praises Emerson as the "truest, sanest, most moral, sweetest literary man on record—unsoiled by pecuniary or any other wrap—ever teaching the law within—ever loyally outcropping his own self only—his own poetic and devout soul."

THE editor of the Index, Agnostic, has had a talk with Mr. Frothingham, and "finds that they stand as near together in their views, sympathies, and hopes as they did when they worked together as president and secretary of the Free Religious Association."

LONDON has a population of four millions and a half. Of this multitude only 60,000 are church members, and only 200,000 are regular attendants at religious services. Of the working population it is stated, on as good authority as the Bishop of Litchfield, that only two per cent are ever found in church.

THE frigate Constitution —"Old Ironsides" —was put out of commission in the Brooklyn Navy Yard last week. She was built in Boston in 1794, at a cost of $300,000. She beat the British frigate Guerriere in 1812, and distinguished herself in various other ways that hav been recorded in song and story.

A BLACK man and white woman at Logansport, Ind., are advertising for a clergyman or a justice who will marry them. The man has money and determination enough to test the constitutionality of the state law against miscegenation, but he cannot find anybody qualified to perform the ceremony who will risk the penalty provided by that law.

IN Kansas there is a little town which bears the name of Liberal. Those who settled this place claim that it is a sort of Eden in its way. They believe that there is no God, no heaven, and no hell. One of their declarations is a travesty of scriptures on this wise, "The fool has said in his heart there is no God; but the wise man knows there is none."—Sun.

Swiss papers are complaining bitterly of the conduct of the French police to Swiss sojourners in France of the poorer sort, whose sole offense appears to be that they are respectable and industrious working people. The police of the republic, they say, are just as arbitrary, as unreasonable, and as ignorant as ever were the police of the empire. While Frenchmen are allowed free entry into Switzerland (in Geneva alone there are twenty thousand of them), and may seek work anywhere without let or hindrance, hardly a day passes that Swiss citizens, whose sole offense is asking for employment, are not summarily arrested, and, without any sort of trial, sent out of the country. Swiss citizens in regular employment are arrested on a simple police order.

SENSITIV church folk at Malvern, Ohio, are scandalized because a portrait of Garfield has been hung behind and above the pulpit of the Disciple church. They think that only a picture of, or relating to, a member of the Trinity should receive such an honor. These are doubtless old-fashioned people who were born before Ohio became incurably affected with the itch for office and began to mistake Washington for paradise.

JUGGERNAUT is triumphant in India after the troublesome times vexed his adherents. A set of discontented Hindoos tried to burn his temple, just to see what would come of it. The attempt proved a failure, and Juggernaut is now considered a fire-proof deity even by the very disturbers of the peace who attempted to wreck him. The great idol of Juggernaut in this temple is an old-fashioned one, made of wood, and therefore the incendiary radicals thought it would be an easy prey to the flames.

AN examination of the delta of the Mississippi shows that for a distance of about three hundred miles of this deposit, there are buried forests of large trees, one over the other, with interspaces of sand. Ten distinct forest growths of this nature hav been observed, which must hav succeeded one another. These trees are the bald cypress of the Southern states. Some hav been observed over twenty-five feet in diameter, and one contained 5,700 annual rings. In some instances, too, these large trees hav grown over the stumps of others equally large. From these facts geologists hav assumed the antiquity of each forest growth at ten thousand years, or one hundred thousand for the whole. This estimate, however, would not include the interval of time—which doubtless was very considerable—that elapsed between the ending of one of these vast and wonderful forests and the beginning of another.

THERE is trouble in a Stonington (Conn) public school between Protestants and Catholics. A few days ago a Catholic pupil, a boy, refused to bow his head while the teacher, a lady, conducted Protestant religious exercises. She called the boy to her desk after the services and whipped him. The boy continued to disobey the rule on subsequent mornings and the teacher called in a committee man, and he whipped the boy severely. The parents withdrew their child from the school and are preparing to bring a suit against the teacher and committee man. They propose to hav the question of compulsory observance of Protestant religious rites in the public schools thoroughly tested. They hav secured the legal services of the Hon. T. M. Waller, of New London, state attorney. The other side are about to retain eminent counsel, and the case will go to the courts. The people of Stonington hav taken sides.

ADVOWSON to be sold of a desirably-situated living in the North. "Net income from tithe over £600. Good house, healthy situation, gravel soil; price low. Prospect of 'immediate possession'—that is, of course, of the imminent death of the present incumbent." This is how souls are weekly vended in the church of England, and the scandal seems to flourish all the more because of the frequently-expressed public condemnation it has received. The Curate's Alliance ought to endeavor to bleed these "desirable livings" of a couple of hundred of the pounds which are drawn from the pockets of the farmers. £400 per annum is quite enough recompense for the services of a country parson, and there is no reason in life why the holder of a cure of souls should be in a position to vie with the neighboring gentry, or to show forth to all men how vastly superior is his lot to that of the first ministers of the Christian church.—London Secular Review.

PROF. W. DAWSON writes to the Indianapolis Journal under the date of Dec. 5th, as follows: "Jupiter is the bright star in the east. It rises about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, some distance north of east, and souths, or crosses the meridian, at 10 P.M. It sets northwest at 5 o'clock in the morning. Its position is excellent for observation. A small spy-glass will show its four moons. The fine white star several degrees southwest of Jupiter is Saturn. It comes to the meridian at 9:16 P.M., a little south of where Jupiter crosses, and sets about 4 o'clock next morning. Mars rises a little before 7 A.M. away in the northeast. It is a bright red star always noted for its fiery appearance. It slowly ascends the eastern sky and crosses the meridian high up, nearly overhead, about 2 o'clock next morning. It sets in the northwest about seven and a half hours later. Uranus rises about midnight, nearly east; souths about 6 A.M., and sets soon after noon next day. It is very small, but is just visible to the naked eye and not of much interest without a telescope. Neptune is a few degrees nearly east of Saturn, but quite invisible without a glass. Venus and Mercury are morning stars, and near together southeasterly about daylight. They rise about 5:30 and south about 10:40. Venus is quite bright, and may be seen on the meridian with a good spy-glass. Mercury is two degrees east of Venus, and may still be seen with naked eye about daybreak or soon after, but it will disappear in a few days."

GEN. SHERMAN has been attending the Atlanta Exposition. He wept the other day, after hearing "Marching Through Georgia" played at a banquet. His neighbor, Gen. Grant, asked him, "Wherefore dost thou weep?" The General answered: "I never was so all-fired sorry that I marched through Georgia as I hav been in the last five years. Georgia be darned. The people are good enough, but I'm listening to that tune for the 3,465,857th time. How would you like, Ulysses," he continued, "to hear that infernal melody over three million times? They hav played it to me from Maine to Texas, and from Florida to Toronto," and here he wept afresh. But Gen. Grant quietly patted the hero on the shoulder, and said: "Sherman, it is only one of the pentalties of greatness. I suffer worse than you do—I've had seven million cigars given me because people think I like to smoke, 824 bull pups, and more horses than I can count. Sherman,' continued the General, "whenever I see a horse, a cigar, or bull pup I feel just as badly as you do, but I never giv way to my feelings. I —I sell 'em." "Yes," answered Sherman between his sobs, "you can sell cigars, bull pups, and horses, but I can't sell that d—d tune for five cents."

A CORRESPONDENT of the N. Y. Times writes: "A member of the order of religious 'cranks' has just arrived in this city, and is endeavoring to create some excitement here. He is singularly reticent in regard to his name and place of residence. He came here from Saugerties, but says he has no abiding-place which he calls home. He trusts to the Lord for that. He has a special mission direct from God, he says, and he is trying to secure a place in which to lecture, when he will proclaim it to the people. He is a man about sixty years of age, of good address, courteous, and well dressed, although his beaver hat is of a somewhat antique model. He has already called upon several leading citizens here, among them two or three clergymen, whom he sought to enlist in his work. He claims to hav a special message from the deity to the wicked people of Kingston, and he says it is awfully solemn and particularly severe in its nature. But, being commissioned to deliver it, he cannot help its character or import. The Lord had sent him to Texas a short time ago on a similar errand, and, although robbed on his journey thither, he went right on and delivered the message. He claims now to be sent here. He likens himself to Moses, and says he is not gifted with eloquence, which makes his mission all the more terrible to perform. The subject of his revelation appears to be in connection with divine providence, or God's power on earth. He has written a voluminous chapter of his life, which he tries to read to persons on whom he calls. But so far he has met with but little success here, and nobody seems impressed with the solemnity of his mission."

ABOUT the only fresh feature in the Guiteau case is the prisoner's increasing contumacy and general disorderly conduct. He has nearly given up the hope of proving himself to be insane, but sticks closer than ever to the theory that he was under a divine pressure which he found it impossible to resist. Experts on the subject of insanity hav testified both ways in regard to the prisoner's mental condition. The impression of a majority of those who hav attended the trial is that if the case were given to the jury immediately a verdict of wilful murder would be returned. The prosecution is conducted in a by no means able manner, but the prisoner, by his own acuteness, appears to be convicting himself.

A Truth Seeker Around the World.

To Constantinople, and Six Days There.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Sunday, Oct. 30, 1881.

KIND FRIENDS: I have been here in the city of the Sultan two days. We rode from Athens to Piræus after the shades of evening had set in, when the day was changing into night, and by the time we reached the wharf it was dark. The harbor was calm, however, and the boats took us very quietly to the Austrian Lloyd steamer Saturno, which seems the counterpart of the Ceres, on which we came to Athens. All the steamers in the line have been named after the old Grecian divinities. It will be seen we have been promoted—first we had the Ceres, who was a very fair sort of a goddess, but Saturn was the father of the gods.

Owing to the amount of freight to be taken off, and the slow way of doing it, the steamer did not leave the harbor of Piræus until 3:25 A M. When daylight came we were well out in the Ægean Sea, or the Grecian Archipelago. We passed several islands noted in ancient Grecian story. On Cape Sunium, which we passed soon after sunrise, we saw the ruins of an ancient temple of Apollo, a few of the columns still standing. Later on we passed Keas, and then between the islands of Eubœa on the left and Andros on the right, with Zinos further away. These islands are only piles of volcanic rocks thrown up by some terrible upheaval of the earth, which, perhaps, occurred a hundred thousand years ago or more, and have the same naked and barren appearance of the islands and mainland before described. In some places we saw a stunted growth of shrubbery, and once or twice a small, partially level plateau where a small number of houses were erected, showing that a few people lived there; but for the most part there were no signs of life of any kind. Still, with the beautiful sky and the soft tints which seemed to hover about the rocky eminences, a picturesqueness and charm were everywhere present; but were those islands more gently sloping and covered with a fine soil and luxuriant vegetation the scenery would be infinitely more pleasant. The day was most lovely, the waters smooth, and everything agreeable. In the afternoon we passed in good view of the island of Chio, where the terrible earthquake occurred a few months ago, when a city was thrown down and a large number of people were killed.

Off pretty far to the left we passed the mouth of the Bay of Salonica. On its shores is Mount Olympus and the Vale of Tempe. Here the old Greek gods were supposed to live and perform their godly exploits. Upon the summit of Olympus (Ilapus) is said to be a Druidic temple. Salonica (Thessalonica) is the place where Paul lived for some time and preached in the market-place to the people living there. To the people living here the epistles to the Thessalonians were addressed. The inhabitants are largely Jews, the descendants of those who were so cruelly expelled from Spain by the Christian rulers, Ferdinand and Isabella. Torquemada, the inquisitor-general of the church, was a zealous champion of Christianity; he suppressed heresy and freedom of opinion in Spain, but he nearly suppressed the life of Spain in the process. Byron said: "Cervante's smiled Spain's chivalry away, but Torquemada terrorized her into such a state that she has never recovered her courage." Alphonso, the present king of Spain, invites the Jews back, with their capital and keen commercial energy; but he will probably have to invite them several times before he gets them back there. They are not likely to go to a country which was such a deadly enemy to them and where there is so little thrift and no more chances for money-making. Salonica belongs to Turkey.

Here in Salonica there is evidently a great amount of religion, and a liberal share of Sundays are kept. Friday is the day kept by the followers of Mohammed, and the custom house and all government business stop on that day. Saturday, of course, is the Jewish Sabbath; and as the Jews are the bankers and the principal business men, very little commercial or banking business is attended to on that day. Sunday, of course, is kept by the Christians, and consuls, etc., close their offices, and ships do not work on that day. Monday is the Greek's day; but as they are getting to keep the Christian Sunday, it is not generally observed. If they only had a few more nationalities they might have some to hold every day in the week as Sabbath. All the days are regarded as holy days by portion of the human race. Thus, Monday is Greek's day; Tuesday, the Persian's; Wednesday the Assyrian's; Thursday the Egyptian's; Friday the Mohammedan's; Saturday the Jew's, and the seventh day Baptist's. Here at Salonica the Jews are said to labor as boatmen and longshoremen, which is hardly the case anywhere else in the world. There are some ruins here. The Bomas, built by Alexander the Great in memory of Hephestion, whom he killed in a drunken spree, is now a mosque. It is claimed that its walls are over thirty feet thick. The Toxon, a memorial arch erected to commemorate the fall of Troy, still stands. It is beautifully carved with figures of Achilles, Ulysses, etc., in relief. It is said when the inhabitants are asked when and by whom these were built, about all they can say is, "It is ten thousand years old;" yet they believe, as many other ill-informed people do, that it is hardly six thousand years since the world was spoken out of nothing. The market-place, where Paul preached, is said to be still in use.

After Abdul Aziz had been to Paris and seen what a beautiful city it is, he thought he would remodel Salonica and make it equal to Paris. He ordered the streets to be made wide, and the fronts of the houses had to be taken away at the expense of the owners. This, in many instances, only left the rear wall standing. The people objected, but the Sultan ordered it, and it had to be done. Here the massive gates are closed every night, and armed sentinels posted, but by going but a short distance to the right or to the left one may walk into the city without obstruction. A great deal of statuary has been taken from this place by Christian plunderers.

Not far to the east is Mount Athos, with its famous monastery, where no woman or female animal of any kind is said to step her foot. The monks are so holy it would not answer for them to be polluted by anything belonging to the female sex. It is said, however, that bedbugs are there in large force of both sexes, and that they propagate exceedingly fast. These monks have some very astonishing relics. They claim to have identical feathers which came from the angel Gabriel's wings at the time he visited the Virgin and told her about her being overshadowed by Yahweh, or the Holy Ghost. In this locality it is to be seen that the Greek church retains much of the Diana, or moon-worship, as the Romish church retains in its worship heroes, demi-gods, and deified men under the name of saints. The old Druidic myths form the warp and woof not only of the Grecian mythology, but of the whole Christian system.

About half way between Mount Athos and the Hellespont is the island of Lemnos with its high mountain rocks. Its area is one hundred and fifty square miles. The most ancient inhabitants, according to Homer, were the Thracian Sinties, or robbers. When the Argonauts landed at Lemnos they are said to have found it inhabited only by women who had murdered all their husbands. It is also said some of the Argonauts settled there and became by the Lemnian women the fathers of the Minyæ, the later inhabitants of the island. These Minyæ are said to have been driven out by the Pelasgians even as the Pelasgians had been expelled from Attica. It is also claimed that the Pelasgians carried away from Attica some of the Athenian women; but as the children of these women despised their half-brothers, born of Pelasgian women, the Pelasgians murdered both them and their children. In consequence of these horrors, Lemnian deeds became a proverb in Greece for all atrocious acts. According to Pliny, Lemnos had a famous labyrinth of one hundred and fifty columns, of which but little trace has been found in modern times, but if excavations could be made there it is thought the ruins will be found. There are about thirty thousand inhabitants on the island, mostly Greeks. The whole island is said to bear the strongest proofs of powerful volcanic actions, which may account for its legendary connection with Hephæstus, or Vulcan, who, when precipitated from heaven, was said to have fallen on its hospitable shores.

On the right we come in sight of the island of Mitylene, which is famous in ancient history, taking its share in the wars so common in this part of the world. It has four or five moderate-sized towns with a joint population of forty thousand Greeks and Turks. There were formerly sixty thousand people on the island, but since the Greek revolution its population has been diminished. On March, 1867, Mitylene was visited by a very severe earthquake, which almost entirely destroyed the town of Castro, and injured every town on the island. It is computed that two thousand persons perished by the catastrophe, and the survivors suffered severely for want of food. The town has since been rebuilt.

It was nearly midnight before we reached the Hellespont, otherwise called the Dardanelles, the comparatively narrow passage or strait connecting the Ægean Sea with the Sea of Mamora, at the mouth of which Leander in olden times swam across to see his lady love, Hero. The same feat was performed in modern times by Byron in seventy minutes. The distance is said to be a mile and three-quarters. Here Europe and Asia come very nearly together, and the strait is strongly fortified and manned, with a great number of Krupp guns. It is said to be one of the best fortified places in the world. Near here, on the Asiatic side, is the town Dardanelles, or, as it is more generally called, Chanak-kalesi, a town of two thousand houses, inhabited by both Turks and Jews. The locality is said to be productive in olives, figs, etc.

At the mouth of the entrance of this narrow passage between the two seas, on the Asiatic side, is the famous Plain of Troy, where stood the city of the same name, so celebrated for the war caused by the beautiful Helen. There has been much dispute by the various authorities who have written upon the subject as to the place where the city of Troy stood, some three or four places being claimed as the site, but Dr. Schliemann has pretty thoroughly set the question at rest by his excavations at a point, the present name of which is Hissarlik. He began his excavations in 1870, and continued them amid great difficulties and opposition for nearly four years, and entirely at his own expense. He found an accumulation of rubbish and ruins on the top of the hill no less than fifty-two feet in thickness. Through this he dug down to the native rock, laying bare four successive strata of remains, each representing a distinct city, which had been erected successively on the same site. Of these strata Mr. Smith remarks in his introduction to Schliemann's works: "First Homer recognizes a city which preceded the Ilium of Priam, and which had been destroyed by Hercules; and Schliemann found a primeval city of considerable civilization on the native rock below the ruins, which he regards as the Homeric Troy. Tradition speaks of a Phrygian population, of which the Trojans were a branch, as having apparently displaced and driven over into Europe the kindred Pelasgians. Above the second (Trojan) stratum are the remains of a third city, which, in the type and pattern of its terra-cottas, instruments, and ornaments, shows a close resemblance to the second, and the link of connection is riveted by the inscriptions in the same character in both strata. And so in the Homeric poems, every reader is struck with the common bonds of genealogy and language, traditions and mutual intercourse, religion and manners, between the Greeks who assail Troy and the Trojans who defend it. If the legend of the Trojan war preserves the tradition of a real conquest of the city by a kindred race, the very nature of the case forbids us to accept literally the story that the conquerers simply sailed away again. It is far more reasonable to regard that ten years of the war and the ten years of the return of the chiefs as cycles of ethnic struggles, the details of which have been sublimed into poetical traditions! The fact that Schliemann traces in the third stratum a civilization lower than in the second is an objection only from the point of view of our classical prepossessions. There are not wanting indications in Homer that the Trojans were more civilized and wealthy than the Greeks, and in the much earlier age, to which the conflict (if real at all) must have belonged, we may be sure that the Asiatic people had over their European kindred an advantage which we may venture to symbolize by the golden arms of Glaucus, and the brazen arms of Diomed. Xanthus, the oldest historian of Lydia, perceives the tradition of a reflum migration of Phrygians from Europe into Asia, after the Trojan war, and says that they conquered Troy and settled in its territory. The migration is ascribed to the presence of the barbaric Thracians; and the fourth stratum, with the traces of merely wooden buildings and other marks of a lower stage of civilization, corresponds to that conquest of the Troad by the same barbarian Thracians, the tradition of which is preserved by Herodotus and other writers."

Schliemann considers that the first settlement on Hissarlik was of the longest duration, as its ruins cover the rock to a hight of from fifteen to twenty feet. Its houses and walls were built of stone, joined with earth. The vessels and other objects of terra-cotta found among the ruins were of a quality superior to those in the upper strata. In color they are black, red, or brown, ornamented with patterns incised and filled with a white substance. The people, Schliemann supposes, belonged to the Aryan race, as Aryan or Druidic symbols were found on the pottery.

The second settlement was composed, as Schliemann concludes, of the Trojans; and the debris of their city lies from twenty-three to thirty-three feet below the surface. This stratum bears marks of having been exposed to intense heat, consisting largely of the red ashes of wood, which rise from five to ten feet above the town of Ilium, the Scæan gate, and the inclosed wall. They show that the town was destroyed by a fearful conflagration. A farther proof of the action of fire is a stratum of scoriæ of melted lead and copper, from one-fifth to one and one-fifth of an inch thick, extending nearly through the whole hill. Among the debris were found human bones, skeletons, with hamlets, quantities of terra-cotta in fragments, and, most wonderful of all, "The Treasures of Priam." This treasure was discovered by the side of the palace, at a depth of twenty-seven feet, covered with five or six feet of ashes, above which was a post-Trojan wall nineteen feet high. The articles appear to have been packed in a wooden chest, the key of which was found. They consist of vases, bottles, cups and dishes of gold, silver, and electrium, caldrons, and shields of copper; bracelets, rings, chains, and many other ornaments of gold; battle-axes, spear-heads, and daggers of copper, and many other articles, some of which are fused together by fire. The intrinsic value of this treasure is very great, and its archæological value is, of course, much greater.

None of the articles in the treasure contain inscriptions, but inscriptions were found on vases of terra-cotta, seals, and other objects, the purpose of which is unknown. Among the latter are a great number of little disks of pottery, called "whorls" by Schliemann, and supposed to be either household idols or votive offerings. The letters of the inscription resemble to some extent those upon tablets and terra-cottas in Cyprus, and seem to be allied to the ancient Phœnicians, but they have not yet been satisfactorily disciphered.

The third settlement on Hissarlik was by Greeks. The ruins of their city make up a stratum ten feet or more in thickness, containing pottery of a coarser kind than the Trojan, marked with religious symbols; also containing fragments of copper implements and weapons, and musical instruments made of ivory and stone. The architecture was not so massive as the Trojan, the walls being mixed with clay, and also occasionally of sun-dried brick. The debris presented one peculiar feature; it contained immense quantities of small mussel shells, bones, and fish bones.

Schliemann adds, regarding an upper or surface stratum which covers Hissarlik: "When the surface of the hill was about two meters lower than it is now, Ilium was built by a Greek colony, and we have already endeavored so prove that this settlement must have been formed about 700 B. C. From that time we find the remains of Hellenic house-walls of large hewn stones joined without cement. . . . We also meet with great numbers of copper coins of Ilium, of the time of the Roman empire from Augustus to Constans II. and Constantine II., likewise older Ilian coins with the image of Athena and medals of Alexandria Troas. . . . In my three years' excavations I have not found a single medal of a later date than Constantine II. . . . And as there is here not the remotest trace of Byzantine masonry or of Byzantine pottery, it may be regarded as certain that the Ilium of the Greek colony was destroyed toward the middle of the fourth century after Christ, and that no village, much less a town, has ever again been built upon the site." He adds: "To judge from the area of the Ilium of the Greek colony, it may have possessed one hundred thousand inhabitants. It must have been rich, and the plastic art must have attained a high degree of perfection. The site is strewn with fragments of excellent sculptures."

As to the extent of the Troy of Homer, Schliemann says it was confined to the small area of the hill of Hissarlik, and could not therefore have contained more than five thousand inhabitants; but, he adds, it could always raise a considerable army from among its subjects; and as it was rich and powerful it could obtain mercenaries from all quarters. Mr. Smith suggests that Hissarlik contained simply the palace and permanent citadel, while the houses of the great body of citizens were scattered over the surrounding region. Be this as it may, there seems to be good ground for believing that we have here the real site of the Troy of Priam, which Homer has immortalized. According to ancient tradition, Troy was founded by Troas 1462 B.C. He was succeeded by Ilus and by Laomedon, under the latter of whom the walls were built. The fall of Troy, according to the chronology of Herodotus, was in 1270 B.C.; according to the inscription from Parso in 1109, and according to Eratosthenes, in 1184 B.C.—Murray.

I have neglected to say anything of our deck passengers. We had nearly a hundred Turks, Greeks, Armenians, etc., who did not take cabins, but who lay upon their beds on the deck along by the side of the staterooms used by the cabin passengers, and by the side of the dining-room. The women had an awning stretched over them for a shelter, but the men had no shelter over them. They were indeed a motley lot of Turks, Jews, and other nationalities, and wore the most grotesque costumes you can conceive of. The Turks, in part, wear a fez on the head, which is a small skull-cap of felt, just enough to cover the top of the head, looking much like a small earthen flower-pot turned bottom upward, with a tassel fastened on the top. It is of a bright red, and has no rim or brim. Some wear a turban, made of a long piece of light dry-goods wound around the head. The other garments are quite unlike those worn by other Europeans, some, instead of pants, wearing something like a woman's skirt, sewed together at the bottom, with two holes left for the feet to go through. Some are bare-legged, and others wear long stockings. The upper part of the body is clothed in a red shirt, or of some other color, with perhaps a sash worn about the waist. They furnish their own food, and the dishes look quite uninviting, and appear to be compound stews with black bread. They have good, comfortable-looking blankets to lie on, with plenty to cover them. They are of a swarthy complexion, but mainly look stout and healthy. The women are robed in regular Turkish style—consisting of a loose, flowing robe of some light goods, mostly of bright colors. I think the lower limbs are inclosed in a cross between a skirt and a pair of pants, with a loose robe reaching from the head to the heels. They wear no bonnets, but a thin, white handkerchief of large size is wound around the face, covering all save the eyes and nose. Sometimes the robe is put over the top of the head and persistently held over the mouth with the hand. All this gives them no form or comeliness. I have never seen a ghost, but in a dim light these Turkish women look more like what I imagine a ghost to look like than anything else I can think of.

I came near getting into a flirtation with three of those Turkish damsels. Whether they were a traveling harem I cannot say, but they seemed playfully inclined. I was writing in the dining-room in the evening, with my back toward the window where these Turkish women outside were allotted quarters While busily engaged I heard whispering and slight laughing behind me, and, looking round, I saw a pair of dark dreamy eyes in the shadow watching me from outside the window, but they drew back as soon as I looked. I resumed my writing, but when I next looked the eyes were there once more, to be again drawn back. In a short time there were two pairs of eyes, and they did not withdraw when I looked around. The laughing and whispering increased. Soon I saw they had placed a small white parcel in the window, but I did not touch it. Soon, after a little more laughing, they pushed it off on the seat where I was sitting. I picked it up and found it to contain very small sugar crackers. I ate two of them by way of sociability, and was sorry I could not converse with them. That is all there was of it. They soon retired, and so did I.

Passing from the strait some fifty miles in length, we moved into the broad waters of the Sea of Marmora, but were not out of sight of land on either side. The weather being of the most lovely description, the steaming up the sea could not be otherwise than enjoyable. The rugged rocks have disappeared on the northern slope, and as soon as we can get a good sight of the land we see it is adapted to cultivation and that signs or fertility abound. We were all on the lookout for the towers, spires, and minarets of the ancient city of Constantinople, the Byzantium of olden times.

It was nearly one o'clock P. M. before we obtained a full view of the city. Glasses were in requisition, and we were all trying to see as much as possible. The city at a distance presented a beautiful appearance. There is, perhaps, not a grander sight in the world than the approach from the Sea of Marmora to Constantinople on a pleasant day. The large domes of the numerous mosques, the tall, slim, graceful minarets towering up by the side of the mosques, watch-towers in different parts of the city, the large, imposing governmental buildings, the seven towers of the old city wall at the lower point of the city, the bright looking buildings on the ascending ground, interspersed with green trees and shrubbery, giving the town a mixed appearance of city and garden, presented a charming view indeed. It is simply magnificent. What a pity that a closer acquaintance does not bear out the favorable opinion which one forms of the city while steaming up by its four miles of frontage, from the seven towers to the Seraglio and the old palace at the mouth of the Golden Horn.

It was but a short time, comparatively, before we entered the Bosphorus and turned into the Golden Horn, which is simply an arm of the sea or of the Bosphorus, forming a commodious and safe harbor, with a compact city built up on both sides. We soon came to anchor, and patiently awaited the examination of the health officers, who have to make their report before any passengers can go ashore. In time this was accomplished, and ourselves and baggage, with the hundred deck passengers, were placed in boats to take us ashore. There are no docks here, and the steamers cast anchor in the lower part of the Golden Horn, and all the passengers and all the freight have to be taken ashore in small boats. The process is a tedious one, and makes one wish the city was supplied with good convenient docks like English or American seaports. The water all around us was filled with boatmen anxious to take passengers and baggage; and such a clamor as they kept up, calling out to those on the steamer, and soliciting their patronage, was almost a curiosity to hear. One would think bedlam had broken loose. Not less than a hundred boats, having each two boatmen on an average, were all around us. There are said to be thirty thousand boats about Constantinople, and from what I have seen since arriving, I am inclined to think the estimate is not very extravagant. Many of them are small, sharp-pointed boats, called caiques, which run swiftly, and upset easily also.

At length, the red tape being duly attended to, we went down the steps at the steamer's side and took two large-sized row-boats, and it was not long before we stood on Turkish soil. The next ordeal was the examination of baggage by custom house officers. This, however, was not severe. The large trunks belonging to Judge Lawson's wife and daughter were slightly examined; also one belonging to one of the ladies of our party; but those of us who had satchels only were not supposed to have much tobacco or contraband goods of any kind, and our baggage was allowed to pass unexamined.

We were here introduced to a new phase of life; from the shores of the Golden Horn we commenced on foot the ascent to our hotel, in the division of Constantinople called Pera, situated on the east side of the Golden Horn, and called the Christian portion of the city. Much of it is occupied by Greeks and Armenians, but many Turks are also mixed through it. I fear I will not be able to give you a clear view of the miserable houses, the greasy, dirty inhabitants, the narrow, crooked, and filthy thoroughfares, with no gutters save in the middle of the streets, where all the filthy wash and drainage has to descend, no such thing as underground sewerage being known here. It was Friday, the Mohammedan Sunday, and we were too late to attend the mosque and see the sultan, but we saw many of his subjects, and hard at work, their Sunday though it was. We turned from one narrow street to another, and climbed steep ascents over poor, uneven pavements, passing scores of men filling the position of pack-horses, carrying loads heavy enough for a mule, one bearing on his back a four-bushel basket full of melons and vegetables of other kinds; another a big Saratoga trunk; another a full-sized wardrobe; another a heavy stove; another a large sofa and two easy-chairs; another three or four small trunks and satchels (all our luggage was transported half a mile in that way); another had a bureau, and another a box of merchandise eight feet long by three feet wide and high. I could not think it was filled with hardware, or even books, but I judged it to be hollow glassware, like lamp chimneys. I have since seen these Turkish men carrying paving-stones on their backs—flagging that would weigh at least one hundred and fifty pounds. These carriers or porters have a thick wedge-shaped saddle which rests upon the back, the arms going through shoulder-straps which hold the saddle in its place; when they walk or stand in a stooping position the upper side of the saddle is about level, and it is astonishing to see what loads they carry, how tiers of boxes and almost everything else can be piled upon these saddles, and how the men will walk in a bent attitude, up hill and on level ground, without the goods falling off. When their loads are very bulky they give what sounds like a cry of agony, notifying pedestrians to get out of their way and let them pass. From four to eight of these porters are employed to transport heavy cases and bales of goods. I have seen bales of goods being thus transported so heavy as to make eight men stagger under the weight. In such cases they use poles some fifteen feet in length and thick enough so they will not bend much under the weight.

Everybody walks in the middle of the street, because, there being no sidewalk, there is nowhere else for people to travel. Loaded donkeys and horses also help to make up the motley throng, and they are as heavily loaded accordingly as the men. The queerest loads one ever dreamed of are placed upon the backs of donkeys and mules. Among the commodities so transported may be named firewood in pieces six or eight feet long, charcoal in sacks and baskets, planks and boards fifteen feet long, building-stones of all shapes and sizes, brick, straw, hay, fruits, and vegetables of all kinds. I have seen little donkeys a trifle larger than a pint of cider loaded down with bricks and trudging along without a rein or bridle of any kind, like the steadiest and gravest specimens of animal life. The way of loading these little animals with bricks is to have small ropes pass over the saddle, with loops near the ground; two tiers of the bricks are piled regularly in these loops, one side balancing the other, until they meet on the top of the saddle. Over fifty bricks are thus packed on a single donkey. Lumber and poles are divided, half on one aide and half on the other, thus balancing each other, and when they are very long the ends drag upon the ground. The larger share of the hauling of the city is thus done on the backs of men and donkeys. The streets are roughly paved with roundish stones of uneven size and surface, so that the surfaces are very rough and illy calculated for wheeled carriages; and in many places the hills are so steep that carriages would be impracticable; but up these steep hills the patient men and donkeys carry their heavy loads. The men, when exhausted, sometimes stop, rest their burdens upon some bank or elevated place, and take breath for a few minutes before continuing their ascent.

On our way to our hotel we had to ascend one of these steep, narrow streets, and on each side were the workshops of mechanics and the stores of dealers. The buildings in which these establishments are conducted are sometimes but one story high, and, if higher, the upper stories project into the street till they nearly meet. Carpenters, cabinetmakers, fez makers, basket makers, blacksmiths, coopers, shoemakers, etc., were working in mere holes six or eight feet square, all open in front, so that the entire shop is the same as outdoors. I saw two shoemakers working in packing-boxes placed on end, with the lid removed and the open side toward the street, their shops being just high enough to clear their heads when sitting. I remarked, "Oh, what a shoe shop!" The fez makers were bowing the wool for their little brimless hats right on the floor of their little shops, sitting on their feet during the process. Carpenters and cabinetmakers were also working on the floor, with little appearance of benches, and with a limited supply of tools. The blacksmith shops are not large enough to swing a cat in, and as the smith stands by the side of his forge and anvil there is no room for the customer, and he has to stand in the street. The bake shops are very primitive looking; the oven is in the rear, and the shop is not over ten feet square where the loaves and cakes, in rings and like pretzels, are exhibited. Under such circumstances, and with such surroundings, they do not seem very inviting. An American would have to be very hungry to gain his own consent to eat the black-looking bread from these bakeries. Shops like these are closed for the night in a very primitive manner, some of them by drawing down a heavy curtain and fastening it; some with a rude blind, and others with a sort of door, but none would seem to be very secure. An expert house-breaker could get into the best of them in less than five minutes.

The green grocers and fruit dealers also have their little shops of a similar size and style, sometimes consisting only of a single large basket by the side of the street. There are also an endless number of peripatetic dealers in all kinds of fruits, vegetables, bread, cakes, and numerous other wares, which are carried around in baskets and big trays, and the air is made resonant with their loud and unmusical cries, letting everybody within the distance of a square know what they have to sell. I have since observed that they commence their noise before daylight in the morning and continue it till ten at night; and some of the cries are the most unearthly sounds a poor mortal ever uttered. There is hardly anything, especially in the way of vegetables and fruit, but what these poor human pack-horses carry around on their backs from morning till night, crying them forth almost incessantly. Every street is thus visited, and every family is bound to hear the outcries. I have seen these pedlars packing around four bushels of egg-plant upon their backs, at least four bushels of muskmelons (which appear to now be at their hight), two or three bushels of grapes (which are extremely abundant), or four bushels of onions, pomegranates, watermelons, squashes, tomatoes, potatoes, and all other garden products imaginable.

At length we reached the best hotel in the city, the Hotel de Angleterre, though in appearance it does not begin to compare with the hotel by the same name in Athens. We were, however, glad to find a haven which we might regard as home for a few days. It was 3:30 when we reached the hotel, and found that all our watches—as we had got so far east—were now too slow. We were, however, soon made sad by the information that in consequence of a late arrival of persons connected with the English and Austrian embassies room enough was left for only a part of our company. Judge Lawson and his family, with two Englishmen whose acquaintance we had made on the boat, concluded to remain, while our company proper walked over a square or two further east to the Hotel de Constantinople, where justice requires me to say we have found very good accommodations and a table abundantly supplied with well-cooked viands. Some of the dishes are served up in a style rather too oriental to suit some of our uncultured tastes; but upon the whole the food is very good.

We had an hour or two before dinner to look around the city and see a little of Constantinople life. I took a stroll by myself and ventured on several streets, and in several bazars or large stores, one running back three hundred feet, and having almost every variety of goods for sale, nearly all imported. Turkey manufactures but little. I everywhere found the streets full of pedestrians, and in all the grotesque garbs imaginable. The commoner classes of men have little on but a fez, a rude shirt, and a pair of breeches; the legs are bare below the knees, and of course the feet also. Their legs, being thus exposed constantly to the rays of the sun, become as tanned and brown as an American Indian. Great numbers of these traveling merchants, with their stock of goods upon their backs, are to be met with at all times, on all streets, and with nearly all kinds of portable goods, including dry-goods, notions, etc.

Of course, I met with many Turkish women, with their loose, flowing robes and their white veils, or very light fabrics wound around the head and face, leaving uncovered only the nose and eyes. The goods thus worn are so thin that by getting close to them the features can be discerned. But I have seen very few pretty Turkish women. With the exception of some half a dozen Circassian women, who were pointed out as such, I have not seen a pretty woman wearing the Turkish costume. Their eyes do very well, are generally intensely black, and have a soft, dreamy expression, but the other features are coarse; the nose and mouth are too prominent, the nose is too thick and large, and the complexion has a sort of sickly appearance. The foreheads are low, and in keeping with the general intelligence of the Turkish women. Very few of them are taught to read, and of course their sphere of information is very limited. Their gait is slouching and ungraceful, and their dress unshapely, unattractive, and simply ridiculous. The women, like the men, embrace all shades, from the lightest Circassian to the blackest African, of which latter shade I see many. As the Turkish women have few beauties to hide, I am led to infer that it is their ill-looks they are so careful to conceal.

CONSTANTINOPLE.—VIEW FROM THE PHANAR.

There is one feature of Constantinople which no visitor can fail to observe and be annoyed with, and that is the dogs, which abound in immense numbers, and are seen everywhere. There are said to be in Constantinople—with its suburbs, Pera, Galata, and Scutari, the latter of which is on the south side of the Bosphorus, in Asia—a population of a million and a half of people. I am not aware that any census of the dogs has been taken. It may be that the number of dogs does not equal that of the people, but it cannot fall very far short. Canines infest every street, and from half a dozen to a dozen may be counted in a group as they lie asleep, for they seem to sleep their lives away, lying often in the middle of the street, as well as at the sides; and in walking the distance of a square thirty may be counted. Constantinople might be called dog-heaven were it not for the numerous drawbacks the poor animals are incident to. These Constantinople dogs are the sorriest, dismalest, saddest, the most heart-broken, dejected, and discouraged looking dogs I have ever met with. I wondered if the religion of Mohammed had this sorrowful effect upon them. To say that they are mangy, sickly, sore, poor, half-starved, flea-bitten, and in many cases hairless in places, would only be stating it mildly. They have not life enough to get out of the way, neither does anybody expect them to move, nor have they the least expectation of it themselves. Everybody, including the donkeys, patiently turns aside and lets the dogs continue their repose. When a carriage comes along they make an effort and get out of the way, but that is the only instance. These canines have no owners, save the city, which fathers them all; they are the recognized scavengers and police of the city; they pick up and eat whatever is thrown into the street, including pieces of bread, occasionally a piece of meat, a bunch of grapes, or whatever else good fortune may send them; they are looked to to keep the streets free of garbage and other impurities, but they perform this duty very indifferently. The streets, with all the dogs accomplish, are horribly dirty. Perhaps they do better as policemen at night, for I often heard them barking furiously, as though they had caught a criminal of the first water. They are said to sometimes be severe upon strangers who are out late in the evening. A very peculiar characteristic with these dogs is, while they have no one to look to as master, they apportion themselves over the city, a particular set of dogs occupying only a particular street, or part of the town. A given lot of dogs spend their lives in a given street, and never think of looking about the town and visiting other streets. It is said if an enterprising dog indulges so far in a taste for travel as to venture into a street or quarter where he does not belong, the other dogs jump upon him, and, by their rough treatment, make him soon comprehend that he had better stick to his own quarters. There are very few fine-looking dogs among them; such a wolfish, hyenaish, miserable, hang-dog-looking set of curs I never saw before. On my first walk out in the city I saw one dying by the side of the street, apparently from the effects of strychnine; and had there been a thousand instead of one I could hardly have wept. It is said the Turks are good to the dogs, believing it not right to kill them or abuse them; and occasionally a benevolent Mussulman makes it a religious duty to furnish a certain number of them with a good meal. But notwithstanding this kindness on the part of the Turks, the poor brutes have more sores, scars, and bruises than any set of dogs I ever met. They must often receive rough treatment from somebody. It would be hard to imagine a more prolific place for getting up hydrophobia. Every street ought to furnish several genuine cases.

The beggars of Constantinople are another feature which cannot be ignored. One can hardly walk a rod on any street that he does not meet children or adults who hold out their hands for alms. The children learn to beg from their mother's breast. A mother approached me and begged in the most piteous tones, and her child in her arms, not large enough to walk alone, held out its hand intuitively and attempted to plead for alms. I could not resist that double appeal, and placed a small coin in the child's hand. But it would exhaust the wealth of a Rothschild to give to all the beggars here who ask for money. It seems to be a sort of second nature for the women and children of Constantinople to beg. Whenever they see a stranger they at once go for him, perhaps not so much with the expectation of receiving anything as to act out their irresistible nature. I do not know as it is because I look so much more generous than the others of our party, but I seem to be the one selected by these little urchins to follow after and importune and to be made the victim of their persistency. I often have half a dozen after me at once, and sometimes they will follow me for a quarter of a mile. On the bridge over the horn connecting Pera with Stamboul, or Constantinople proper, is a great place for these little beggars. Thousands pass there, and probably a hundred of these little pests station themselves along on the bridge and ply their arts, their insinuating smiles, and faint "please" to induce some soft-hearted stranger like myself to give them a piaster. Many of them are little girls, and, barring their dark, olive complexion, are right pretty. One especially attracted my attention. She had a very pleasant eye, a sweet smile, and a soft, winning tone in her voice. I wondered if she was a Turk, and asked inquiringly, "You Turk?" She answered, "Arab." So I perceived she was a child of the desert, but she looked so pretty and talked so sweet and followed me so far, though I did not believe she was in a suffering condition, that I could do no less than part with one of my small coins for her benefit.

There are, doubtless, about the usual number of cripples and deformed persons here, but I have not been as fortunate in finding them as Mark Twain was upon his visit here. He describes a woman with three legs, a man with his eye upon his cheek, and another with fingers on his elbow. I have not seen them. They may be away on an autumnal professional tour.

Our first sight-seeing on Saturday morning was to visit the stone tower of Galata, two hundred feet high and forty feet in diameter. It was built by the Genoese before the city was taken by the Turks, nearly five hundred years ago. We climbed up its laborous hight and had from its top a splendid bird's-eye view of the city, the eastern part of the Sea of Marmora, the Golden Horn, the Bosphorus, Stamboul (the Turkish name for Constantinople proper), Galata, Pera, and Scutari, the portion of the city on the south side of the Bosphorus. We could see great numbers of mosques, with their domes and tall, slim, neat-looking minarets shooting heavenward to the tune of one hundred and fifty feet, and painted white. A minaret looks a little like a tall smoke-stack of a manufacturing establishment, only they are slimmer and more graceful in appearance, being made the same size all the way up, save some twenty-five feet at the top, which tapers to a point, often ending with a cross. The muezzins, or Mohammedan town-criers, ascend them by a spiral staircase, and from a place for outlook and outcry they call the faithful to prayers four or five times a day. In this city I think it is four times a day, but in most Mohammedan countries it is five times a day, to wit, at five o'clock in the morning, at twelve o'clock, at two hours before sundown, at sunset, and lastly two hours after the going down of the sun. The morning cry is in Arabic and is thus: "Allah akbar, Allah akbar, La illah il Allah; Mohammed resoul Allah, Allah akbar," which means: "God is great; there is no God but God, and Mohammed is his prophet. Awake, awake, and pray. It is better to pray than sleep. There is but one God, Allah." At noon the call is: "Come to prayer; God is great; the world is wicked. There is but one God and Mohammed is his prophet. Allah is merciful." I have heard some of these calls in a loud chanting or half-singing voice, and have seen men drop on their knees at the sunset call, right when they were at work, and pray for ten or fifteen minutes. They first stand in a solemn attitude, then bow, then kneel and sit back upon their heels, and, bending over, put their faces to the earth or floor, which they kiss, muttering a prayer to Allah in the mean time. Some of the time they sit up straight, and again with their faces to the earth, occasionally rising to their feet and bowing, and then resuming their kneeling position with their feet under them. I fear I would not make a good Mohammedan worshiper—my knees and hips are so stiff that it would be excrutiating to me to place myself in the position they assume and retain it so long. I shall not attempt it. I will try and get along the balance of my life without praying to Allah, Jupiter, Yahweh, or Mumbo Jumbo. There are probably no people in the world more religious than the Mohammedans, or who spend more time in prayer. But they pray only to Allah and believe he is the only one possessing the power to answer prayers. They believe nothing about three gods in one, about a son being older than his mother and as old as his father, or about a Holy Ghost proceeding from both. It is only Christians who have faith enough to believe in such holy absurdities. Mohammedans and Christians, though brothers or cousins in religion, both having the same Jewish deity, both acknowledging the same Abraham the father of the faithful, both acknowledging the divinity of the same Old Testament, differ very widely in the more modern part of their religions. The Mohammedans, however, are the more generous. They grant that Jesus was a good man and a true prophet, but will not admit that he was God, creator of heaven and earth. With them there is but one God and his name is Allah (the first syllable short and the strong accent on the last, with the a broad, as in ah). The Christians, on the contrary, not only deny that Mohammed was a good man, but denounce him as an impostor. If he was an impostor, he was a man smart enough to induce many millions of people to follow him and to have the utmost faith in him. As a man of ability he undoubtedly far outranked Jesus. But although the devotees of the two systems of religion are so nearly allied with respect to the foundations of their creeds, they have always hated each other with the most intense bitterness, and it is hard to say whether the Mohammedans have killed the most Christians or the Christians the most Mohammedans. Taking the wars of the Crusades into consideration, they have each caused the death of many millions of their opponents; they have each shown the most implacable hatred, though it must be admitted that Christians were usually the aggressors. They invaded the Mohammedan territory oftener than the Mohammedans invaded theirs. Both have proved themselves adepts in slaying each other for religion's sake, though Christians have shown themselves the more fond of shedding blood and the more cruel of the two. Mohammedans have seldom or never engaged in killing each other, while Christians not only to this day engage in bloody, internecine wars, but they have put one another to death in cold blood, or inflicted the most cruel tortures the human mind could devise, and all for the religion of Jesus. Although Mohammedanism is some six hundred years younger than Christianity, it has spread itself about as widely over the world; it has about as many adherents, and with all the effort Christianity is making and all the money being spent, Mohammedanism is to-day spreading faster than Christianity. Asia and Europe are rapidly being brought under its influence.

But let me return to the tower. I am liable to digress. I ascended higher up into the pinnacle of the old edifice than any of our company. I climbed a long flight of stairs above the general look-out place, and coming to a door, gave it a shake. A Turk opened it, spoke some unintelligible words, and shook his head. We held an animated conversation for some time, but neither of us knew a word of what the other said. At length I handed him two piasters—about ten cents—which he understood perfectly well. He let me up where he was, gave me the freedom of the establishment, and allowed me to look over the city to my heart's content; he also took me up still another story higher, to the very highest point of the whole affair. I must mention that up on the wall of that tower, nearly two hundred feet above the earth and everything like soil, between the crevices of the stones composing the wall, I saw a fig-tree in a tolerable degree of vigor, and several years old. It was not bearing figs, but I did not get angry with it on that account, and curse it; but probably I was not as fig-hungry as Jesus, when, on a certain occasion, he became enraged at a certain fig-tree because it was not in bearing at the wrong time of the year, and cursed it to death. I simply admired the fondness for life that this elevated fig-tree exhibited, and appreciated its earnest efforts for life under the greatest difficulties. I said, "Go it, little fellow; do the best you can with your hard lot; root, fig, or die!" From this tower, I repeat, the city below, with its tall cypresses, its public buildings, its domes and minarets, and its busy people, looks very interesting; but when we come down and wind around among the narrow, filthy lanes and alleys, stumble over the dogs, and run against the dark, greasy Turks and Arabs, the imaginary thing of beauty takes wings and flies away. The foul odors and the unsightly scenes, however, remain behind.

Our next business was to cross over the bridge spanning the Golden Horn into Stamboul, or Constantinople proper, and visit the world-famed bazars for which Constantinople, like many others of the large Mohammedan cities, is so noted. The crossing of the bridge is of itself a curiosity. Here as many varied forms of humanity are to be seen as at any point in the world. The Turk, the Arab, the Moor, the black African, the Armenian, the Bulgarian, the Greek, the Jew, and undoubtedly representatives of numerous other races, are here hurrying past, clad in their different national costumes and with their different complexions and casts of features. Here the porters are struggling across the bridge, a third of a mile in length, bending under their heavy burdens; here the beggars congregate, paying particular attention to strangers, whom they know in a moment, and showing a pertinacity in their appeals hardly seen elsewhere. On the east, or lower, side of the bridge are the landings for many moderate-sized steamers running up the Bosphorus and across it to Scutari and other points. A continual stream of human life is pouring over the bridge in both directions, imparting to the scene a peculiarly animated appearance.

The first bazar we visited is but a short distance from the Stamboul end of the bridge, and is devoted principally to the drug trade, with a long wing near the upper end for wool. The building is some five hundred feet in length, and is built of stone, in the form of a continuous archway, being some twenty feet or more to the crown, and lighted with small windows in the top or roof. It is by no means elegant, being a plain stone-wall, plastered, and without any decorations. The whole length is divided on both sides into spaces about ten feet wide and the same in depth, with a passageway eight or ten feet wide between them. Each space is occupied by a different firm, and takes the place of a separate store, though there is no partition wall between them. The drugs offered for sale in half-barrels and open tubs and boxes are principally crude articles, among which are prominent sarsaparilla, gentian, ginger, cinnamon, sulphur, anise seed, fenugreek, sunflower, flax, and several other kinds of seeds, with numerous gums and spices. A few of the articles are kept in a powdered state, particularly insect-powder, of which a pretty large quantity seems to be sold. I tried to ask the clerk what it was, and he pantomimed that it was for lice on the head, acting as though he was troubled with them and they were biting. A few chemicals only are kept in these places, which are not the regular apothecary shops, but the places where the crude articles more particularly are sold. The wing for the stocks of wool is about three hundred feet in length, divided off for different dealers in a similar way. A large amount of wool is to be seen here in its crude state.

Passing up a busy, narrow street, lined with shops of various kinds, including bakers, confectioners, tinsmiths, carpenters, and particularly toolmakers, forging formidable looking butcher-knives and claymores, we came to a much more extensive bazar, being not less than a thousand feet in length, with several cross divisions nearly as long. These are divided up into spaces of about the same size as the other, and occupied by a great number of dealers in nearly all sorts of merchandise. Dry goods is a prominent kind of merchandise met with here, and is in a department by itself, from fifty to a hundred different stalls or divisions being devoted to this class of goods. Next come half as many shops for shoes, worked slippers, etc., then jewelry and all kinds of ornaments of gold, silver, etc. Another department is for books in French and Turkey. Another for second-hand goods; another for clothing, males' and females' articles kept by different dealers; while another department is for the sale of fezes, etc. There are several hundreds of these shops and dealers all together, and the salesmen seem to be largely the sons of Abraham, and one perhaps in fifty of them can speak a little English. Characteristic of the race everywhere, they seem very enterprising and disposed to sell. They will even follow you and importune you to call at their place and examine their goods. "Come see my shop," "Let me show you some goods," "I sell you very sheep," meet you on all sides, and it is nearly as hard to get rid of this class of pests as of the beggars. They are extremely anxious to turn their goods into money, and at a very fair profit. They are not, however, confined to one price. They will begin by asking sixteen francs for an article, and rather than have you leave without buying it, they will let you have it for six, which is a "fixed price" with a vengeance. This was Saturday, or the Jews' Sabbath, but I think here in Constantinople they are not remarkably strict in the observance of it, for rather than than let the opportunity pass to make a few francs they keep their bazars open on their holy day, and do their best to cheat such wandering pilgrims as may pass their way. There are from 50,000 to 75,000 Jews in the city, and a large share of the the men are engaged in selling goods, and handsome fortunes many of them have made at the business.

I judge the Turks are fond of high colors, and that much of the calico and other goods is manufactured specially for this market. England doubtless has the largest share of this trade, though I have been told that not a few American manufactures are brought here. Great numbers of the Turkish ladies throng the bazar, and I noticed several of them making purchases. Some are very richly attired, having silk wrappers, or whatever their over-garments may be called, often in brilliant colors and in wide stripes I need not tell you that visiting the bazars is an interesting way in which to spend a few hours, and one can see much to attract his attention. To walk by these hundreds of shops and see the owners and clerks sitting complacently and waiting for customers to come their way, and to watch the thousands of buyers and visitors who go there to trade and to see what is to be seen, is a study that does not often fall under one's observation. Some of us found it so interesting that we made a visit the second time.

In the afternoon we chartered a good-sized boat, and two muscular Greeks rowed us up nearly five miles to the upper end of the Golden Horn. It was a beautiful day, and a beautiful ride. The Horn, as I said, is an arm of the Bosphorus, the water setting up like a river for the five miles or more, when a small stream empties into it, which the natives call "Sweet Water," in contradistinction of the ordinary salt water all around. The Horn—perhaps so called from its slight resemblance in shape to a horn—is a most splendid harbor, the largest vessels being able to go in pretty close to the shore. A tolerably extensive quantity of shipping is to be seen, but not as much as I looked for, and not nearly as much as is seen at New York. The commerce of the city is considerable, but not as great as if a more enterprising people inhabited this splendid country. Here lies the Turkish navy, consisting of several ironclad steamers. They look as though they might be pretty formidable, and doubtless would be if competent engineers could run them and trained and competent seamen could man them. As it is, they are operated by very unskilful crews. There are even no competent engineers to manipulate them. They lie there reposing in the Horn like so much valueless property, save once in a while one of them is brought out to make a show, making, perhaps, a trip of a few miles up the Bosphorus. But the affair is handled so unskilfully that the steamer can scarcely pass through the draw of the bridge without running against one or another of the abutments and doing more or less damage. So much is this expected that when one of the war-steamers is seen preparing to come out, every one on the bridge runs for safety, well knowing that some calamity is about to take place. It is extremely improbable that the Turks will succeed in making their navy, though built by the skilful mechanics of other nations, very injurious to their enemies.

We landed some two miles up and visited a mosque where the sultans are coronated, and which is regarded as too holy to be profanated by the foot of a Christian, as none but Mussulmans are allowed to enter there. We were admitted as far as the door, so we could look in, but could go no further. It has a mosquish appearance, but possesses no special charm. We saw in the vicinity several tombs of distinguished persons, like the wives of sultans and pachas, who have been buried there, with ornamental tombstones erected over them. From this point we walked up through an extensive Turkish cemetery to the top of pretty high ground, where we had another extensive view of the Golden Horn, the city compactly built on both sides of it, the Jewish quarter, the Jewish cemetery in the rear, and much that is beautiful at a distance.

THE Kansas liquor dealers and others opposed to the Sunday law are organizing societies to resist its enforcement. It is said that a fund of $125,000 has been pledged by the League of Freedom with which to resist the law. The president of the league has sent out a large number of circulars giving information to auxiliary leagues in other cities and towns when it is intended to resist the Sunday law.

IF the world doesn't come to an end within a week, Mother Shipton's prophecy will meet with a reverse.

[From Remsburg's Oration on Thomas Paine.]

Impeachment of the Church.

The church—the church alone—is responsible for the obloquy that has been cast upon the memory of Thomas Paine. And let me say to the church, It ill becomes you to point to the moral delinquencies of this man while your own garments are soiled and crimsoned by the vice and crime of centuries.

You claim that amid the thunders of Sinai God gave the Decalog as a moral guide to man. Judged even by this standard, the character of Thomas Paine will not suffer by a comparison with that of yours.

"Thou shalt have no other gods before me." "I believe in one God and no more," said Thomas Paine.

"Thou shalt not worship any graven image." No worshiper of images was he.

"Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain." He abstained from profanity himself and always rebuked it in others.

"Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy." He observed this law as faithfully, at least, as did his Christian neighbors.

"Honor thy father and thy mother." His parents were the objects of his reverence and love.

"Thou shalt not kill." The white-winged angel of mercy never had a more ardent devotee than Paine.

"Thou shalt not commit adultery." This charge was made against him, and the miscreant who made it was compelled to pay a heavy fine for his libelous assault.

"Thou shalt not steal." Were all mankind as honest as he was, the locksmith's avocation would be gone.

"Thou shalt not bear false witness." From his truthful lips no one ever heard a falsehood fall.

"Thou shalt not covet." A man who consecrates his life to the welfare of humanity cannot be accused of covetousness.

And now what is your record? How hav you kept even the commandments of your own law?

"Thou shalt hav no other gods before me." And yet you hav persecuted, imprisoned, tortured, butchered, and burned thousands for not believing in a trinity of gods.

"Before no idol shalt thou bow thy knee." Yet your places of worship are filled with idols—virgins, crucifixes, and Bibles—objects of as blind adoration as the wooden idols of China and Japan.

"Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain." On every hand our ears are greeted by the oaths of those who, whether belonging to any particular sect or not, yet believe in the existence and divinity of the God and Christ they curse.

"Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." For eighteen hundred years you hav not kept a single Sabbath of your God, observing a day he never authorized you to observe.

"Honor thy father and thy mother." And yet the very Christ you worship spurned and dishonored the loving mother who bore him.

"Thou shalt not kill." For centuries earth re sounded with the shrieks of murdered millions, victims of your relentless fury.

"Thou shalt not commit adultery." Yet your most immaculate saints violate this commandment and become a stench in the nostrils of decent people.

"Thou shalt not steal." To-day the prisons of Europe and America shelter three hundred thousand Christian thieves.

"Thou shalt not bear false witness." Yet perjury is rife in Christendom, and even in heathen lands the very name of Christianity has become a synonym for falsehood and deceit.

"Thou shalt not covet." And yet your history is but the history of covetousness itself. Rome is dying of indigestion from having tried to devour the world. A little while ago we saw the Greek cross planted upon the Balkans, saw the Russian eagle perched upon those snowy crags, gloating over the misfortunes of Turkey, eager to clutch in his greedy talons the territory of Islam, and prevented only by the jealous wolves of Protestantism.

Such, O Church! is your infamous record. You may cry, "Out, damned spot!" but you cannot erase it. No wonder that the warmest hearts and brightest intellects are leaving you. Upon your walls they read the fateful words that met the terrified gaze of Babylon's sinful king. Ignorant of your impending doom, you are looking forward to a millennium when your power on earth shall be supreme. Vain delusion! Your millennium has come and gone. That dark blot on the page of history, that withering pall stretching across the centuries from Constantine to Luther—that constitutes the thousand years of Christian rule foretold in the Apocalyps. But that has passed, and your power is vanishing, never to be restored again. From the ashes of that dauntless hero, Giordano Bruno, young Science phœnix-like arose, and in the soil prepared by Luther sowed the seed whose harvest is your death. Even now, methinks I hear your death-knell ringing—even now I gaze into a sepulcher where soon must lie your Bibles and your creeds, your stakes, your gibbets and your racks, your Gods, your devils, and your priests. And when the last have been entombed, then gather up the bleached and crumbling bones of the one hundred million human beings who hav perished at your hands, and let this ghostly pile remain, a most befitting monument to your unbounded cruelty and crimes!

Hades, Hell, & Co.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Having observed a little discussion between two of your correspondents about the use of the word hell, I hav here boiled down the facts into a few words. There are three terms in the Greek Testament which hav been translated hell. The most common one is hades, which means "the unseen world," the place of the departed spirits. This word, being untranslatable, is given in the revised version without translation. But this is nothing new. It is so given in John Wesley's New Testament, which is some used by Methodists. No scholar of any denomination doubts that hell for hades is a gross mistranslation. Another New Testament word translated hell is Gehenna. This is not, like hades, a Greek, but a Hebrew word, and means the valley of Hinnom near Jerusalem (Ga-Hinnom). It was here that Solomon offered human sacrifices to idols; hence the spot was held accursed and made a place of execution.

"The pleasant valley of Hinnom, Tophet thence,
And black Gehenna, called the type of hell."

This word occurs only in the utterance of the meek and lowly Jesus. When the meek and lowly talked of coming back to get even with his enemies he threatened to send them to Gehenna, "where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched." Gehenna is translated hell in the revised version, but a note givs the original word, without, however, an explanation of its true meaning. You see how tight the Christinn mind holds on to eternal torment.

The third New Testament word translated hell is Tartarus. This word, like hades, is purely Greek and comes nearer to meaning hell than either of the others. Tartarus is the part of hades where the wicked (Tantalus, Ixion, & Co.), were punished. It occurs only twice or three times in the New Testament, and is sometimes rendered "hell," sometimes "the bottomless pit." Either translation is sufficiently correct, for Tartarus, etymologically considered, means a profound abyss, and it was so represented by Homer, Hesiod, Virgil, etc.

The Old Testament word Scheol is said to be the Hebrew equivalent of hades, and Tophet (also used in the Old Testament) of Gehenna. C. L. James.

"The Dead Greenback Party."

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The always-dying but ever-living Greenback party appears at last to hav actually "kicked the bucket." Brother Truesdell has said so, and he holds "that no good can grow out of politieal or religious discussions, unless we can impart and receive information founded strictly on fact." But after making this declaration it seems strange that he should assert that national banks cannot suddenly retire their circulation.

True, it may take years to gather up their currency, but this is a mere dodge. Other currency of equal amount is withdrawn and held for the redemption of their currency. So the immediate effect is a contraction equal to the amount of their circulation. If it takes years, as Mr. Truesdell says, why did the withdrawal of nineteen millions by the banks last winter produce a monetary stringency that would hav ripened into a panic had not the government relieved it by the purchase of bonds?

Let us see if the Greenback party is dead. We know that the Greenback currency still survives. We also know that the intention was to fund the greenbacks into interest-bearing bonds, and to make national bank notes the "permanent currency." In pursuance of this intention a resumption act was passed providing for their withdrawal, but the Greenback agitation in 1878 compelled the enactment of a law by which they were kept in circulation. Further, it was proposed last winter to refund for thirty years seven hundred millions of bonds. But the Greenback sentiment of the country defeated it, and now these bonds are being rapidly paid. It looks as if the National Bank party will die first. The continued payment of the bonds is washing their foundation away. Already they are casting about for a new "basis." About that time the people will discover that they don't like the "wildcat," and will make the much-abused greenback a chief corner-stone in the temple of liberty.

The great question is, Who shall control the currency and reap the profit of its issue? Credit money of some kind is an absolute necessity. Whose credit shall be monetized—the credit of the nation or that of a few rich individuals? The former is in the interest of the many, the latter in the interest of the few. The National Bank party says, Fund the national credit into perpetual interest-bearing bonds, and monetize the credit of the bondholder to whatever extent he desires. The Greenback party says, Pay off the bonds and monetize the national credit as far as legitimate business requires. The former system enables Shylock to exact a tribute from industry, and thus rob the producer of the fruits of his labor. The latter proclaims industrial freedom, and proposes to make the Declaration of Independence a reality instead of a sham.

This is the great living idea of the Greenback party which will enable it to outliv all mistakes and overcome all opposition. Fall in line, Brother Truesdell, and help us develop it. Let not the flesh-pots of Egypt seduce you from the path of duty. Humanity needs your assistance. So put yourself in position to help on the good work. Criticise every defect you can find, but don't for pity's sake imitate the boy who whistled to keep his courage up by shouting, "The Greenback party is dead."

Fairfield, Iowa, Oct. 20, 1881.

The Evidences of Christ's Miraculous Birth.

The whole structure of Christianity stands on the testimony of one man related as hearsay. If a hundred men relate that I dreamed a dream, the hundred are not testifying. It is impossible that one man can know that another man dreamed of any certain thing. Now Christianity stands on the theory that Jesus Christ was conceived of the Holy Ghost and born of a virgin.

If these two facts be not true, down goes Christianity; for all else may be true, and if these statements are false, there is nothing left of it. Now what evidence hav we as to Christ's birth and parentage? Nothing in all the wide world but the report that Joseph dreamed the angel Gabriel told him so. Christ may hav done a thousand miracles, and they prove nothing as to his birth and parentage. Unless he was God's son, born as stated, it amounts to nothing. How did Matthew or John know Joseph dreamed? They never even knew the man; never saw Christ himself until after he was thirty years old. So that it all stands on a tradition heard by them that the ancient Joseph, who had married, as he supposed, a virgin, some thirty years prior to Matthew's time, and some sixty years before a gospel was written; had found her to be pregnant, and was minded to divorce her, but was prevented by his dream. And yet here is the whole civilized world supporting a most costly establishment, contributing hundreds of millions every month, on the faith in this dream.

Suppose some ancient and innocent Joseph of to-day had married a few weeks ago, and came into his country town and disclosed the secrets of his domestic troubles, together with his dream that his virgin wife was about to present him with a son of God, how would people regard his story?

Why is the story of an old man's dream any more reliable because it was related eighteen hundred years ago?

In all the lapse of time, and among all the traditions, tales, and creeds of men, the most amazing, the most incredible, the most startling, is this one that God begat a son by a woman of mortal kind. It is a tale of a thing the most contrary to the order of God's providence of anything conceivable. Think for a moment of the majesty of the universe; of the worlds on worlds rolling in space! Think of the unchanging order of nature; no interference, even though millions of lives are at stake. And then consider of this wondrous tale that only eighteen hundred years ago a virgin was found with child by the author of nature himself. Surely it would require more evidence of the highest character known to jurisprudence to prove this statement than it would to prove that an army of men were raised from the dead. Yet what hav we? The dream of Joseph related by men who probably never saw the man.

Surely we cannot boast of our civilization so long as the mass of mankind hav such small mental [illegible] they can believe such stuff on such evidence, and we analyze it actually, it is inferior to the [illegible] jumbo of the wild, flat-nosed black cannibal Africa. And yet we boast of the march of intellect.

An Agnostic in Court.

During the progress of the Murdoch case at Toronto, Can., Mr. R J. Belford was called to giv evidence on behalf of Mrs. Murdoch.

Mr. Murphy, counsel for Mr. Murdoch, asked that Mr. Belford should be sworn on the voire dire, which was done. The voire dire is a form of oath applied to a witness who is supposod to be incompetent, and he is sworn, not in the cause, but to truthfully answer the preliminary questions put to him as to his belief. After Mr. Belford had taken the oath and kissed the book, Mr. Murphy questioned him:

"Are you the R J. Belford who gave evidence in a case in May, 1879, alluded to in a judgment of the late Chief Justice Moss?"

Mr. Belford: I am. I hav modified my belief since then.

Mr. Murphy: Do you believe in a God?

Mr. Belford: I believe in an Unknown Power.

Mr. Murphy: Do you believe in a future state of rewards and punishments?

Mr. Belford: I do not believe, nor I dare not disbelieve.

Mr. Murphy: Do you believe that if you are bad in this life you will be punished in the future?

Mr. Belford: I do emphatically, if there is a future; but how do I know there is a future?

Mr. Murphy: Do you believe that you will be rewarded for good in a future world?

Mr. Belford: Yes; if there is a future world.

Mr. Murphy: Do you believe there is not a future world?

Mr. Belford: I dare not disbelieve, because I do not know; but I hav not sufficient evidence to justify me in believing in a future state.

Mr. Murphy: Tell me, do you believe in a Supreme Being?

Mr. Belford: Define what you mean by a Supreme Being.

His lordship ruled that Mr. Belford must understand the term.

Mr. Murphy: Do you not entertain the peculiar belief that if a man does wrong he will be punished physically?

Mr. Belford: Yes; but I also believe that his conscience will punish him. Very likely my conscience is part of what you call a Supreme Being.

Mr. Murphy: Do yo believe in God? Please giv me a direct answer.

Mr. Belford: I believe in a Supreme Power which I know nothing about? Do you know what an Agnostic is?

Mr. Murphy: No; I hav heard of such people, but I find them all disagreeing as to what an Agnostic is.

Mr. Belford: I am an Agnostic, and I do not believe in anything I cannot prove; I do not believe in God.

Mr. S. H. Blake contended that the law did not require a belief in future punishment, but in a punishment either in this world or the next.

His lordship, Mr. Justice Osler: No one can regret more than I that the law here is not as in England, where a person holding such a belief can giv evidence. I hav no doubt myself that such evidence would convey in most cases to the mind of the judge as much conviction as if given under oath. But according to the rule in Canadian courts such evidence cannot be received.

God or No God.

I see the God question is being agitated somewhat through THE TRUTH SEEKER, and 'tis well; for, to my mind, those who hold to the idea that there is an intelligence beyond and above man are not entirely free, whether they be Liberals or Christians. In your last issue is an article from C. L. James, of Eau Claire, Wis., in answer to Clark Irvine, in which he says: "I am not an Atheist in the full sense of the word; perhaps no man is." I am aware that most all Spiritualists hold on to a God, a great Central Intelligence, a beginner of all things, etc. As I said, it seems to me a believer in a God cannot be free; hence you will bear with me in offering a few thoughts on the subject. Perhaps no man of my age has wrestled with the God idea more extensivly, or sincerely, than the writer has, and the result is I am an Atheist in the full sense of the word. I cannot conceive of any intelligence in the universe except that which is manifested through organization. I can conceive of no intelligence except that which unfolds through matter. Ah! says the God man, everything must have a beginning. Indeed! Pray tell me when your God began. From whence came he? My Liberal friends, I know it to be very unpopular to argue there is no God, but just stop and think. All we know of intelligence manifests itself as above mentioned. All will agree to this. Then I ask, Has your God got an organization? Has he a brain through which intelligence manifests itself? No, indeed. If so he would be a personal God, the Christian's God. But, say most all Liberals, there must be an intelligence that started all things, etc. Well, now, come right down to the point, Can this intelligence manifest without a brain? If so, how, pray tell us? Oh! some say, great is the mystery of godliness. That will do for Christians to say, but it don't satisfy the writer. It seems just as unreasonable to me to believe in one god as to believe in three.

Humboldt struck the key-note when he said, "The universe is governed by law." Natural law, or the inherent forces of nature, brought us here, holds us, and will take us hence. We must all succumb to the inherent forces of nature. I am here the result of these inherent forces, as much so and no more than the pebble, the blade of grass, the upas-tree, or the boa-constrictor. I am here by a law that compelled me to be here. I shall not try to get back of these inherent forces, while those who believe in a God must go back of them for an intelligence which formed them. Think of it, a great intelligence before there was any universe, any space for that intelligence to abide in! Then think again of God making a natural law. What did he hav to make it of? Don't you see, my god-believing Liberal, that you are driven to the same conclusion that our orthodox friends are, simply that God made the universe out of nothing? Thus you see the God idea will not bear the test of reason. I accept the Epicurean philosophy, that this universe is composed of atoms. I believe the atoms always existed, and that each one, before passing through the developing process, contained an immortal soul. I believe the life-principle which animates each human being was in the atoms which entered into the organization of this planet, and subsequently passed on up through the mineral and vegetable kingdoms, then to the animal, and on up until the "Genus Homo" is the result. By this process of reasoning it is clear to me that there never was a beginning to man, no beginning to life, matter, or motion, but all coexistent and coeternal. Hence no need of a God to create and start things going. No sane, reasoning person can believe for a single moment that God interferes with the affairs of mankind, or rules the destinies of nations. If he don't do anything, of what use is he, and what do we need him for? The fact is, the belief in a God is the result of education, and it is time we should stop and think to see if it will stand the test of reason. It is time we should develop our individuality and stand alone without leaning on a God. Let each and every one lean on him or herself, and grow, strengthen, increase, and worship the divine within, for just in proportion as we increase the divine within, just in that proportion will the devil inherent in our organization step down and out. Hence the divine will ultimately prevail, and mankind will yet reach a state of harmony and happiness without a God.

Book Notices.

"Science and Theology; Ancient and Modern," by James Anthony Froude, is a very excellent work, and one cannot willingly lay it down until every word is read. The author rapidly reviews the past, when ships crawled lazily across the Atlantic, consuming six weeks in transit; when, in place of steam cars, stage coaches jogged slowly over the rough high-roads; and it was considered a sin to think some thoughts aloud. Progress through Greek and Roman philosophy is beautifully traced, and the teaching of the splendid Lucretius is appropriately noticed. The comparison between the things that hav been, and those which are now, is aptly shown, and this book is well calculated to awaken thought and set people to thinking. The author infers that the message of science is not the last or the best—that the time will come when we shall not be dazzled by that we call progress—when great wealth will not satisfy, and men will take a purer and grander view of life, making it the thing it should be.

"Ecce Diabolus" (Behold the Devil) is by the Very Rev. Evan Davies, D. D., L. L. D., Arch-Druid of Great Britain.

In this little book of sixty-three pages we certainly do behold the devil in "bloody sacrifices" and "burnt-offerings." His genealogy, history, and general introduction into good society are plainly and faithfully traced. Everybody would like to know about this mysterious personage—who he was, whence he came, and what's his name—and also the ignorant and brutal system of devil-worship, all of which is tersely told in this pamphlet, where it is also shown that the worship of Yahweh or Jehovah is one and the same thing with devil-worship. Not the least interesting part of this work is the allusion to the Druidic philosophy; and the essay closes by saying: "Our temples were never defiled by blood, idol-worship, or priestly delusions. Pure philosophical temples were they, and their motto was always, 'The truth against the world,' which is our motto also."

"The Pyramid of Gizeh," by Van Buren Denslow, LL. D., is another work worthy of notice. We are always pleased to read whatever comes from Prof. Denslow's pen, and when we saw his name upon the title-page of the pamplet now before us, we knew at once that we were to be instructed, and that the time spent in reading it would not be thrown away.

Prof. Denslow is well read in Egyptian lore, and has here given an interesting account of the location of the great pyramid, and a description of the same from socket to capstone. Anything relating to the pyramids of Egypt, and especially to that of Gizeh, reared centuries ago, by hands now unknown and long since moldered into dust, is very fascinating, and this account is no less so than any previously written. This pyramid is generally supposed to be the oldest structure now in existence; but why or for what purpose it was built remains as much a mystery as ever. We join with the author in saying that it has rendered at least this service: "It has stood as a monument of man's incomprehensibility to himself. As we cannot comprehend the builders, nor they us, so from the beginning the greatest mystery to mankind is man! The Jew has failed to comprehend the gentile; the Roman has misapprehended the Greek; aristocracies hav maligned the people; mobs hav not known their kings, nor kings their people; the wealthy hav frowned upon the unfortunate; the law has executed the poor, and the judge has insulted the criminal. Is it not well, therefore, that the oldest, grandest, most intellectual effort of the human hand and brain should remain, as always, a monument, simply and sublimely, of man's incomprehensibility to himself?"

"THE RADICAL PULPIT."

Among the many books kindly sent us for review, few meet with a kinder reception than the book with the above title. It comprises discourses by O. B. Frothingham and Prof. Felix Adler, fifteen in number, and every page is permeated with the true and beautiful spirit of sincere and lofty manhood.

While reading these essays one feels lifted into a purer atmosphere, where, roaming free over green fields and fragrant meadows, he drinks in new and sweet perfumes.

Discourses like these hav a true and lasting value; they are like the fresh breezes at eventide that invigorate and enliven, that cheer and strengthen the weary spirit and encourage it to go forth to battle for the right. Mr. Frothingham's mind was in its most healthy condition when these very practical thoughts were written, and they will be treasured as pleasant remembrances of a pure and upright character and a true and sincere man. The addresses of Prof. Adler are as earnest and delightful as is everything from his pen.

We remember the only time we ever had the pleasure of listening to him, and how his calm yet glowing words seemed to elevate and ennoble his listeners; and so, again, these printed thoughts of his renew a sweet and trustful hope in humanity and shadow forth a better day for our race.

This book is good Sunday reading, and every one will want it, if not for that day for some other day, and it is adapted for all times and seasons.

Liberal School Books.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Nothing is more apparent in our schools than the lack of a good and useful class of text-books free from superstition, cant, and the miasmatic influences of a dead and decaying past. It is a disgrace to the intelligence of the country that our histories, in common use in our schools, contain no allusion to the illustrious Paine, whose brave words did more toward the establishment of a free republic on this continent than any other mind of his time. Americans should blush with shame and indignation at the manifest insult.

And, while our school readers contain extracts and essays from many leading minds of the past, there is no allusion to the inspiring and noble words of one of the greatest men that ever breathed the breath of life.

True, as Mrs. Slenker, in a recent number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, says, "There is great improvement over our past teaching, but yet there is room for much more."

But text-books of a fair and impartial character cannot be introduced in our schools so long as the Bible is read and prayers are offered there by order of the general statutes.

Our schools must be liberated from this barbarism before any great change can be hoped for in text-books, for if a book of a Liberal type could be procured it would be next to impossible to get it into the schools because school boards are composed largely of the orthodox element, and from a three years' experience with such a board, I know how quickly any such innovation would be voted down.

I hav been frequently asked to prepare a reader for children that should be free from the thorns of ignorance and hypocrisy, but such a book at present would be of no avail.

Let us seek first to pave the way for such books by breaking down the barriers to true progress that present themselvs in the shape of prayers, chaplains in Congress and legislatures, pious teachers in schools, etc. Science has already entered the doors of our school rooms, and is making havoc with the old theories and superstitions.

A class in geology was reciting a lesson, and one of the bright pupils remarked the discrepancy between the Bible account of creation and the geological statement, and ventured to ask the teacher which she must believe. The teacher, with a puzzled expression, replied, "We cannot doubt the testimony of the rocks—but—but—we must not disbelieve the Bible." "I don't see how we can help it," bravely said the bright-eyed girl.

The whole class was set to thinking, and it is just such thinkers who, by and by, will revolutionize the system of school books. Our business now is to make people think, and in due time there will appear a proper system of text-books that we shall not be ashamed of.

God's Providence and Ministers' Prevarications.

When ministers talk on secular subjects they are apt to blunder as badly as when they talk of heaven and its cheerful concomitant, hell. The nature of their calling makes them deceivers—smooth talkers who tell the people they are prosperous so they will not feel so much the heavy burden of supporting kid-gloved paupers. They are conservativs and hold-backs, who dread the time when they must go to work, and do all in their power to put it farther and farther away. Prominent for a time among these is the Rev. Dr. Krohn, of Joplin, Mo., who seized upon the recent Thanksgiving Day to tell his congregation how thankful they ought to be. "In everything," he said, quoting from the Bible, "giv thanks;" and then he proceeded to state in detail what there was to be thankful for. First and foremost we were to be thankful to "God," from "whom cometh every good and perfect gift." There was nothing said about bad and imperfect gifts, and we are left to suppose that they do not come from him, but from the "other fellow," his creature the devil. But according to the Christian theology this thing cannot be. "From God proceeds all things" has been taught by all theologians. Not only the sunshine but the storm is his gift; the pestilence and the famin equally with plenty and prosperity. Indeed, he givs more bad gifts to the square inch on our globe than he does good. If we were to believe the theology of the church we must believe him to be a monster of iniquity. He is responsible for all the wo and misery which even the most blind cannot fail to see all over our land. Every poorhouse is a monument to his indifference to the welfare of his creatures; every asylum is a witness that he does not care for his children. He would let the poor starve and the decrepit die, and it is only by the works of men that they are not left to perish, as a tree blown over by one of "God's" gales is left to decay and die. His "fatherly protection" of nations is all a sham. He is always on the side of the strongest battalions, and in battle the nation with the most men and powder is sure to win. Put one of his own special children to sea in a leaky ship, with no human help near, and all the prayers that could be uttered in a million years could not save him from drowning. God does not interfere in the affairs of men. A well authenticated miracle is not on record, while there are millions of accidents recorded which he did not lift a finger to prevent, when, if he ever did or was ever going to, he should hav done so.

But in spite of all this the self-appointed ministers of his will tell us that all blessings are his gifts, and that when anything goes wrong we must fold our hands and say, "It is all for the best; God's ways are not our ways." It seems to us the hypocrisy of such a sentiment ought to be apparent to all men, but either it is not so to the ministers or they will not admit it. The Rev. Dr. Krohn can even see God's finger in Garfield's death, and derives satisfaction from the fact that he turned a deaf ear to the millions of prayers that were uttered for his recovery. A God who could deliberately shoot a man in the back, and let him suffer long weeks before death, must be a brute. Or, any God who saw a man thus shot, and would not help him, when millions asked him to, must be a monster of hard-heartedness. Yet this is exactly what God did or did not do in the case of our late President. Either Guiteau was his instrument, or he was not. If he was, then God committed a cruel murder. If he was not, then God calmly saw a man struggling for weeks for life and would not lift a finger to save him, even though appealed to by a whole nation. Let the Christians take either horn of this dilemma they choose, they can but make their deity out a cruel murderer, or an unfeeling God. And they continue to debase themselvs by worshiping him.

In order to make the dollars come easier from the pockets of his congregation, Rev. Dr. Krohn said that "our streets are no longer filled with men begging for work, but every kind of labor is asking for men. Business men are regaining their lost fortunes, and all classes are paying their debts." Is this so? Are the fifteen thousand sufferers by the Michigan fire "regaining their lost fortunes?" Are the defaulting deacons of the Newark savings bank paying their debts? Are there no tramps now out of work and asking for bread? In this city several hundreds apply for lodgings every week at the police station houses. If in Missouri all kinds of businesses are asking for men, that state must be a paradise considerably different from New York, for here there are thousands out of work.

In face of the fact—which he reluctantly admits—that the churches hav not increased as fast as in former years, this minister coolly says:

"And better than all else, the religion of Jesus Christ is making headway the world over.

"Rev. Frothingham, of New York city, the most cultured and scholarly and ablest exponent of Liberalism and Freethought this or any other country ever produced, and who for the last two years has been traveling all over Europe and America, and who has very recently been led to modify and change his antagonistic views of evangelical religion, said the other day to a reporter of the New York Evening Post, 'Evangelical religion is stronger in the world to-day, the churches are better filled and better sustained, and there is more of the religious spirit abroad in the world to-day than when I began my work twenty years ago.'

"Here then we hav testimony of one of the profoundest and most observing champions of Freethought to the present power and progress of our holy Christianity.

"And we may set this gratuitous testimony in favor of religious progress and power over against the wild, loose, ignorant, senseless, illogical, and blasphemous diatribes of such men as Ingersoll, Chainey, and Underwood, and then draw our own calm inferences as to which side of the great controversy is entitled to the strength of the argument and the preponderance of evidence."

Now there are a good many prevarications in this short extract. In the first place the religion of Jesus Christ is not making headway the world over. On the contrary, the world is growing away from the religion of Jesus. The orthodox church is not the same now all over the world as when it tortured and burned every heretic it could lay its unholy hands on. Many of the churches are growing more Liberal in preaching and practice. Hell-fire is not as hot now as when John Wesley founded the Methodist church and Jonathan Edwards ruthlessly consigned unbaptized infants to the flames. As for Mr. Frothingham, he has re-confessed. The reporter did not get his words nor his ideas, and so our minister cannot draw much consolation from him. Much of his first and second "confessions" are but "hair-splittings;" but when he gets down he says he does not think better of the evangelical church now than then, and has not the least idea of joining one. We are sorry for the Rev. Dr. Krohn, but Mr. Frothingham cannot help him. We would also respectfully inform him that he is the first one who has made the discovery that Ingersoll, Chainey, and Underwood are illogical. The editor of the Review would hardly admit an illogical man to its columns. We even doubt if Mr. Krohn himself, logical and reverent as he undoubtedly thinks himself to be, would gain easy access to its pages, unless in the advertising columns at regular rates. Underwood has long been regarded as excelling in the depth of his logic. If Chainey is not logical in his methods, it is the fault of the Christian college in which he received his ministerial education. But perhaps theological seminaries do not teach logic. We hardly think they do. But Mr. Chainey is not indebted wholly to them, and but few men hav a wider experience in logically tearing to pieces the flimsily-constructed fabric of Christianity.

As if he had not crowded enough fabrications into the above extract, Mr. Krohn goes on:

"We must admit that there is a dark, hard side to nature and life.

"Great nature moves with stupendous and appalling tread, in fire and flood, and volcano and storm and cyclone, and we are as nothing before it. Look at the want and waste of natural life. The want often greater than the supply, and the want often in one place and the supply in another; the bread and water in the valley, the hunger and thirst on the mountain. Look at the diseases of the world; at its aches and pains and torments. Look again at the hard dark things in the great social order; governments are corrupt, legislators bought and sold, politicians selfish. The rich and strong often oppress the poor and weak; love often disappointed, confidence betrayed, drunkenness and lust and riot hold forth everywhere. How shall we explain these things; how harmonize them with the thought of a wise and loving providence so as not only to bear them with composure, but in the midst of all to 'giv thanks?'

"It must be remembered that whether we can explain or harmonize them or not, they are still facts. The Bible does not create them, nor did the church create them; nor is the Bible religion, or the church responsible for them. The mystery is not in the Bible, or religion, or the church, but in nature itself. These mysterious and perplexing facts of nature and life lie wholly outside of the book, and not in it, and they would exist if the book were blotted out. And outside of the great sweep of Bible and truth it is impossible to find any satisfactory explanation. Natural theology does not solve the problem. To say that there is more plenty than want, more happiness than misery, does not fully meet the difficulty. Why, when there is so much wasted in nature, is there any want at all?

"Nature does not answer these questions; Rationalism does not; Materialism does not; Infidelity does not. Is there any explanation of them to be found anywhere? Does the Bible offer any? Does religion solve the problem? Yes. They answer them, or at least come to us with a system of truth or a theory of life in which the true answer may be found. But to be where explanation is possible and understandable, we must accept certain postulates of the Bible and religion, not contrary to reason, not above it, but in perfect accord with it and the logic of facts. But is not this to rest on faith? Yes, and that is just where we must all come at last in all these great questions that lie beyond the low and narrow horizon of the senses."

Yes, Mr. Krohn, that's it. Tear your Bible out of its covers, distort its words, mangle its meaning, and try to discover if you can why God permits such a dark side to nature. But can you do it? Can you see why a God all goodness should allow so much misery? Can you tell what beneficent purpose is served by storm and cyclone, by pestilence and famin? Can you tell why a father who loves his children should doom them to die by his own cruelty? He made the weak and the strong—why does he let the strong oppress the weak? If neither the Bible, the church, nor religion created crime, who but God did? Is he not the author of all things? Did he not make the storm as well as the people to perish in it? How does it help it to say we must "accept certain postulates of the Bible?" Is not that a grandiloquent phrase by which you hope to blind your hearers and escape from the base being you hav conjured up? It looks that way to a "man up a tree."

But can the minister be so sure that science cannot explain these phenomena? The storm, the famin, the cyclone, the pestilence, are the result of natural causes and not the manifestations of the wrath of an angry God. The universe is a big machine governed by its own laws and not by any God. There is no room for one outside of it nor inside of it. Matter is uncreated and self-existent, and is indestructible. Something cannot be made from nothing; it is unthinkable and impossible. The force which we see in the storm is but matter in motion, and without matter there can be no force. God did not and could not create matter, and he can hav no influence upon or over it. The human race has been evolved through countless ages from a low and savage condition, and in his constant struggle after better things the weakest must go the wall. It is the inexorable law of nature which knows no pity for man over the brute. In his struggle man has had to contend with innumerable difficulties, chief among which hav been a class of men called priests, who hav tried to keep him back in an ignorant condition so they could liv easily. A famin is caused by shortness of crops, not by divine wrath; but poor man in his despair, as he looked upon the famished faces of his friends and thought how horrible it all was, and not understanding the phenomena of nature, has thought there must be some outside power that controled all things, and has prayed to it. And designing men took advantage of his ignorance and said it was God, who could only be placated by supplication and self-abasement. From ignorance and fear the priesthood sprung, and by loud-mouthed pretensions does it strive to hold its place. Why should God place men in the world to suffer if he had the power to prevent it? Why should God decree men to toil when he could just as easily hav given them happiness without it? If we accept the fact that the universe cares nothing for man, then we can see why it is necessary to labor and to study its laws, that by taking advantage of the good ones we can overcome the bad. Every tear that courses down the cheek of sorrow carries conviction that omnipotent love does not rule the universe. Good and bad come in the natufal course of events. Nature givs us the rose and the upas-tree, the sunshine and the cyclone. Between the two extremes there is a wide distance, but we can find no room for any God. If men are to thank anything it should be themselvs, that they hav overcome the forces that work ill to such an extent that they hav prosperity and plenty, and can even spare a living to the useless drones who pray to the unknown that their bread be not taken from them. God never made a man prosperous unless he worked. Let us, then, thank Labor instead of the Lord for the turkey and cranberry sauce we ate on Thanksgiving Day.

We giv in this issue the first of a series of illustration which we propose to furnish, descriptiv of the places which Mr. Bennett will visit on his trip around the world. The cut in our present issue is a view of Constantinople from the Phanar, a little to the north of the fifth hill of the seven upon which, like Rome, the city is built. It is from the south side of the Golden Horn, opposit and a little above Galata, the point from which our traveler made his observations; but the towers, domes, minarets, and cypresses which he noted are visible. Across the Bosphorus, to the left, the part of the city called Scutari, in Asiatic Turkey, will be recognized. And to the right, just over the Golden Horn, is Galata.

The Theosophist comes to us from Ceylon printed in English. It seems like a visitor from some unknown shore. It reveals strange countries, strange people, and strange ways of conducting magazines. It is a curiosity with its unreadable Indian characters interspersed through the text. A plain, truthful traveler like Mr. Bennett is needed to reveal to us some of the hidden things over in the land which hav heretofore been explored only by ministers who, according to the Theosophist, hav told little truth and many falsehoods. Mr. Bennett will probably ere long have the pleasure of renewing his acquaintance and shaking hands with the conductor of this magazine, Madame H. P. Blavatsky, who, before she went to India, was widely known in this country.

Victoria Woodhull is back to this country denying in the strongest possible terms that she was ever a Freelover. She is almost as talented a liar as Talmage or Anthony Comstock.

DR. E. MOYER, of Nevada, O., goes West next week. He has any number of "Paine's Great Works" and the "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion" to sell.

THERE are over fifty volumes of Paine's life in the township of Berlin Hights, Ohio. M. M. Fish and his young friend, G. W. Myers, are responsible for this state of affairs.

THE ALWATO CLUB meets every Sunday at 3 P.M., at 201 East 34th street. Mr. S. P. Andrews, the patentee of the new language, presides, and all of an inquiring and studious mind are welcome.

THE genial author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," etc., Mr. McDonnell, of Lindsay, Ontario, has gone to California to spend the winter on account of poor health.

ON the first of January Mr. Chainey's Infidel Pulpit will be changed to This World. It will be enlarged by the addition of a Liberal story by S. P. Putnam, and the price raised to $2 per annum.

THE LIBERAL CLUB took a new departure and had Prof. Sedgwick and his stereopticon before it on Friday evening, Dec. 23d. The views exhibited were of the Yosemite Valley and California scenes.

THE Republicans of Keene, N. H., hav renominated for mayor of their pleasant little city Ira W. Russell, a Freethinking dentist. It is but fair to say of the Republicans that they don't know he is an Infidel.

OUR Liberal friend Leach, of Wamego, Kansas, has a very fine opera house, which he is constantly improving. Judge Krekle, of the United States District Court, recently spoke in it upon the subject of "Tolerance."

THE San Francisco Alta hasn't much reverence in its composition. It recently made this announcement: "Bob Mackenzie, pastor of the Howard Presbyterian church, will lecture this evening on Bob Ingersoll."

THE SPREAD THE LIGHT CLUB is the name of an organization which gets together every Thursday evening at 8 Horatio street, this city. Just what kind of light the club spreads we are not prepared to say. All sorts of speakers upon all sorts of subjects.

THE SOMEBODY CLUB holds sessions every Sunday at 3 P. M. at Clarendon Hall, this city. The ostensible object of the Club is to find an answer to Truth's conundrum, Who is the somebody that gets all the profit of labor? Good speakers are on hand every meeting.

H. J. THOMAS, formerly proof-reader in THE TRUTH SEEKER office, is now editor of the Sewing Machine Journal, and has his headquarters in the Bible House. When the trustees of the building find they hav a real Infidel in their house they will probably want more donations for prayers.

AUXILIARY Liberal League No. 190, of San Francisco, met on Monday evening, the 13th, at the office of Dr. Hoadley, 5½ Kearny street. The object of the meeting was to elect new officers and take such steps as would aid in completely divorcing church and state, the just taxation of all property, and the abolishment of all laws which are in conflict with the letter and spirit of the Constitution. Several highly educated Jewish-Americans are members of the League.

THE Investigator Society has been sleeping for some time past, but has awakened refreshed and will hav a course of lectures under its auspices; which induces us to ask, Where is the course of lectures the New York Liberals were to inaugurate? Hav the leaders tumbled into the warm bed just vacated by the Investigator Society?

MR. S. P. PUTNAM has been very successful in his course of lectures delivered before the Paterson, League. He has already given seven lectures, and will giv five more at follows: "Truth Immediate to the Soul," "The Greek, the Roman, and the Jew," "Romanism, Calvinism, and Liberalism," "Science and Humanity," and "The Ideal American." They are delivered every Sunday at 3 P.M., prompt, in International Hall, corner of Fair and Main streets, Paterson, N. J.

M. CUSHMAN, of Teller City, Col., has our sincere thanks for his generous list of thirty-five trial subscribers. If all our friends should do likewise we might in time hav a much larger list of permanent subscribers. May Mr. Cushman prosper in all things as he did in his evening's work for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The Institute of Heredity.

The convention of the Institute of Heredity, recently held in this city, was in the main quite successful. The speeches and essays were of a high order, and the subject was treated in a comprehensiv manner. I suppose that every one will acknowledge the importance of knowledge concerning heredity, although a few semi-barbaric newspapers seem disposed to ridicule any effort in this direction. They seem to think that we may know the stars, but we cannot know human bodies. But it is possible to hav better bodies and better children. We can increase the health and well-being of society. Whatever we may say of the spirit, so far as we know it is entirely dependent for its operation upon our bodily organization; it has no independent existence. Therefore it is all a sad piece of nonsense to glorify the mind at the expense of the power by which alone it can work. Hamilton may declare that the mind alone is worthy of study, but in so doing he shows himself to be a learned metaphysical fool, and Dr. Maudesley has rightly called him to account for his silly remark. We hav "cranks" like Guiteau because we hav directed attention to the mind rather than to the body, and all our civilization to-day is in a sick condition, full of morbid sentiments and ideas and insanities, because the mind has been crammed and pushed ahead without sufficient physical stamina to maintain it. The splendor of our civilization in art and poetry depends upon our healthful material conditions. The Greek gave us the best philosophy, the most splendid poetry, and the most beautiful art, because he was an athlete —because he made his body strong and supple, and capable of supporting and vivifying all the actions of the mind. We hav neglected our bodies—that is the sin we hav committed in these modern days, and that is why we suffer from so many diseases. The healthful action of the sentiments depends upon the healthful action of the muscles and nerves, and if one has a poor set of muscles and nerves he is sure to fail in some essential point, no matter how brilliant his genius.

Now the object of the Institute of Heredity is to find out about these things, to become "posted," as the saying is, to discover the laws of heredity, and apply them. We wish to begin the education of the child with what benign influence we can before its birth, and thus bring into play all the resources of nature for the development of man. He grows out of the past like a tree out of the soil, and sustenance, not simply physical, but intellectual and moral, flows to him while in his mother's womb; and before he comes into the light of day he receives his characteristics from the delicate and quick organization in which he livs. The process of birth is wonderful; it is a miracle, and it should be studied with the sweetest and purest feelings and delights, and a purpose to know how the fine fountains of life can flow most clearly and beneficently. Motherhood, what a world of poetry, of glory, of hope, of progress, lies in that divine, that imperial power; and to make the motherhood of the race more noble, more strong, more capable of receiving all the virtue and intelligence of humanity at any period of its development and transmitting these in healthful environments to new generations, this is the purpose of the Institute of Heredity, congenial and necessary to every other purpose of Liberalism. He who is interested at all in human improvement must be interested in the purification of its fountain head.

VOLTAIRE IN EXILE.—This little history of Voltaire was gotten up as a substitute for the more voluminous and expensiv histories of the great Freethinker. Those not acquainted with the history of Voltaire will find this book a valuable and correct reference. Published by D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth St., New York.—The Liberal.

Three New Pamphlets.

We hav just had printed and bound three new books, which we shall be happy to supply to all who wish them. They are:

Science and Theology: Ancient and Modern. By James Anthony Froude. Price, 25 cents.

The Pyramid of Gizeh. The Relation of Ancient Egyptian Civilization to the Hebrew Narrativs in Genesis and Exodus, and the Relativ Claims of Moses and the Pyramid to Inspiration Considered. By Van Buren Denslow, LL.D. Price, 25 cents.

Ecce Diabolus, in which the worship of Yahveh, or Jehovah, is shown to be devil worship, with some observations upon the horrible and cruel ordinance of bloody sacrifice and burnt-offerings. By the Very Rev. Evan Davies, D.D., LL.D., Arch-Druid of Great Britain. Price, 25 cents.

The title pages of these little works giv a good and clear idea of their contents and nature, and the authors' names are guarantees of the ability with which the subjects are treated. The classic scholarship of Froude and Denslow is acknowledged by all, and Mr. Davies, the Arch Druid, is fully competent to tell of the early traditions of Judaism. As an initiated bard of the Drudic order he is well prepared to prove that the most notable gods of the orientals were only symbols and bardic myths deified.

As a historian Froude's reputation is world-wide, as is Denslow's for industry and ability in Egyptology.

The Pyramid of Gizeh.

Very many persons hav written upon the pyramids, or founded theories and conceived imaginary systems of philosophy and religion concerning them; but there is so little real data to go by that all human ingenuity has failed to settle when they were built, by whom, or for what purpose.

Mr. Van Buren Denslow has carefully gone over the ground taken by some of these writers, thus giving in a few words much real information about them and showing the fallacy of the conclusions of others, and especially of the Masonic theory, which he destroys by telling us that "all evidences of the existence of Masonry prior to the ninth century are imaginary," and concludes his essay by saying: "The great pyramid, so solitary in its wonders, is not only the largest . . . but the very oldest structure ever built by man. What were the ideas that caused it to be bullt? We don't know. No theory that has been presented is more than barely plausible. The pyramid, therefore, is a good stamping ground on which, in this age of universal pretense, to learn how to say, 'We don't know, and we can't find out.' But the intelligence required to build it is such that we can easily assure ourselvs that those who did build it well knew that wondrous 'why.' . . . One service the pyramid has rendered. It has stood as a monument of man's incomprehensibility to himself. . . . Is it not well, therefore, that the oldest, grandest, and most intellectual effort of the human hand and brain should remain, as it has always been, and now and henceforth must always be, a monument simply and sublimely of man's incomprehensibility to himself?"

The little book will well repay a perusal, and is fully worth its price. ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

Obituary.

Lester C. Parker, an earnest advocate of truth and brave champion of right, passed away August 25, 1881, aged seventy-nine years. He was for years a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and by his zeal in Liberal and progressiv movements was the means of furnishing subscribers for that bold and fearless paper. All honor to his memory, and many can testify that their lives hav been the better for having been associated with his.

His brave soul did not falter
In the cause he felt was right,
And at truth's sacred altar
He rejoiced in wisdom's light.

Each false sectarian notion
He helped to tear away;
Out on life's Liberal ocean
He bravely plowed his way.

And though full oft a breaker
Raised its opposing force,
He, being a truth seeker,
Ne'er faltered in his course;

But onward sped to duty
Though all the world might frown;
The truth in all its beauty
Could not be trampled down.

This was his precept ever,
And, though he's passed away,
His earnest life will never
Be like seed thrown away.

For we shall find it springing
In all the good that thrives,
And feel its sweetness bringing
A blessing to our lives.

BY T. B. WAKEMAN.

LECTURE I.

THE OBJECTIVE ORDER.—CONTINUED.

4. Biology. We next turn the leaf from the material to the vital world. The discovery of the Law of Correlation now enables us to take this step without a break in the order of scientific unity. There is a gulf, a duality, as was formerly supposed, between the great world of inorganic matter and the comparatively small world of vital organisms; but that gulf is no longer unintelligible and impassable, as it was formerly thought to be. The bridge between these two worlds, so exceedingly different, is founded, it is true, in chemical correlation and combination of the elements which compose protoplasm, which is the physical basis of life, and the one peculiar substance of which all living things are formed. It is, therefore, by far the most wonderful substance in existence. But neither its chemistry nor the properties and potencies of its chemical atoms or molecules in any wise accounts for or gives us any explanation of the phenomena called life.

The chemists are on the wrong track in attempting to find life in the properties—e. g., magnetism, etc., —of atoms. They might as well try to find water in oxygen or hydrogen before they have chemically combined.

Life is a property of protoplasm as a mass, and only after it is formed, and not at all of its chemical or physical components before they combine and extinguish each other in making this wonderful substance. Much less is there proof that life exists in any other of the sixty-seven or more chemical elements which make up the material world, and which are not even protoplasm at all. Protoplasm must be regarded as a simple homogeneous substance when considered as the basis of life. It is true it is a nitro-carbon, consisting proximately of nitrogen, sixteen parts; carbon, fifty-five; hydrogen, seven; oxygen, two; phosphorus, one; and sulphur, one. But none of the previous qualities of these component parts appear in the substance itself after it has been chemically formed. The atomic chemical combination is given proximately: carbon, 400; hydrogen, 310; nitrogen, 50; oxygen, 120; plus sulphur and phosphorus.

Life is the reactive process of this substance, continuously made against the forces and changes of the environment—that is, of the whole world about it. Life is not the result of the several chemical steps and changes that have led up to the formation of protoplasm, but it is the reaction of the substance after it is formed, as against everything around it. Life is a constantly-adjusting correlation between the sustained changes in protoplasm and the changes in its environment. Materialism can therefore never adequately explain life, any more than it can explain fear, or love, or hope, for none of these words express any qualities or properties of matter itself. They express feelings which may be reduced to processes of the nervous systems of animals or men, but in no wise can those feelings be found or analyzed by physical observation or chemical analysis of the elements of protoplasm, or any matter whatever. They are, rather, social products, and belong to a higher world. Materialism is simply the explanation of the qualities and properties of matter. It cannot explain life, which is not matter. Life is a fact, or synthesis of facts, which we call a process, constantly taking place between the bodies of protoplasm in which it is observed and the rest of the world. Materialism cannot explain this balancing equation. The error of extending Materialism beyond the explanation of matter, as was done largely by Lucretius, and in the Materialistic schools of the last century, is a plain extension of a false and misleading character. Prof. Tyndall's expression about finding the "promise and potency" of life in atoms or matter other than protoplasm is entirely misleading. Materialism of this kind will soon discredit itself. Life is not in matter; it is the action and reaction of protoplasmic bodies, and in them only is it found.

But the success of Biology has been attended with a similar but a reversed danger of misapplication of the facts, laws, and methods of life to material, and therefore to disparate phenomena.

As the organic world was formerly materialized, the material world is now being biologized by analogies borrowed from the higher organic sciences. In this way the great law of Evolution, which applies to the organic world only, is thrown back even to the very basis of Cosmogony, as though nebulæ were so much protoplasm or colloid matter. In this way, it is sought by a vegetable analogy to frame a hypothesis that shall guess out the origin of stars and solar systems and the masses and distributions of the matter that forms the earth. This has been pointed out as the great defect of the works of Mr. Spencer and Prof. Fiske, and the point seems to be well taken. They biologize the whole Cosmos, apparently under the influence of this false analogy.

It would seem to be for this reason that the physical, or abstract concrete sciences—i. e., Astronomy, Physics, and Chemistry—are wholly passed over and not elaborated in their works. These sciences are the very basis of any and of all objective science, but they are omitted, and we are left to wonder how they could possibly be treated as examples of the "universal law of evolution." There is really no evolution in them.

The hypothesis of the growth of the solar system from a presumed preëxistent nebula seems the basis of science with them. This is an example of the fallacy before us. This hypothesis has been administered very persistently, authoritively, and in so many shapes by Kant, Laplace, Herschel, Comte, Spencer, Fiske, that many people suppose that it is science, and its consequences are placed in school books as if proved. It should be borne in mind that it is, and probably never can be anything more than, a hypothesis, and a very dubious one at that. It furnishes a twofold instance of this fallacy of misplaced method we are illustrating, for in it the methods and processes of abstract mechanics and of biology are applied to explain the disparate phenomena of astronomy entirely beyond their reach.

If solar systems could be made experimentally or mechanically, or could be hatched and raised biologically, as Mr. Darwin raises varieties of pigeons, or if they could be found growing, so that either the method of experiment or comparison could be applied, grounds might be found upon which to sustain this hypothesis. The spectroscope, it is claimed, does show veritable nebulæ, but this is not sufficient. It must be shown that they are condensing and rotating and working out or growing into solar systems; but of that no reliable instance is reported. If the stars, suns, and solar systems have been thus formed, some of them ought to be caught in the process of growth now. Until a real instance of the kind is found the whole hypothesis stands as a misplaced instance of mechanical and biological analogy.

There seems to be great need of reference to this matter, so that the difference between science and hypothesis may be kept distinct. The danger of confusing the two could have no better illustration than Messrs. Spencer and Fiske have afforded in hatching this nebular hypothesis. Their classification of the sciences seems as if made to perpetuate this confusion. Astronomy and biology are included in the same department as "aggregate" sciences, and then are treated to a full dose of biology. Evolution is thus propounded as a "universal law" of unquestioned extent and validity in the astronomical and material, as well as in the organic world. This law outside of the organic world rests upon hypothesis only, and the difficulties seemed to be carefully kept from sight. The "aggregate" of Astronomy, if it means the whole of it, must be infinite. How, then, can we reason from the whole to a part, or by comparison, as we do in biology?

The words grow, evolve, develop, always, by use and etymology, apply to organic bodies, and otherwise have but a figurative or poetical meaning. The organic world consists, comparatively speaking, of only a little film or mold on the earth's surface. In comparison it is smaller than the rust or fungus on the surface of an orange. It is entirely dependent upon the forces and protoplasm upon the earth's surface for its existence, as well as the form and mode of its increment and evolution. The words accumulate, form, change, aggregate, are words that describe the processes of outward formation in the material world. In the organic world the increase is within, that is, in each cell of the whole mass, which thus evolves from within outward, instead of forming on the outside like crystals. This difference of increment is fundamental.

We must beware of mistaking our metaphors and figures of speech for laws of science. Not that hypothesis and imagination are not useful; they are the scaffolding of science, but not its substance. And in this case it seems that a better hypothesis is at hand. We refer to the aggregation hypothesis. The materials of that hypothesis are being found in the phenomena treated of by meteorology and cometology. It is that the sun and planets have been formed by the slow aggregation of comets and meteors.

Mr. Proctor, in chapter ix of his book, "Other Worlds than Ours," and in various lectures, has presented this hypothesis drawn from the sciences last named, whereby the genesis of the sun and solar system is accounted for by the gradual "aggregation" of cometic and meteoric matter during the infinity of past time.

This latter hypothesis is an appeal similar to that of Lyell in geology to known causes, which, with unlimited time, seem to be sufficient to produce the effects we see That the sun is a target for comets, of which there are "more in the heavens than there are fish in the sea," we are constantly reminded. That tons of meteoric matter are added to the earth every year may be learned from Dr. P. H. Van der Weyde's article on "Aerolites" in Appleton's Encyclopedia. This hypothesis has, then, good and known ground to start upon, and Mr. Proctor goes on to explain on this supposition, as the nebular hypothesis cannot, the motion and heat of the sun, the position, size, and weight of the planets, and the motion of the whole system in space. By this hypothesis the sun and his system have a chance of slow but continual enlargement from the straying matter it is constantly picking up in its path through space.

Its ingenious author gives us an explanation of the zodiacal light and the rings of Saturn, and indeed seems to make out a very plausible hypothesis, which, in process of time, may be verified, modified, or rejected. But this hypothesis is legitimate; it deals with known facts and forces and borrows nothing from other sciences. The forces that move our sun and system, and of which its heat and all of its motions are correlates, come from the infinite and are exhaustless as far as we can know. Our sun is, then, but a globe of glowing matter and gases in the current of celestial forces. Thus, if we must have a genetic hypothesis of the solar system, let us take it from meteoric, material physics only, and rest it upon known causes, and observed facts of that domain, and not confound the formation of suns with the growth of microscopic cells and organisms on our little planet.

This cometic or aggregation hypothesis has other advantages as a working hypothesis in the structure of a philosophy and a religion. It is optimistic and hopeful. It relieves us, happily, from the last chapters of Spencer's "First Principles," which are not science, inasmuch as they have nothing but the illegitimate extension of this biological law formed into an astrogeny to rest upon.

These chapters are decidedly the most baseless, repellant, and horrible in human literature. They sing the death of the solar system out of pure imagination. They have little more scientific foundation than Byron's dream of "Darkness," which seems to have suggested them and which they exceed in horror. Upon the aggregation hypothesis, on the contrary, and resting upon known facts, the solar system has but begun its course of enlargement, and mankind only commenced its course of adaption to the increasing grandeur of his little earth and its environment. The increase of his capacity attained by this constant development required by the increase of the earth and solar system may possibly enable mankind to realize the wild dream of Winwood Reade, in his "Martyrdom of Man," of communicating with other planets and other races than ours, if such exist or are developed in them in the course of time. The Cosmos may not be merely the scene of our solar tragedy after all, but rather of a human drama, following a higher destiny of planets and solar systems.

As Mr. Mill teaches in his last essay, we should meet and examine all that comes with a noble and sublime resignation, but with the remembrance that hope, which is the growing impulse, is fed only by the optimist. To him we may, therefore, turn over the duty of making hypotheses about the origin of solar systems, until there is reason to suppose they can be actually verified. At least let him have an equal chance with the destructionist and pessimist.

In the common use of the word, Evolution is a law of the organic world only. The gulf between Chemistry and Biology is bridged by correlation only—not by Evolution. Plants, animals, men, and societies grow, evolve, develop, die, and dissolve. Suns, planets, rocks, stones, fluids, and gases do not. Mr. Spencer's big words and long definitions have merely confused the plain distinction that common people, as well as scientists, have agreed upon and have before them in forms too plain to be mystified by metaphoric analogies. Before the scientific world his notions of inorganic development stand as hypotheses only, nebulous as well as nebular, and not as proved scientific theories—that is, not, as science—not as parts of the "New Gospels."

The proper use of the words growth and Evolution will further appear as we now pass forward in the organic sciences, of which they are the very foundation. In them both Spencer and Fiske grandly compensate by their services for the defects we have just pointed out. They are as grand in biology and sociology as they are misleading among the nebulæ.

The story of Biology is the story of Evolution. It is the growth and multiplication of cells into organisms, ever more and more complex in organs and functions, as their environments ever renewedly present to them the alternatives of higher changes or of death. Life is the correlate, not only of the chemical and physical changes in the organism, but also of the forces that surround and impinge upon it from the environment. Both concur in forming and sustaining life, and both must be taken into account in explaining it, from its lowest to its highest manifestations. As the Copernican theory, and gravity, are the explanation of Astronomy, the theory of Evolution and Selection is the explanation of the organic world. The works of Darwin, Huxley, Haeckel, followed up by the philosophy of Spencer and Fiske, make a new era in human progress, only second to that made by Copernicus and Newton in Astronomy. [TO BE CONTINUED]

What I Don't Believe.

PART II.—NO. 64.

727. In Matt. xvi, 4, is the following allusion to what is reckoned a prophecy: "A wicked and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign: and there shall be no sign given unto it but the sign of the prophet Jonas." Afterward it is continued in these words: "Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." If Jesus spoke these words he spoke an untruth, for he was not three days and three nights in the heart of the earth, but, if the story is true, only one day and two nights. And he was not in the heart of the earth at all, but on the outer crust of it, but a few feet at most below its surface, while to reach the heart of it he would have had to go four thousand miles. It would be well for prophets and their recorders to be more accurate in their language and not be guilty of such egregious mistakes. Matthew makes Jesus recognize and acknowledge as true one of the most absurd stories ever told—that a man could live three days in the belly of a fish under water. If Jesus ever said the words that Matthew puts into his mouth, he had far less sense and judgment than the world usually gives him credit for. But it is not likely that he ever said a word of the kind, but that it was an effort to get up another prophecy and fulfilment. His fondness for that sort of thing sticks out on all occasions. I cannot indorse his big stories.

728. The prophecies which Jesus is said to have made with regard to his second coming are badly mixed up with those of the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, which is very difficult for theologians to satisfactorily explain. The clear meaning of the language is that the second coming of Christ would follow "immediately" after the destruction of the city, and that within the lifetime of those present. We have this language: "Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass away till all these things be fulfilled" (Matt. xxiv, 34); "There be some standing here which shall not taste death till they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom" (Matt. xxiv, 28); and again, "Verily I say unto you, ye shall not have gone over the cities of Israel till the Son of Man be come" (Matt. x, 23). Here Matthew is again deep in the prophecies, and with about his usual success. If Jesus spoke those words he proved himself very untruthful, for his second coming did not take place while those around him were alive, nor has it taken place down to this day, though 1,850 years have passed away since that prediction was made. He indeed shot very wide of the mark. It is quite probable that 1,850 years more will pass away before any such event occurs; and long before that time entirely new religions will be embraced by men, and the story and predictions of Jesus will not be regarded as worth a row of pins. It must be remembered that the predictions regarding the destruction of Jerusalem were not written till after the event had transpired, when it was quite easy with such men as Matthew to make the prophecy tally with the fulfilment. The end of the world was at that time thought to be near at hand, as has been the case hundreds of times since, but Matthew shows conclusively that he could write prophecies of the things that had already taken place far better than of what was still in the future. If Jesus said those things, and had he been a true prophet, he would have been equally truthful in both cases; he would not have had a hit in one case and a miss in the other. The word "elect," which Matthew makes Jesus use, is a very strong proof that Jesus never used the language, for the word, in the sense there employed, was not in use till a long time after the period at which Jesus is said to have lived. This is a clear case of manufacturing the "word of God"—the putting into the mouth of Jesus words which he never spoke. Much more could be said on the fallacy and ridiculousness of prophecy. Some things like eclipses and results which depend upon natural causes can be foretold with accuracy, but I do not believe that the old gentlemen called the Jewish prophets knew any more of what was to take place six or eight hundred years afterward than do the old men of the present time; nor do I believe that Matthew understood these things any better than thousands of other persons, or that he was a reliable, truthful writer.

729. Having partially glanced at the four gospels, the remaining books of the New Testament require a brief notice. We will first look a little at the book of Acts. It is usually claimed to have been written by Luke. I do not believe that it was, nor that it is a truthful, reliable history of the events of which it treats. Renan styles the book of Acts as the "Christian Odyssey," and he was probably not far out of the way. It is perhaps just about as much a work of the imagination as Homer's celebrated poem. The book purports to be a record of the acts of the apostles, but it has little to say of any save Peter and Paul. The first twelve chapters are mainly occupied with Peter and his doings, after which Paul becomes the principal figure. A strong argument against Luke being the author of the work is the contradictions between it and the gospel of which he is claimed to be the author. For instance, in the account of the ascension in the gospel of Luke it is claimed to have taken place in Bethany, while in Acts it is said to have been on the Mount of Olives. Both statements cannot be true, nor is it at all probable that both accounts could have been written by the same person. Again in the gospel the ascension is put upon the same day of the resurrection, while in Acts it is said to be forty days afterward. No sane writer in giving two accounts of such an event could hardly be guilty of such falsehoods or differences of statement. The book of Acts abounds in the most startling and impossible miracles defying the utmost credibility and gullability, and throwing the gospel miracles far into the shade. The discrepancies between Acts and some of the epistles are unfortunate and destructive of the idea of accuracy and truth. In Acts, soon after Paul's conversion, he is said to go up to Jerusalem, where he commenced preaching Christianity. Paul himself, in Galatians, says he did not go up to Jerusalem for three years, and that he commenced preaching in Arabia. In Acts xv an account is given of a council held in Jerusalem to which Paul and Barnabas were sent from Antioch. Paul himself gives this statement the lie by giving an altogether different account, and he ought to know best. In Acts it is decreed that even gentiles must abstain from meats offered to idols, while Paul, in his epistle to the Corinthians, says directly to the contrary. Acts mentions a visit by Paul to Jerusalem between the first and second council. Paul distinctly implies to the contrary. Acts characterizes the gift of tongues as a remarkable gift of the Holy Ghost, but Paul declares it unmeaning, unintelligible gibberish. The account in Acts of the arrival of Paul in Rome is entirely different from what Paul himself says about it in his epistle to the Romans. In the first Christianity is virtually unknown; in the second a flourishing church is in existence. At the time of Paul's conversion his companions are represented both as hearing and as not hearing the voice of Jesus. Annas, the high priest, is represented as a Sadducee; it is known he was not so. The account of Simon Magus is full of doubtful particulars. Serious doubts have been entertained whether such a person ever existed. In the second century he was identified with Paul. In short, the narratives in Acts will scarcely bear examination. They abound in contradictions, incongruities, and impossibilities. There is very much in the book which a person cannot believe unless extremely credulous and full of faith.

730. The various speeches by different persons as given in Acts are too similar, too much in the same style, to have been given by different speakers and on diverse occasions. They clearly show themselves to have been gotten up by a person who could hardly affect two styles, and he was undoubtedly the author of the speeches instead of those whom he pretended to report. Peter, Stephen, and Paul all speak the same thoughts and in very much the same words. Peter was a Jewish Christian, but his reported speeches in Acts make him a Pauline Universalist. Paul's speeches have not at all the style of his epistles. It is said that the Greeks and Romans used to make up fine speeches and put them in the mouths of their generals and emperors. The writer of Acts seems to have acted upon the same fictitious plan. In Acts Paul is represented as beginning his preaching at Jerusalem among his countrymen, and that it was with reluctance that he left them to preach to the gentiles. He is represented as seeking the Jews first and leaving them only from the direst compulsion; but Paul's own statement contradicts these representations altogether. The account in Acts and his own epistle differ just as widely with regard to his relation to the other apostles. His own account is that his work was original, undertaken at his own instance, and carried on according to his own views; while in Acts the gentile work is represented as being carried on under the supervision of superiors at Jerusalem. It has been truthfully said that the Paul of Acts and Paul of his own epistle are two very different characters. The book contains many representations in similar conflict with other books of the New Testament. That they are all truthful, all reliable, is impossible.

731. The book of Acts is entirely anonymous. No one knows by whom it was written or the time when it was written. There is no account of any such book being in existence till the latter part of the second century. The ascribing of its authorship to Luke was not done till a hundred years after his death, and was undoubtedly done by some interested party to increase the credibility desired to be accorded to it. That Luke wrote it is wholly improbable. It was most likely written in the latter part of the second century by some zealous partisan of the church who was not at all scrupulous in the statements he made. The miracles given are of too astonishing and impossible a character to be believed for a moment unless corroborated by the most reliable evidence. No sensible man can reasonably believe such incredible assertions when made by a wholly unknown person, and sustained by no proof whatever. In my opinion it is just about as true as the tales of Baron Munchausen and the stories of the "Arabian Nights," though not as well told.

732. Of the Epistles little need be said. A part of them are probably genuine, and a portion are very probably not. All the best judges admit them to be the most authentic of any of the books of the New Testament, and by far the oldest portion. It is most generally conceded that Paul is the author of the Epistles to the Romans, the Corinthians, the Thessalonians, the Colossians, the Philippians, and barely the Ephesians. Among those which it is pretty certain he did not write are the epistles to the Hebrews, to Timothy, and to Titus. Hebrews does not even claim to be written by him, while some deny that he wrote Colossians and Ephesians. Even the authenticity of Romans, Corinthians, and Galatians was denied by Bruno Baun. The nominal epistles of Paul are classed under four heads—those that are certainly by Paul—Romans, Corinthians, and Galatians; those in doubt as to his authorship—Ephesians, Colossians, Philippians, second Thessalonians, Philemon, first Thessalonians; those almost certainly not by Paul—the two Timothys, and one to Titus; one certainly not by Paul—the Epistle to the Hebrews. The ablest critics accord four epistles to Paul with considerable certainty, and the remaining ones with greater or less doubt, and believe them to have been written from 55 to 65 A. D. In reality, however, but little is known about it; and for this uncertainty we may consider ourselves that it does not make very much difference. If it be given up that Paul really wrote them, or the most of them, it does not make them materially better or worse. He was only a man, and possessed prejudices and faults much the same as other men. That he was commissioned by heaven to write what he did any more than I am commissioned to write what I am writing now, I do not believe.

733. There is one feature in the Pauline epistles, and in fact in nearly all of them, well enough to be mentioned. They set up no claim for the miraculous conception of the Virgin Mary, or that Jesus had not a natural father the same as other men. They were written seventy-five years or more before the gospels and the book of Acts were penned, and before the absurd doctrine of the immaculate conception had been set up. That was a dogma added to the Christian creed long after the time of Paul. It should also be observed that the epistles do not recite such impossible miracles as the gospels and Acts abound with. Miracles were undoubtedly also an after-consideration, and did not form a part of Christianity in its earliest stages. As the time elapsed from the date when Christianity was said to have its birth the remarkable miracles were handed out to the people, and they were required to believe them, and thus they became incorporated into the system, and devotees of the system were required to believe them under penalty of an eternal roasting. I discard them.

THE Liberal and scientific publishing house of D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth street, New York city, is a prolific source of Infidelity in book form. Its latest production is a volume entitled, "What Objections to Christianity? the Bennett Mair Discussion," between D. M. Bennett and G. M. Mair, a book of nearly a thousand pages, containing twenty-four letters from each of the above-named gentlemen, in which a mass of information and argument on both sides is presented in a way that cannot fail to interest and instruct whoever peruses the book. To that numerous class of people who wish to fortify themselvs for the discussion of theological subjects it will prove of great value.

The above house has also recently issued a book which should be in the library of every Freethinker in the land who has not already something of the kind. It is entitled "Voltaire in Exile," giving his life and works in France, England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, and Switzerland, with unpublished letters of Voltaire and Madam Du Chatelet. The book is a translation from the French of Benjamin Gastineau, made with the author's approval by Messrs. F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg. In the table of contents we find the following titles among others: Voltaire's youth, Voltaire and J. J. Rousseau, Voltaire and Frederick the Great, Voltaire and Pope Benedict XIV., life in Paris, Berlin, Switzerland, and at Ferney, Voltaire and Catharine II., the works, propagandism, and philosophical system of Voltaire. A chapter is devoted to the enemies of Voltaire and to Voltaire as a poet and dramatic author. This "wandering Jew of intelligence and Freethought," now the idol of the French nation, from which he was during most of his life an exile, deserves to be better known in America than he is, and this book will serve well to introduce him. It ought to hav a wide distribution and large sale.—Winsted Press.

I hav read "Voltaire in Exile," and was highly interested in it. The perusal of this volume has whetted my appetite for more and better knowledge of this wonderful man. I shall soon take up Parton's great work on Voltaire and continue the feast of reason. Benjamin Gastineau has presented the public with a very racy and exciting description of the adventures of the sage of Ferney. One wonders how such a man could liv in such an age and country. But I will not attempt any criticism on the book, but will say it is excellent. W. S. BELL.

A GOOD WORD FOR THE DEVIL. By Simeon Palmer, M. D. Price, 50 cents. For sale at this office.

This pamphlet is the musical musings of an Infidel. The verse is better put together than in many more pretentious volumes, and wit, humor, and pathos are all found in its pages. It contains a frontispiece of the wily serpent, the evil tree, and Adam and Eve in their simplicity of dress, copied from a Babylonian cylinder, and a picture of the primitiv couple in the act of partaking of the fruit, copied from an old New England primer of 1777, which givs a good idea of what our Puritan forefathers thought to be the orthodox plan of the "fall" of man. The book is printed on good paper, in large type, and contains 136 pages. It will serve to amuse a good many, and much instruction may also be gleaned from its pages.

Not a Blooming Specimen.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The trial of Elder Atwater, of Huron, Wis., for adultery is postponed to the March term of the circuit court. The elder is not, as lately issued in THE TRUTH SEEKER, a blooming specimen of physical manhood, but is lean, pale, and cadaverous, and given to "nervous prostration"—in short, a typical holy-ghoster. MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is $5 to help bring that noble old truth seeker home. Thy friend,
G. B. NELSON.

HOWLAND FLAT, CAL., Dec. 1, 1881.
MR. EDITOR: Please find draft of $5 on the Round-the-World enterprise, $3 on my subscription, and the remainder as directed. Yours, H. J. WILSDORFF.

OTTUMWA, IOWA, Dec. 10, 1881.
MR. EDITOR: I never promised anything to send Mr. Bennett around the world, for I was of the opinion we could not well do without him at home. I am well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER and the able manner in which the present editor has conducted it since Mr. Bennett left. Herein find $5 to bring him back home to friends and editorial seat, $3 to my credit, to be added to the next year when my time expires. Yours truly, JAMES M. PECK, SR.

WEST LEIPSIC, O., Dec. 10, 1881.
EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Please accept this $5 as a contribution to the fund for the Round-the-Wor d trip of friend Bennett. I was not among the early subscribers to the fund, not wishing him to go away on a long and perilous journey, and believing that he and the means so invested could do more good here at home. But now that the enterprise is undertaken, and Mr. Bennett is off, and more aid is needed to complete the noble and ambitious undertaking, and time for subscription is short, I hasten to hav my name enrolled "before it is eternally and everlastingly too late-ah." Yours truly,
DR. W. E. WOODDELL.

HENRY, COL., Dec. 12, 1881.
EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Please find inclosed $6, which you will place as follows: $5 for Round-the-World books, which you will please send to Miss Laura M. Coryell, Glidden, Carroll county, Iowa, and $1 add to my subscription. Although I am late in the list, I hope I will not be left. I am satisfied that the books will be of more use than five dollars' worth of superstition and darkness.
Yours for success, R. C. CORYELL.

HOYTVILLE, MICH., Dec. 12, 1881.
EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed please find $9.50—$5 for the Round-the-World fund, and as my subscription runs out on the first of January next please credit me with the same for one year from that date. I would state that I saw Mr. Green's notice in the paper how to work for our cause and how to help the THE TRUTH SEEKER and encourage our old hero abroad by getting as many new subscribers as possible. I have found three subscribers. Please send the papers as directed.
From your well-wisher, CALEB WOLLFERT.

FOREST GROVE, OR., NOV. 10, 1881.
FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please find $6—five for the Round-the-World fund, and one dollar for a large picture of yourself and Bro. Ingersoll. I sent my name among the first, but hav only just got the money to send, so I hope we won't be counted out of the faithful at the day of judgment, viz., the day of distribution of the book "Around the World."

We hav a Liberal League at Forest Grove of over forty members; some of the very best men in the town are stanch Liberals, and what we want is a good lecturer to stir us up once in a while. We hav had no Liberal wedding here, as Mrs. Dean wrote you from Joseph, Oregon, but we hav had a Liberal christening, which is just as good. Mr. and Mrs. Clow of this place hav a little daughter which they allowed myself and Miss Hampton, a daughter of our Liberal postmaster, to name. We stood sponsors for it, and named it Genevieve Ingersoll. We had no priest and no water, but we know if the young lady livs to be grown she will be proud of her name.

We had a course of lectures delivered by Prof. York last summer. He is a clear, forcible speaker, and generally makes a rustling among the dry bones of orthodoxy when here. If we could only hav more of the same kind it would be better for the town, for we hav some church-members here that are completely fossilized; they ought to hav lived in Calvin's time; they would hav carried fagots for the burning of Servetus with the greatest pleasure. These are only very few, however, and the all rest are cultured, Liberal-minded, pleasant people that it is a pleasure to be with. We hav a college and university here that would be a grand thing for the country if the faculty could only remember that it was a school for the dissemination of knowledge and not a Jesuit establishment. But they cannot be made to see that, so they hav their Sunday services, their student's prayer-meetings, and the students get nothing without religion in it, not even arithmetic, for I suppose when they hav the rule of three they only hav it to prove that three gods are one and is three. They had one very popular prefessor, a Christian too, but who was a genial, pleasant, friendly gentleman who believed in letting every one think for himself, and who would favor letting the students hav a little fun once in a while besides prayer-meeting. He taught here six years, gave the best of satisfaction to the students, but didn't suit the intensely orthodox; so at a meeting of the board of trustees they trumped up a few charges, got his dismissal secured, kept it quiet for six weeks during the summer vacation, giving him no chance to meet any of the trumped-up charges, and then sent him the notice through the mail. His friends hav been and are very indignant at the way he has been treated. Some students hav left, going to the more Liberal college at Eugene City. Others are threatening to follow suit, and altogether the board hav made themselvs very unpopular and hav not done the gentleman any harm, for he has given up teaching and gone into business where no one will hav a mortgage on him, body or soul, and where he can liv up to his honest convictions; and just now I believe his honest convictions are that Christians can do very nasty things sometimes all in the name of the meek and lowly. Prof. J. D. Robb is the man's name, and he and his estimable wife are among our first citizens. He has the sympathy of all our best people, and we hope he will do so well in his new vocation that he will never be under the necessity of asking a favor from another orthodox school-board.

Wishing you a happy, prosperous journey and safe return, I remain, Yours, MRS. SARAH C. TODD.

BART, Dec. 1, 1881.

"The eminent jurist excoriates the great Infidel. The intemperate abuse of God and the scriptures condemned in plain language that cannot be misunderstood."

Such is the bombastic language that heads an article in the Philadelphia Press of November 10th by Judge Black. This great new Infidel smasher and defender of the faithful has called a halt, kicked out of the harness, cursed Ingersoll and the North American Review, and quit. Now this judge is great, he is talented, which is clearly proven by this article from beginning to end. His ability and genius crop out in everything he touches, particularly in the line of throwing mud and slime. For proof witness this article of his in the Philadelphia Press. He says: "Fifty pages of the foulest and falsest libel that was ever written against God or man was sent to me." How is this for ability as a blackguard and falsifier? Does it not stand pretty high? According to him, Mr. Ingersoll is the foulest and falsest liar now on the face of the earth. But I should not wonder if a great number of intelligent people should conclude that Judge Black himself was fairly and honestly entitled to wear the champion's belt.

Next to Mr. Ingersoll the editor of the Review comes in for a little of his excoriated mud. But hear him: "The barest thought that the judge of all the earth aids right fills him (Ingersoll) with rancor, which he pours out page after page, and then repeats it again and again, unpacks his heart with words, and falls to cursing like a very drab, a scullion These furious outbreaks of intemperate use of God, his laws, and institutions do not disturb any one's belief at all or diminish the awful reverence which a Christian feels for the supreme object of his adoration. He is simply doing the part of a common scold, to whom the idle listen for the sport of the thing, while others, taking counsel of those outraged feelings, think him a nuisance that ought to be abated. This is, perhaps, not very easy to do. A woman for such an offense could be ducked under rule of the ancient law, but when a communes vexatrix of the male gender vexes the peace of a neighborhood in this way the remedy is difficult and doubtful."

Had the judge lived in the days of the Duke of Alva or of John Calvin he might hav rivaled these two pious worthies in spreading the gospel by fire and fagot to his heart's content. He has, no doubt, done his very best in this discussion with Ingersoll, has utterly failed, got mad, kicked out of the traces, and has now got down on the low plane a brutal, slanderous libeler and mud-thrower. No doubt this dirty, slanderous article of his in the Press will cause thousands of the faithful to believe that Col. Ingersoll is a vile, blasphemous wretch and not fit to liv. Probably no one knows better than Black himself how completely he has been whipped, but, like a cowardly bigot, he has sought to crush his able and generous opponent by defamation and slander.

Finding himself unable to prop up the tottering fabric of Christianity and that old barbarian book, the Bible, against his able antagonist, he has become desperate, and with a malignant rancor worthy that old demon-god of the Bible and of Christianity seeks to destroy him by the vilest slander.

Not content with slandering Mr. Ingersoll, he must pitch into the editor of the Review for no other reason, it seems, than trying to be impartial and giv each a fair hearing. Had the editor been partial to Black, had he headed his articles like this one in the Press, had he petted and patted him on the back and belittled Ingersoll, that would hav been all right. But being soundly whipped, and smarting under the lash, he strikes out wildly and aims a blow at his own friends in his desperation. Slander and proscription is the old, old argument so common and so effectful from the days of Constantine down to date. When foiled in argument with heretics and Infidels they could imprison, hang, or burn them. This kind of argument was extremely satisfactory and most effectual. It abated all heresy and Infidelity, and kept their religion pure and undefiled.

It has ever been the policy of Christians to treat Infidels as if they had no rights Christians were bound to respect, and to lie and slander for the glory of God and good of the church has been counted meritorious. Judge Black should remember in these days of railroads, telegraphs, schools, and printing-presses, a lie started may travel fast and far but the truth sent out in pursuit may soon overtake it. This slander, "excoriation of the great Infidel by the Judge," will hardly take so well in this age of reason and science as did the vile slanders in the days of Paine and Voltaire. They will hardly stick except to the ignorant and bigoted faithful who swallow everything from the Holy Ghost to a Noah's ark or a whale.

The judge boasts of applying the judicial test to Ingersoll's assertions; hear him: "A just criticism could not be made without some reference to his mental peculiarities, which, with habits of shallow thinking and rash talking, made him an utterly incompetent judge of the subject he pretended to argue. I found the proofs of this within the four corners of his own paper. There, also, I learned that he was without any acknowledged standard of right and wrong! It was legitimate to notice that because it accounted satisfactorily for his other utterances."

Phew! what a discovery; most wonderful! What, Robert G. Ingersoll, one or the few greatest men of this age or any other age, the finished orator, the the just, upright man, the model husband and father, a fool, an idiot that don't know right from wrong! Can this be so? Is it possible that after all the great Ingersoll is a fool? The Philadelphia Press calls him "the great Infidel," but this eminent judge calls him a fool, and he ought to know by this time. Now this excoriating business is a game two can play at, and I congratulate Mr. Ingersoll on the nice little breakfast job that's cut out for him. It will not take him more than ten or fifteen minutes to do up this lordly, egotistical, judicial blackguard and slanderous disciple of Blackstone. J. M. KING.

MEMPHIS, MO., Dec. 1, 1881.
MR. EDITOR: I see by your last issue that friend Lake feels agrieved by my commending to his consideration the following, which I chanced to see in some paper as I was about to reply to his "Open Letter:" "The truly sane man has no opinion with regard to a matter about which he knows nothing." I still consider it a self-evident truth. But as my friend considers its application as interfering with his rights as an American citizen, the edict is hereby revoked, and in future he is to hav perfect liberty to believe the moon to be made of green cheese, or to pronounce an opinion as dogmatic as he "darn pleases" on any subject whatever, whether he knows anything about it or not.

Io Victis.*

I sing the hymn of the conquered, who fell in the battle of life—
The hymn of the wounded, the beaten, who died overwhelmed in the strife;
Not the jubilant song of the victors, for whom the resounding acclaim
Of nations was lifted in chorus, whose brows wore the chaplet of fame—
But the hymn of the low and the humble, the weary, the broken in heart,
Who strove and who failed, acting bravely a silent and desperate part;
Whose youth bore no flower in its branches, whose hopes burned in ashes away,
From whose hands slipped the prize they had grasped at, who stood at the dying of day
With the work of their life all around them, unpitied, unheeded, alone,
With death swooping down o'er their failure, and all but their faith overthrown.

While voice of the world shouts its chorus, its pæan for those who hav won—
While the trumpet is sounding triumphant, and high to the breeze and the sun
Gay banners are waving, hands clapping, and hurrying feet
Thronging after the laurel-crowned victors—I stand on the field of defeat,
In the shadow, 'mongst those who are fallen and wounded and dying—and there
Chant a requiem low, place my hand on their pain-knotted brows, breathe a prayer,
Hold the hand that is hapless, and whisper, "They only the victory win
Who hav fought the good fight and hav vanquished the demon that tempts us within;
Who hav held to their faith unseduced by the prize that the world holds on high;
Who hav dared for a high cause to suffer, resist, fight—if need be, to die."

Speak, history! Who are life's victors? Unroll thy long annals and say,
Are they those whom the world called the victors who won the success of the day?
The martyrs, or Nero? The Spartans who fell at Thermopylæ's tryst,
Or the Persians and Xerxes? His judges or Socrates? Pilate or Christ?

—W. W. Story, in Blackwood's Magazine.

* Hurrah for the conquered!

All or Nothing.

Happy the man whose far remove
From business and the giddy throng
Fits him in the paternal groove
Unquestioning to glide along.
Apart from struggle and from strife,
Content to liv by labor's fruits,
And wander down the vale of life
In gingham shirt and cowhide boots.

He too is blest who, from within
By strong and lasting impulse stirred,
Faces the turmoil and the din
Of rushing life; whom hope deferred
But man incites: who never strives,
And wants, and works, and waits until
The multitude of other lives
Pay glorious tribute to his will.

But he who, greedy of renown,
Is too tenacious of his ease,
Alas for him! Nor busy town
Nor country with his mood agrees;
Eager to reap, but loath to sow.
He longs *monstrari digito
And looking on with envious eyes,
Lives restless and obscurely dies.

*To be admired.

WHAT OBJECTIONS TO

THE

Bennett-Mair Discussion.

BETWEEN

D. M. BENNETT and G. H. MAIR.

(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the following theses:
1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.
2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.
3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.
4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.
5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.
6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.
7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founded upon the doctrin and authority of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progress and improvement.
8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which man kind are capable of receiving.

Anthony Comstock

In Answer to His Open Letter Sent to the Newspapers.

465 FULTON ST., BROOKLYN.

SIR: I hav before me a seven-paged open letter, addressed to myself, intended for publication in all the evening and morning papers, copies of which I am prepared to prove, were sent to every daily and several weekly papers, the publishers of which refused to publish it, consigning the precious product of your labors to the waste paper basket. For this I am truly sorry, as it would hav given me an admirable opportunity to show th public the true inwardness of the man who could pen such a letter, and yet cl im to be a Christian and a protector of the public from the vicious members of society. A more vicious letter could not be penned, and the evidence of malice crops out in every sentence You first claim that the courts honorably acquitted you. If they did, then I know nothing of th words honorable acquittal. You were arrested for publishing a malicious libel, and taken in the charge of an officer before the magistrates. You then waived examination. If you had written truthfully, why were you afraid of examination? I was present in the court to confront you on your vile charge. You were silent.

After the lapse of several weeks I received an order from Judge Smith's court to attend such court respecting my charge against you, and believing that you would submit to an examination and giv some excuse for your act, I went, accompanied by over fifty witnesses, so that a special court had to be set aside for my special case against you. Well, let us examin as to what followed. I stood there without counsel, ready to defend my order of arrest. I was strong in the proof of my charge against you, and did not require an attorney to quibble on points of law. You, on the other hand, had an attorney—a man in whom any person may trust their case as a legal adviser, and outside the law I hav reason to know that Mr. Tenney, your solicitor, is a gentleman and a noble-hearted man. He must hav felt seriously the weakness of your case, as set forth in your libelous letter, and therefore, as an act of charity toward you, advised you not to submit to an examination He, good fellow, by special pleading, decided to take exception on points of law, and attempted to show that not the spirit and intent of your libelous letter should be gone into, but the actual wording only should be considered, and that therefore the same should be adjudged as a privileged communication, and on this ground pleaded for a dismissal. This I objected to, whereupon your solicitor proposed that a brief be prepared, setting forth the reasons why my complaint against you should be dismissed. I then stated in the presence of that court, that all I required was a full investigation into the facts. It was then arranged that the District Attorney should take charge of the case as prosecuting counsel on behalf of the people against Anthony Comstock, I being promised at that time that such investigation should be made on the following Wednesday. But, feeling that there was some crooked business going on, and an attempt being made to frustrate justice, I employed one of our best attorneys, and he wrote a letter to the Judge, to the District Attorney, and your attorney for copy or nature of such brief. Not only so, but myself and attorney applied at Jefferson Market Police Court next day, and we were told that Justice Solon Smith had gone into the country, and would not be back until Monday following, the court officer to whom we spoke intimating that as the Comstock case was in the hands of Justice Solon Smith, nothing would be done until his return. Picture, therefore, my astonishment upon receiving a notice from the court that the case had been dismissed without an investigation into the facts which led to the writing of your letter, neither myself nor one of my witnesses being called, and yet you hav in your letter the audacity to tell the public that you were honorably acquitted. May heaven save the public when such honorable acquittals shall follow the publication of such vile letters as that penned by you to hundreds of my patients! So much for your "honorable acquittal." Now, as to your having evaded arrest or not, the facts are these: I did not dream of having you arrested until after I had written my letter to you, which appeared in all the newspapers. I called at your office personally three or four times, as did also my half-brother, David Cotter. We were each told by persons in your office that you had gone into the country, and would not be back for a week; but on being told by persons on Nassau street that you were seen in the immediate neighborhood not long after my calling, I felt that you were evading me, and deliberately refusing to giv me the names of those whom you pretended had made statements against me. It was your thus evading me which caused me to take criminal proceedings against you, and forthwith instruct counsel to sue out a warrant against you for criminal libel. After such warrant was in the hands of the officer, such officer and several of my witnesses sought you at your office. They were told by persons in your office that you had gone into the country, as I had before been told. On the morning of your arrest my half-brother, David Cotter, called at your office, in response to a telegram received by me. He was then told that you were away in the country. He went straight from your office to that of Howe & Hummel, and there met a private detectiv who offered there and then to disclose the whereabouts of Anthony Comstock, if the $100 reward, which I had offered for his arrest, should be given him. This was promised, and David Cotter then went and apprised the officer who held the warrant, and they went in company to your office, when they were jointly told by persons sitting there that you were away, and they did not know when you would return; whereupon the officer, acting upon the information given by the detectiv above named, proceeded to a room in the upper part of the building wherein several voices were heard. The door was opened in response to the knocking of the officer, when a number of gentlemen were seen sitting around a table as if in committee. Anthony Comstock was inquired for, and denied being there. Upon retiring voices were heard in a room close by. Inquiry was made if Anthony Comstock was within. The person who opened the door replied that Anthony Comstock was not there, when the door was closed. My half-brother, who was waiting in the lobby, made a ruse as if running down stairs, the officer, all the time standing outside, beside the door. The same person who had before opened the door opened it again. The officer, by a rapid movement of the foot, kept the door open and then walked in and arrested yourself, Anthony Comstock. If this was not hiding from arrest, I fail to understand what hiding means, and as you hav in your open letter mentioned the fact of my having offered one hundred dollars reward, and that I had refused to pay the person giving the information, I beg leave here to state that the hundred dollars was paid to the detectiv in the presence of several witnesses, one of whom was a merchant and manufacturer in your immediate neighborhood of Nassau street So much for your arrest. Was it with or without evasion?

Now, as to the next portion of your open letter: You say there is a law prohibiting the transmission of letters and circulars concerning schemes to deceive and defraud the public or obtain money by false pretense, through the mails. You knew very well when you were writing that sentence that it had no application whatever to my case, inasmuch as the following open letter to the physicians of Brooklyn was before you, offering every physician or scientific man a free entry into my factory and consulting rooms, and in the same letter offering five thousand dollars' worth of my goods to the poor of Brooklyn. Why did you not avail yourself of the offer and hav called at my consulting rooms and manufactory for inquiry before writing your libelous letter to the hundreds of my patients? You could hav no excuse as to time and place, for this reason, viz., that my establishment is one of the most prominent in Brooklyn, and in close proximity to your own residence, so that nothing but malice aforethought could hav induced you to hav written such a letter, while the following offer to the physicians of Brooklyn was before you in the circular or pamphlet from which you obtained the names of my patients to whom you wrote. If you wish to excuse yourself re-read the following:

WM. WILSON'S OPEN LETTER

To the Physicians and the Commissioners of Charities of the City of Brooklyn.

GENTLEMEN—Two years ago in Europe I invented and patented a magnetic appliance for the relief and cure of disease. My system is one that was never before attempted, but its simplicity places it among the many great improvements in the history of science which, after its inception, has caused thousands to wonder why so valuable an addition to the necessities of our race should hav been so long overlooked.

The success of my appliances in the cure of disease in England was such that over THIRTY THOUSAND persons were clothed in them, and not one case of failure when the proper appliances were worn, as recommended. In the face of such success in Europe, I determined that the people of America should be made acquainted with the fact. I arrived in Brooklyn only a few months ago and commenced the sale of my goods at No. 465 Fulton street, since which time I hav, in Brooklyn and neighborhood, over a THOUSAND persons wearing my appliances for the diseases above mentioned—all of whom came to me only as a last resort, having failed to get relief from any of their physicians And these persons were as readily relieved as were those of Europe—NINETY-NINE PER CENT of whom will tell you to-day on application to them that my appliances gave time all the relief promised. A printed list of my clients is at your disposal so that you may satisfy yourself of the truth of the above statement. My proposition therefore is that I hand over to the medical men of Brooklyn FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS worth of my appliances, to be used only on the person of the sick poor now and likely to be in my charitable institutions and hospitals. The only condition I make is that I myself clothe the patients according to my own judgment and be allowed to retain watchers at my own expense that the patients do not receive any medicin during the wearing of my appliances, and that a proper report be supplied from time to time, so that I, at my own expense, can publish the record of the cures by my appliances. I further wish that every medical man in Brooklyn should call at my manufactory and examinior himself the processes of manufacture and make himself thoroughly acquainted with my system. My factory is open for inspection at all hours to any physician, chemist, or scientist, and in close proximity to my own business premises the same physicians may see for themselvs the patients who hav been relieved by my appliances. All physicians and chemists who hav examined my goods hav avalled themselv of my invention, are to-day wearing my appliances, and recommending the same to their patients with marked success.

The aforesaid gift of FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS' worth of goods will be delivered from time to time, as agreed upon by a committee of yourselvs, on application to me a few days in advance, stating the disease for which they are required, so that I can supply the best possible form of my invention. Hoping you will avail yourselvs of my offer, I remain, gentlemen, Your obediently,

WILLIAM WILSON
No. 465 Fulton st., Brooklyn.

In face of the above letter, what pretense can you find for your conduct? Why did you not giv me the names of the parties whom you pretended had writ ten to you? The fact is, no one did write to you except a lot of conspiring doctors, and to please them you became their tool.

In the next part of your open letter you refer to a letter you sent me, and say as follows: "Why did you, like Ananias and Sapphira of old, keep back a part; why did you not tell the public that I wrote you personally on the 15th of September?" Your memory must be very bad in this particular, or you did not read the newspapers. Insomuch that this paragraph appeared in the Truth newspaper on September 20th, under the caption of "The Romance of Anthony Comstock's Arrest, and what Led to It," and directly following the $100 reward, I refer to the very letter which you say I never noticed:

"And the next morning I received a cringing letter, written after the reward was offered, as shown by the postal date on the envelope, Brooklyn postmark, 2 A. M., September 16. Now I was told in his office on the 15th of September, at two in the afternoon, that he had gone away for a week. Who told the lie? Did he order his subordinates so to do, or did they do so of their own accord? The next day, September 16th, my half brother, David Cotter, with the detectives and the court officer, went to Comstock's office. They were told that he was in the country, and did not know when he would return. They were then told that a letter was written by Comstock to William Wilson the night previous. At this the clerks seemed surprised, and said, 'Well, we do not know where he is, nor when he will return.'

"A private detectiv then told my half brother where to find him, and said he was hid away in an upper room in the same building. There the officers went, knocking at one door where voices were heard within, but the door was locked. Then in another room adjacent an attempt was made to discover him among a company of gentlemen sitting apparently in committee, but Comstock could not be seen. A ruse of running down stairs was made, only to retrace their steps just in time to find the door gently open that had before been tried and found locked. The officer slipped his foot between the door jamb and, walking into the room, arrested the great Anthony Comstock. He was taken before Justice Smith and committed in the following words of committal:

"'It appearing to me by the within depositions and statements that the crime therein mentioned has been committed, and that there is sufficient cause to believe the within-named Anthony Comstock guilty thereof, I order that he be held to answer and be admitted to bail in the sum of five hundred dollars, and be committed to the warden or keeper of the city prison of the city of New York until he givs such bail. SOLON B. SMITH,

"'Police Justice.

"'Dated September 16, 1881.'"

You will therefore see, on referring to your open letter, that you admit that my first public communication against your act was printed on the 14th day of Sept., and yet you charge me with being like Ananias and Sapphira of old, by keeping back a part. How could I mention, in my communication of the 14th, that which was not written by you until the 15th? But you know very well that the letter you refer to as having been kept back was referred to as above on the 20th day of September, that being the first letter from myself after receiving the letter written by you on the 15th. You therefore utterly fail to show in your open letter that I had kept anything back. In the same open letter you refer to a lawsuit in Ireland between Wetton & Co., and William Wilson, of No. 64¾ Patrick street, Cork, and the most malicious act that any man could conceive is the taking the trouble of writing to Ireland for information respecting a man and when such information is received, telling one-half the story in a open letter to the public and keeping back the other half. This you know you hav done, and I challenge you to publish at your own cost your open letter, as I at my own cost shall publish this. Your malicious act in thus concealing the real nature of the lawsuit between Wetton and myself as rival manufacturers and large employers of labor is an act unworthy of the commonest informer. I hav a deed from the British government wherein, on the settlement of that suit as above rererred to, such deed binds my opponents to pay me a large sum of money in settlement thereof. Your attorney, Mr. Tenney or Mr. Colgate, your President, can see that deed whenever they choose to call at my offices. Yet you, in your open letter, attempted to show that I had been guilty of a crime. If this was not vindictiv malice, what was it? Again in the same open letter, you would insinuate that my patent and Edgar Wetton's were the same. Yet you know very well that the circular from which you obtained the name of my patients contains also the following description of my patent:

"During the past few years seven or eight different patents hav been taken out for Electric and Magnetic Belts, but the vital defect in each and all of them has been a want of means whereby the magnetism once imparted to them could be retained. This defect has been fully overcome in the 'Wilsonia' invention. William Wilson struck the happy idea of attaching a series of Voltaic Piles to the Magnets, which by absorbing the natural exudations of the skin giv out a constant galvanic current, and thus keep up a continuous supply of Magnetism. Another very important feature of the 'Wilsonia' invention is this. Wearers of these garments never experience unpleasant shocks and are never afflicted with sores, which inevitably result from wearing galvanic chain bands—they having to be steeped in vinegar to render them capable of imparting any curativ property, and in this process they become the mother of an incurable form of erysipelas! And then, the 'Wilsonia' is as comfortable to wear as any undergarment. These appliances keep the body warm in the cold season, and, by their power of absorption, impart, in the summer, a refreshing coolness."

Also the Method of Manufacture.

"Wilsonia" Magnetic Clothing;

These goods are made as explained below, and every person following out the instructions here given can make for themselvs and their own wearing any garments to suit their malady.

Although I hav pateuted the invention, I giv any one the liberty to make for themselvs, but shall prosecute any one who dares to make them for others to wear, or to sell.

Process of Manufacture.

Take a sheet of cloth, or any woven fabric, lay it upon another sheet of gutta percha tissue, then lay a sheet of muslin corresponding in size; fasten these together. Then take hard steel plates (brittle as glass they need be for our purpose), cut them into narrow strips about one and a half inches long; perforate each plate, making a hole large enough to take in an an ordinary shoe eyelet. These plates to the number of 250, with 500 eyelets, fastened to the cloth, are sufficient to make an ordinary NERVE INVIGORATOR. Over these plates, when fastened to the fabric, we place another sheet of india rubber tissue. Over this again we place another sheet of muslin and fasten the whole mass together with hot irons. We then puncture the eyelets the whole thickness of the fabric so fastened together, having about five hundred openings through the garments. Then we cover the whole with a lining of any material to suit the fancy of the wearer, but preferably canton flannel should be used. When the garment is so far finished it is magnetized by a powerful electro magnet until every plate of the whole series is thoroughly saturated with magnetism,

Having described the process as above, I again say that if you make the garments as I direct they will do you just as much good as though I made them myself. But the above being my patent, I shall prosecute any one who dares to make them for profit, and shall use the utmost rigor of the law in so prosecuting.

Now, then, where comes in quackery with with the WILSONIA?" Why do not the advertisers of quack nostrums tell purchasers how to make their compounds?

Now, as to Prof. White's great discovery: He told us a few weeks ago, through the columns of the New York Herald, that he had made a marvelous discovery, viz., that the whole secret of the electric charge in the Gymnotus, or electric eel, lay wholly in the fact that the said electric ell was enveloped in a film, whereby its electric charge was augmented. This marvelous discovery, he said, was only made after six and three-quarter years of fruitless research, and by an accident, he goes on to say, the whole thing was made complete.

Now it will be seen from reading the above formula, that WILLIAM WILSON'S patent was taken out two and a half years before Professor White made his statement through the columns of the Herald.

It is upon the Gutta Percha Film patented by MR. WILSON, that the secret of the "WILSONIA'S" force wholly lies.

Physicians, electricians, and scientists are, therefore, invited to examine critically into the nature of the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING, and, with the formula be ore them, go into their laboratories and experiment for themselvs. They will then know that the

WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING

Is the Greatest Wonder of the Age, and yet withal one of the most Simple of Inventions.

In the same open letter which you sent to the newspapers you maliciously attempt to belittle me by assuming that, because I had been a cabinetmaker, I could not therefore attain to a knowledge of curativ agencies distinct from the methods laid down by the schools. In answer to this assumption of yours, I can only say that I pity you for your stupidity. Do you not know that the celebrated Dr. John Hunter of London worked at the bench as a cabinetmaker at forty-two years of age, and afterward became the most eminent surgeon in Europe? and to-day the Hunterian Museum in London is a living monument of that cabinetmaker's skill? Do you not also know that all great inventions ever made emanate from among those whom we least suspect as the originators of new thought?

Another important reference in your open letter I refer to: On a board sign y u say as follows: "Read the Anthony Comstock letters in favor of 'Wilsonia.'" In answer to which I simply say that I hav the copies of fifty-five letters sent to you in favor of my garments, the parties sending such letters being those to whom you had conveyed your libelous communication. Therefore I call these letters of my patients the Anthony Comstock letters, and shall continue to publish them in a pamphlet dedicated to the Young Men's Christian Association of Brooklyn and New York; nor you nor your society shall intimidate me against such publication. Nothing shall be hidden nor held back. In conclusion, I again make the following challenge to you: To sign bonds for $5,000 if you can prove that I do not cure ninety per cent of the incurables given over by the doctors, or to produce one case where all the benefit was was not derived as promised on the purchase of the goods, such goods being worn as directed as to quantity and to time. I believe your society requires money to carry on its operations; here therefore, is a chance to add to its funds. I will also sign bonds for a like sum if you can show one testimonial published by me that was not genuin, and will pay all expenses of the six physicians on whom you relied, and will meet them singly or as a body on any platform in the United States, and prove to an audience of scientists that these physicians know nothing of the nature of nerve fluid, the constitution of the blood, nor the difference between electricity and magnetism as a curativ agent. WILLIAM WILSON.

Having thus openly answered your letter, and wishing the whole thing to be closed up, I herewith make you this offer, viz: That you shall, upon the examination of the deeds referred to in my letter as above, between your attorney and Mr. Colgate, upon the conclusion of such investigation, giv me a letter of apology for having been instrumental in casting discredit upon my invention. I am quite willing to accept your plea of ignorance of the facts, and that you were deceived by others.

Upon receipt of such letter of apology, I will withdraw all further proceedings. WILLIAM WILSON.

Important to the Suffering and Afflicted Who Hav Been Deceived by Advertising Nostrum Venders.

The great success attending the introduction of my world-famed WILSONIA GARMENTS has incited a host of speculators to place upon the market several bogus arrangements under the specious titles of "Magnetic Clothing" or "Magnetic Garments." One unprincipled person has actually copied my engraving representing my clothing, so that a person not seeing the garments would take it for granted that the goods so advertised were facsimiles of the WILSONIA, the engravings representing the clothing being identical with those issued by myself thus tending to defraud the public by their purchasing a worthless article for the cure of some malady or other. This same person has copied, almost verbatim, the language of my own circulars. One of these garments was brought me direct from the vender. I find it to be a clumsy imitation of the first magnetic garments made in Europe some fifteen years ago. I would therefore ask the public to see the Wilsonia garments before purchasing anything represented as a magnetic clothing. They will then find that an attempt at imitation has been made by an engraved circular containing copies of my own circular as above stated, and so cunningly has the device been carried out that parties purchasing the goods from such circular will suppose that the garments so purchased were identical with my own, but when seen together they are as different as anything can possibly be conceived. If, however, persons will call at any of our STORES in New York or Brooklyn, or elsewhere in the United States where Wilsonia depots are opened, they may hav everything made clear to them. The claim of CHEAPNESS is a poor point to put forward when the matter of disease and life and death is in the balance. My reputation now is so unparalleled that never before in the history of the world hav such remarkable cures been effected as those following the timely use of the now world-renowned Wilsonia garments. The blind hav been made to see, the deaf to hear, the helpless paralytic to walk erect, the demented to become sane, the martyr to catarrh and asthma to speak and breathe freely, the terrified with heart disease to walk forward among the public without the terror of impending death. All and every form of disease disappearwhen the Wilsonia Magnetic Garments are used as directed. I will undertake to cure 90 per cent of the so-called incurables now in the hospitals in the United States, and will place my garments upon such patients free of charge, the only condition I make being that the authorities governing such hospitals shall not allow any medicin to be given the patients during the wearing of my garments, and that the cures shall be publicly advertised as soon as made. CITIZENS OF AMERICA! when and where in the history of the world has such an offer as this been made? Here, in New York and Brooklyn alone, there are thousands of poor invalids in our hospitals passing through the ordeal of a protracted and living death who might, if my offer be accepted, be restored to the world as useful members of society, and this free of charge. If my offer be not accepted by the physicians of the hospitals, then the physicians must stand convicted of indifference and carelessness toward the poor invalids intrusted to their care. I hav sold my patent to a company with a view of manufacturing on a very large scale, so that with increased facilities in the form of valuable machinery specially prepared for our purposes, we shall be able to place upon the market an unlimited supply of these wonderfully curativ appliances.

After years of study in the particular direction of electrical therapeutics, I hav from time to time made many improvements on my first conception of what was needed for the relief and cure of disease until the "Wilsonia" in its present form contains all the elements of what has gone before in the same direction. The continuity of current is made complete, the dangers of over-ventilation are entirely overcome. This is an important point in the "Wilsonia." Thousands of persons are to-day suffering from the effects of retarded perspiration, having had thrown back into the organism the poisonous exhalations of the body. The expensiv nature of the "Wilsonia" combination in all its entirety makes the price somewhat high, but yet it is far the cheapest in the end, inasmuch as the curativ force will continue for years although a commoner kind will frequently result in marvelous cures. These commoner goods we sell at the following prices:

PRICE LIST.

LUNG INVIGORATORS	$6 00

Gems of Thought.

"BUT," says a zealous friend, "if it were not for our religion and the belief, where would the female be?" Just where she should be—the equal of man; the companion, the helper, the complete complement, the perfect half of a perfect whole. Christianity and all other forms of superstition hav kept woman back—hav placed her under man's rule and dominion and robbed her of her birthright as queen of the world and as one fitted to reign and rule side by side with her kingly brother. Gladly, joyfully, will woman "take the chances" of "going back to nature" and to sun-worship if she only may be permitted so to do. "Christian principle" has never "ameliorated her condition." Never, never, never! Eighteen hundred years of servitude has it given to woman, making her less even in the eye of the law than a negro. She has no rights only as man condescends to lend them to her. It is only as she tramples Christianity and the old god-book of Christians under her feet, and throws off the fetters of Paul, Jesus, and the priest, that she is enabled to advance one step toward enfranchisment.—Elmina Drake Slenker.

My heart leaps up when I behold
A rainbow in the sky,
So was it when my life began,
So is it, now I am a man,
So be it when I shall grow old,
Or let me die.
The child is father of the man,
And I could wish my days to be Bound each to each by natural piety.
—Wordsworth.

I SEEM, for my part, to see the benevolence of the Deity more clearly in the pleasures of very young children than in anything in the world. The pleasures of grown persons may be reckoned partly of their own procuring, especially if there has been any industry or contrivance or pursuit to come at them; or if they are unfounded, like music, painting, etc., upon any qualification of their own acquiring. But the pleasures of a healthy infant are so manifestly provided for it by another, and the benevolence of the provision is so unquestionable, that every child I see at its sport affords to my mind a kind of sensible evidence of the finger of God and of the disposition which directs it.—Paley's Moral and Political Philosophy.

ALL hail to those bold and fearless natures—the heretics and innovators of the day—who, rousing men out of their lazy sleep, sound in their ears the tocsin and the clarion, and force them to come forth, that they may do battle for their creed. Of all evils, torpor is the most deadly. Giv us paradox, giv us error, giv us what you will, so that you save us from stagnation. It is the cold spirit of routine which is the nightshade of our nature. It sits upon men like a blight, blunting their faculties, withering their powers, and making them both unable and unwilling either to struggle for the truth or to figure to themselvs what it is that they really believe.—Buckle's Essays.

I HAV now gone through the Bible as a man would go through a wood with an ax on his shoulder and fell trees. Here they lie, and the priests, if they can, may replant them. They may, perhaps, stick them in the ground, but they will never grow.—Thomas Paine.

WHEN Samson ran off with the gate-posts of Gaza, if he ever did so (and whether he did or not is nothing to us), or when he visited Delilah, or caught his foxes, or did anything else, what has revelation to do with these things? If they were facts, he could tell them himself, or his secretary, if he kept one, could write them, if they were worth either telling or writing; and if they were fictions revelation could not make them true; and, whether true or not, we are neither the better nor the wiser for knowing them. When we contemplate the immensity of that being, who directs and governs the incomprehensible whole, of which the utmost ken of human sight can discover but a part, we ought to feel shame at calling such paltry stories "the word of God."—Paine's Age of Reason.

HE divideth the sea with his power, and, by his understanding, he smiteth through the proud. By his spirit he garnished the heavens; his hand hath joined the crooked serpent. Lo, these are a part of his ways, but how little a portion is heard of him and the thunder of his power who can understand?—Job xxvi, 12-14.

GOD requires not men to wrong or misuse their faculties for him, nor to lie for others or themselvs for his sake, which they purposely do who will not suffer their understandings to hav right conceptions of the things proposed to them and designedly restrain themselvs from having just thoughts of everything, as far as they are concerned, to inquire. And as for a good cause, that needs not such ill helps; if it be good, truth will support it, and it has no need of fallacy or falsehood.—Locke's Conduct of the Understanding.

IF we had been slaves to the Dey of Tripoli we should hav been too much sunk in intellectual and moral degradation to be capable of the rational and manly discontent of freemen. It is precisely because our institutions are so good that we are not perfectly contented with them, for they hav educated us into a capacity for enjoying still better institutions.—Macaulay's Speeches on Parliamentary Reform.

THE Iliad and the Odyssey were not only regarded as epic poems, but as sacred writ; even the geography had been inspired. However, when the Greeks began to travel the old legends could no longer be received. It was soon discovered that the places visited by Ulysses did not exist, that there was no River Ocean which ran round the earth, and that the earth was not shaped like a round saucer, with the oracle of Delphi in its center. The Egyptians laughed in the faces of the Greeks and called them children when they talked of their gods of yesterday; and so well did their pupils profit by these lessons that they soon laughed at the Egyptians for believing in the gods at all.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

Odds and Ends.

"MY dear," said the grocer, "we hav all been converted and can't sell milk on Sunday, but if you happen to want a little just come in by the back gate, please."

A PREACHER said to a peasant, whom he thought rude, "You are better fed than taught." "Should think I was," replied the clodhopper, "as I feeds myself and you teaches me."

A SMALL child being asked by a Sunday-school teacher, "What did the Israelites do after they had crossed the Red Sea?" answered, "I don't know, ma'am, but I guess they dried themselvs."

"FORMERLY one sermon converted three thousand sinners," said Elder Burgess, of Butler University, Ind., in a sermon recently; "now it takes three thousand sermons to convert one sinner."

A LITTLE boy was shown the picture of the martyrs thrown to the lions. He startled his friends by shouting, "Ma! oh, ma! just look at that poor little lion way behind there. He won't get any."

CLARA LOUISE KELLOGG acknowledges that she became engaged after a courtship of but fifteen days. As this isn't long enough to learn whether or not a future husband snores or walks in his sleep, it looks like a very dangerous proceeding.

AN inquisitiv old man poked his head in a printing-office door and asked, "Who is dead?" The man at the wheel answered, "Nobody that I hav heard of." The old fellow asked, "What is this crape on the door for?" The boss then went out and found that the "devil" had hung the job-office towel on the doorknob while he chased a lame pigeon up the alley.

WHAT is fame? Something that you win by carrying a bunch of shingles up a ladder and tacking them on the roof, when you might hav made just as much money by peeling shavings from a board on the work-bench. The people who persist in walking and working in the upper strata of the world's industry hav a harder time and no more pay, but then, they win fame, do you see?

THERE is no Indian war now going on. The fact is, the weather is so cold in the West that the government agents, who are appointed to rob and plunder the red men, are compelled to sit by the stove. In the mean time they are mapping out a program which will stir up the Indians from the British possessions to the Rio Grande. In a small way, the country has no abler statesmen than the agents who plunder the Indians.

A SMALL boy got up to read a composition on "The Tree." He got as far as "This subject has many branches," when the teacher said,

"S'op; you hav not made your bough yet."

"If you interrupt me again," said the boy, "I'll leave."

"You giv me any more of your impudence and I'll take the sap out of you. Do you understand?"

"I twig," said the boy, and then the regular order of business proceeded.

THE rich, as well as the poor, hav their crosses to bear. Mr. Louis Lorillard, of New York, offers $500 for the conviction of the person who stole his "black French poodle Flora," and says he will expend $10,000 to send the thief to prison. It is a sad case. Picture to yourself the agony of a wealthy young man who is obliged to worry through the winter without a "black French poodle"—no frisky Flora's tail to wag and eye to grow brighter at his coming. When a poor man loses a dog he doesn't offer $500 reward for him. He assuages his grief by paying half a dollar for three new pups.

O COME to the onion-bed,
The day is past and gone;
There rest thy weary head
Till the blush of another dawn.

To the onion-bower hie,
As the evening star appears,
And bathe thy saddened eye
In a cataract of tears.

For the wo-sealed ducts that bind
The briny thou wouldst shed,
A solvent charm shall find
In the fragrant onion-bed.

"WHAT do you intend to be when you grow up?" inquired a New Haven philanthropist of a small boy who was shivering on the corner.

"I intend to be a sharp."

"A sharp? And what's a sharp?"

"Don't you know what a sharp is? Why, a sharp is one of these men that says he knows something that nobody else knows and makes everybody believe him. This giv's him 'posish,' and he coins money."

The philanthropist saw no need of further inquiries.

"I S'POSE you has read de President's message?" inquired an old colored man as he was sweeping an office on Laurel street the other day.

"Oh, yes."

"Anything speshul in it?"

"No, not much."

"Say anything 'bout de way pertaters has riz up in price?"

"No."

"Anything 'bout de world gwine to end on de 31st?"

"Guess not."

"Git any figgers in dar to play policy on?"

"I didn't see any."

"Did he say it was gwine to be a hard winter?"

"No; he didn't even mention the subject."

"Didn't giv any cure for chilblains or sore froat?"

"No."

"Den what's de good of any message? What's de use of sittin' dar an' foolin' 'round an' burnin' out de gas? Sakes to gracious! 'Pears like if I couldn't squeeze in at leas' one leetle cure fur corns in a sehen-column message I'd let de old fing go an' take my chances on a raffle fur a Christmas goose."

LIBERAL HOMES
AND A
LIBERAL MAGAZINE.

The Liberal is a monthly magazine published by G. H. Walser at Liberal, Mo., at the low price of fifty cents a year. This magazine is issued in the interest of true Liberalism and gives full and accurate information concerning the town and colony of Liberal—founded for Liberals and Spiritualists, where they can enjoy the full fruition of universal mental liberty. The town is growing rapidly. It has no preacher, no church, no drunkenness, no saloon, no God, no Christ, no hell no devil. But peace, civility, truth, happiness, and sobriety reigns supreme among the people. Address G. H. WALSER, Liberal, Mo. tf

BLISS'S
Electro-Magnetic Planchette.
Designed Especially to Develop Mediumistic Persons as Writing Mediums.

After months of careful study and experiment, Mr. James A. Bliss, the well-known medium, of Providence, R. I. (formerly of Philadelphia, Pa.), has perfected his Writing Planchette, and although many improvements hav been made, the price remains the same as heretofore.

Bliss's Electro-Magnetic Planchette is a wonderful little instrument. It will operate in the hands of many persons who hav never had the least faith in Spiritual manifestations. It has convinced thousands that it was moved by a power independent of hands placed upon it while experimenting. It will answer either mental or spoken questions, and giv you wonderful communications from your spirit friends.

Skeptics are especially invited to experiment with it.

The general verdict of the persons that hav used Bliss's Planchette is, That it will write messages where the common wooden unmagnetized planchette will remain motionless.

Remember this Planchette is not only the best, but it is the cheapest in the market.

The Planchette, with wheels, pencil, and full directions will be securely inclosed in a box and mailed to any address in the United States only, upon the receipt of 50 cents. For sale at the office of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.
A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.
Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.
Spermatorrhea and Impotency,
as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an
EXTERNAL APPLICATION,
which is the doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case. Some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.
SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.
There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.
☞Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.
Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, backed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, his system based upon scientific fact."

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.
BY JAMES PARTON.
With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley, Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertile scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

Notes and Clippings.

A CREMATION society has been organized in San Francisco.

WE are requested to state that the Mr. Ingersoll who is one of Guiteau's counsel is not Col. R. G. Ingersoll nor a relativ of his.

IN consequence of an ukase from the emperor of Russia one-third of the convents and monasteries of the empire are at once to be closed, owing to the extreme poverty of their numerous inmates.

A BOAT destined to be propelled solely by electricity has just been completed in France. The owner, M. Tellier, intends to launch it at Boulogne, and to cross in it to Folkestone, in company with a friend. The boat is about 18 feet long by about 6½ feet wide.

IT does not appear that Moody and Sankey are repeating their triumphs in England. Their audiences are comparativly small, and the clergy do not, as before, countenance their revivalism. The London Times says that nearly all of the converts made during their first visit are now backsliders.

ON the mastership of University College, Oxford, becoming vacant recently by the appointment of Dr. Bradley as Dean of Westminster, a request was made to Mr. Goldwin Smith to allow himself to be proposed for the post. Mr. Goldwin Smith declining, a similar unsuccessful request was made to Prof. Huxley.

THE Sunday law advocates are at work to enforce the observance of the Puritanical Sabbath in this city. It will be accomplished when the average San Francisco citizen is an angel in a new suit of Sunday-go-to-meeting apparel and a prize in the shape of a celestial chromo of the witch burners is offered to every "heathen" (and there are many of them) in our midst.—San Francisco Jewish Times.

A LONDON paper says: "Fatal encounters between gamekeepers and poachers hav been terribly frequent of late years. They amount, as it has been but too aptly said, to the practice of private war, and to protect the amusement of a few rich the lives of scores of poor are annually sacrificed. Surely it needs some radical change in the game laws to prevent this awful sacrifice to what Sydney Smith called the Christian pheasant and the immortal hare."

A REPORT from Kingston, Jamaica, is to the effect that the Rev. A. C. Walsh, the rector of Port Royal, has just left the island for Montreal. He got into trouble with his church wardens and congregation, who nailed up the church against him. He raised an army of carpenters and laborers and broke into the church amid the execrations of the populace. The disturbance continued for two weeks, and the most disgraceful scenes were enacted. The parson, on the recommendation of the bishop, resigned his charge and started for Montreal.

THE Rev. Dr. Parnell, secretary to the Episcopal Diocese of Ontario, says he is unable to account for the shortage of $12,000 in his accounts, as he has not knowingly misappropriated the money. He rather thinks his bookkeeper is faulty, and hence the deficit. He is willing to turn over his life insurance policy to the church, so that the loss may be made good at his death, but he cannot promis an earlier reparation, as he owns no property. The case is peculiar, and opinion seems to be divided on the question whether the clergyman is a knave or, in a financial sense, a fool.

THE Lewiston (Maine) Journal says: "One moonless night recently an Auburn deacon lighted his lantern, took his water-pail, and went out-doors to the back-yard pump to get a pail of water. He carefully adjusted the wooden pail to a favorable focus, and absent-mindedly hung the lantern on the pump nose. He then seized the pump handle and worked it as vigorously as a well-preserved but absent-minded Auburn deacon might. The stream of water gushed out of the pump and broke the lantern into fragments, leaving the Auburn deacon in the dark and his water pail in a thirsty condition. If it had been anybody but an Auburn deacon people would hav said—well, what wouldn't they say?"

WHEN he earned a miserable living in Rosita, Colorado, by doing errands for a stableman, he was called Old Man Bassick, and his wife and daughter worked at the wash-tub. One day he found ore in a mountain near by, and within the year has become a half millionaire. Now he is respectfully mentioned as Mr. Bassick. There are those, however, who sneer at the family's ignorance, as the following anecdote shows: Mrs. Bassick was at Canon. It was noticed that she frequently walked out upon the hotel porch as if looking for some one. "Do you expect friends?" asked the obsequious Boniface. "No indeedy," she replied, "I'm expecting my phantom." Her pretty phaeton, for which she had paid $3,000, afterward rolled around the corner.

ALL the female convicts in the Indiana penitentiary were turned over to Sarah Smith, a philanthropic Quakeress, seven years ago, for the purpose of testing kindness as a means of reformation. Success is claimed for the experiment. Two hundred women and girls a e now under Mrs. Smith's care. They are required to perform certain work, from which they earn their own support, and they are kept within an inclosure, but there are no high walls, dark cells, barred windows, nor armed guards. Eight women guards are are all that she requires to control these prisoners, and severe punishments and deprivations are unknown. It has been proved, says an official report, that eighty per cent of these convicts are so far reformed that on release they begin to lead reputable lives.

AT every opportunity Prof. Adler makes a plea for Sunday amusements for our poorer citizens. He advocates concerts of wholesome music, and the opening of such places as the museums in Central Park, either free or at such prices of admission as everybody can afford to pay. He argues that Sunday is the only time the laboring people can find the necessary diversion from their dull and steady employment, and now they hav on Sunday the choice only of going to church or going to the grog shop, and as their welcome to the latter is more hearty than that extended to them by the churches, they prefer the saloons. He claims that if they had the preference between grog shops and inexpensiv amusements they would prefer the latter, and many of the evils resulting from intemperance would be eradicated. There is no doubt that thousands now of a Sunday waste their money, their strength, and their character, who, if they could find some wholesome and attractiv diversion elsewhere, would conform much more closely to a correct idea of what a good man ought to be.

SPEAKING of the trouble in the Stonington (Conn.) public school, caused by a Catholic boy refusing to join in the Protestant mummeries of the teacher, and for which the child was severely punished by the teacher and committee man, Foster's Democrat says: "The Protestant teacher and committee man referred to ought to be sent to the penitentiary for ten years at least for cruelty to that boy. We should say precisely the same if the thing were reversed and a Catholic teacher and committee man should act as these Protestants did in the Stonington public school. Call that teacher a lady! a vixen, a termagant, a virago, either of the terms would be more appropriate. It is a great outrage that any sort of religious intolerance and bigotry should be taught or tolerated in the public school, or anywhere else for that matter, in this country. The idea of whipping a boy or girl because he or she would not follow any sort of religious or sectarian form in a public school, contrary to the parental examples, teachings, and principles set, taught, lived up to, and enjoyed at home, is too moustsous to be tolerated in a free country. What sort of old Puritan bigots and asses hav they in Connecticut these days? They are trying to revive the hellish persecutions so vigorously practiced by their ancestors, who whipped and burned alleged bewitched women, tied them to the cart tail, and dragged them through the town. They are not yet half civilized in that state. The aggrieved parents hav one of the ablest lawyers in New England to manage their case. We know Tom Waller well, and when he takes hold of a case he means business. We hope to hear that he has made the superstitious, intolerant persecutors suffer most severely for their infamous conduct."

SOCIETIES FOR THE PREVENTION——

Whenever a government grows
To be wealthy, corrupt, and paternal,
It uses its ears and its nose
With freshness exceedingly vernal;
Then new institutions arise,
Beyond its creators' intention,
That make of our meddlers and spies
Societies for the preveution.

Societies though they are named,
They are deputy governments, rather,
And widely they come to be famed
For bother and bluster and blather.
Their powers they blindly abuse,
Because they are mainly despotic,
And often the methods they use
Are, sad to relate, idiotic.

No doubt there is good they may do
If fairly and wisely conducted,
And courses of crime, it is true,
Hav sometimes been duly obstructed;
But all their prevention is vain,
If won by oppressiv abuses,
And small is morality's gain
If freedom its better part loses.

When the people are governed too much
And suffer too much interference
Of government side shows, and such,
Some day they will order a clearance;
Then some institutions, unless
They are managed with better intention.
Will learn what it is to suppress
Societies for the prevention.

WE do not believe that Victor Hugo ever said this. If he did, he does not know the woman, for she is no more fit to be president than Talmage is to associate with decent people. But it is reported that he said: "Even gentlemen hav crossed from America to England. They hav been deputed by a large number of their fellow-citizens to offer the presidency of the United States to a woman. Fontenelle said of Mme. de Savigne that she was a man—a mot more flattering for Mme. de Sevigne personally than for women generally. Mrs. Woodhull is an American lady, very popular in her own country, where she has made herself the apostle of social reform and the emancipation of women. She has come to Europe, there to continue what she has commenced in America, and there to meet with ovations. Thousands hav flocked to her meetings in London, Nottingham, Liverpool, etc. The English journals are full of these gatherings. One of them estimates at forty thousand the audience of her ten London meetings. She is pretty, which is no drawback for a woman. She has a manner all her own; no bureau, no platform, no friends on the stage; there she is alone, standing, and when an idea moves her most forcibly she walks up and down the platform—an unfettered eloquence which is weirdly striking. But withal, Mrs. Woodhull is a woman, and thus the serious can not retain their laughter at the thought that a woman could be President of the United States. Hold! Is England a republic? We thought that in England there was a woman at the head of the government. We imagin that in England the ministers are presided over by a woman. We were under the impression that in England a woman did send messages to the lords and commons. Certain it is that England is a monarchy, and her monarch is not a man, but a woman. And this queen is called Victoria, just as Mrs. Woodhull. If one Victoria can govern, why should not another preside?"

TURKISH CEMETERIES.—CONTINUED.

A Turkish cemetery is wholly unlike any other in the world. The tombstones are different in shape, in style, and appearance. A part of the graves have a horizontal stone five or six inches thick, with a head-stone and foot-stone mortised into it, and these stand upright when they do not fall over. Other graves have the upright stones simply set in the earth, which are very sure to fall over or lean badly; and as the Turkish rule is never to repair anything, their cemeteries have a very dilapidated appearance. These upright stones are of various sizes and of diverse shapes. In size they run from two feet to six feet in hight, and from six inches to fifteen inches in width. A majority are a third wider at the top than the bottom, some are partially lyre-shaped or scolloped at the edges, while others are simply round columns six or seven inches in diameter, but a third larger at the top than bottom. The lettering is put in lines running obliquely, the left hand being considerably higher than the other end. In some cases, however, the lines run square across. But such letters few Americans ever saw; they do not look nearly as much like letters as Hebrew, but appear as though a lot of children had been attempting to write shorthand. In many cases—I presume when the parties were wealthy—the background of the stone is painted a bright green, red, purple, or some other color, and the letters gilt or black. In no case are any images or figures of angels or any kind of animals allowed in their cemeteries. The Mohammedans are strictly opposed to the worship of images of all kinds, regarding it as a species of idolatry, which they detest in the strongest degree. The nearest approach I have seen to a representation, in stone, is a rude form of a fez, or a turban, which is often seen cut in stone at the top of tombstones. What is lacking in quality in Turkish cemeteries is made up in quantity. From what I have since seen of the city's cemeteries, I am prepared to say I never saw so many graves around a city in my life; and the wonder is where Turks enough could be found to fill so many graves. Surely many milllons of Mussulmans must hav gone from this locality to heaven, or to some other place more or less uncertain as to distance and direction.

After returning to the boat we continued up the Golden Horn as much farther, and saw several beautiful sites, and some fine buildings. We had got above the shipping, and where small boats only could find water enough. We saw the tile works, the brick yards, and a few trivial manufactories. Many beautiful sites for dwellings line both sides. At length we reached the palace erected by a former sultan for Empress Eugenie of France, which, however, she occupied but one day, and which is now vacant. The sultan also has a summer palace farther up, but he is there very little, if any. There are four or five magnificent palaces near the water's edge, at the confluence of the Bosphorus and the Golden Horn, built with borrowed money by former sultans, but the present sultan refuses to occupy any of them, as he thinks it unhealthy down so near the water. He occupies another palace on the high ground in the rear of them. The water in the Golden Horn, as in the Bosphorus, the Sea of Marmora, and the Mediterranean Sea, is not affected by tides, or rather no tides are here; and thus the landings and docks, such as they are, are free from the annoyances which ebbing and flowing of the tide engender.

SEEING THE DERVISHES.

Thursday, Nov. 3d.—The following day being Sunday, we had but little sight-seeing to attend to, save the whirling and howling dervishes, who have public meetings some three times a week, Sunday being one of the days. The guide took us quite a walk down the steep hill, through narrow streets and dirty lanes, to the building where the dervishes worship. Dervishes occupy a position in the Mohammedan religion similar to that of the monks in the Christian. They do not marry, and liv in monasteries, or something of the kind, and hav their possessions in common. They have considerable property of their own, such estates as have no heirs to inherit them falling to them. There are several different orders of dervishes, as there are of monks and friars. When we entered the building the services had commenced. Fifteen dervishes were kneeling on a circular floor, some twenty-five feet in diameter, in the center of the room, with their faces toward Mecca. Their posture might be called both a sitting and a kneeling one. They were really on their knees, the feet, upon which they sat, being directly in the rear. They frequently bent their faces forward to the floor and kissed it. During the praying, which is generally performed in silence, they occasionally rise to their feet, bow low three times, and then fall easily upon their knees, assuming also the sitting posture, and placing their lips again and again to the floor. After this has been kept up for a long time, the leading sheik, or priest, speaks out in a chanting, half-singing voice, "Allah, abak, hoo," when the dervishes again bow their heads to the floor and kiss it, repeating in a low, muttering voice the words the sheik had spoken. The sheik utters other sentences, probably quotations from the Koran, for his words seem to impart great solemnity to the faithful, and they are much impressed when he repeats the solemn periods.

I should observe that in addition to the fifteen dervishes in the inner place mentioned, twice that number are in the wide circuit or space around the circle, and they also stand on their knees in the same way, and join in the praying ceremony the same as those in the center. In the gallery were as many more, joining in the same exercises. Those in the center were barefooted, and their numbers were increased from time to time by other dervishes coming in and joining them. After the praying had thus been kept up for half an hour, one of the dervishes in the gallery commenced chanting certain passages, and at times all the dervishes in the house bent their faces to the floor and called upon Allah repeatedly. Not long after this a kind of instrumental music was begun in the gallery, with a reed instrument sounding much like a flute, accompanied by a sort of drum. The music is not exquisitely pretty, but it evidently sounds very solemn to the faithful, and is kept up for fifteen minutes, accompanied by chanting. At a signal the dervishes in the central place arose and laid off their cloaks, leaving on a white skirt coming nearly to the feet, and commenced a slow, solemn march around the circle. When they reached the side nearest Mecca, they made, one at a time, a solemn obeisance by bowing, and then, advancing some six feet, each turned again and bowed to the one behind him, and this was done by all two or three times. This portion of the ceremony was solemn and impressive. When it was completed the first sheik took a position on the Mecca side of the circle, facing in toward his fellows, and one at a time they went up to him and apparently received something from him—perhaps his blessing—the instrumental music at the same time being in progress; and as each one received the invisible something he extended his arms, and began turning, the most of them revolving with such velocity that their skirts stood out at an angle of forty-five degrees. Each took a certain position in the circle and kept it with very little variation. Soon they were all whirling save two sheiks, one of whom retained his position, while the other walked slowly among those who were whirling. These gentlemen looked very serious and devoted, and doubtless felt the exercise a very solemn one. Some turned with great evenness and regularity. When this had been continued some fifteen minutes, at a signal all stopped suddenly. None of them showed the least dizziness. They then for a few minutes united in the praying exercise of kneeling, etc., after which the whirling was renewed the same as before, some holding out their arms horizontally, and others elevating them at an angle.

When we had watched these chaps long enough, we left them still whirling and made our way some half a mile to another building, where a rival company of dervishes were engaged in a different style of worship. These were the howling dervishes. Some five or six of them were kneeling upon the floor facing each other, at a distance of some six feet apart, and at the end of the room a row of fifteen were standing close together. Those on the floor were chanting passages from the Koran, while the fifteen in the row joined in a kind of chorus, swaying their bodies somewhat vigorously right and left. The music made, though doubtless meant to be solemn, was dolorous enough. I don't know as I ever heard the tune "the old cow died on," but if an old cow was in a dying condition, and that music did not finish her, I would be forced to conclude that she died very hard indeed.

Two tall, active Turks, who were perhaps sheiks, seemed to act the part of marshals, or floor-managers. They were each provided with a long red scarf, before putting which around them they stood before the holier part of the room and repeated a prayer, first holding out their hands, palms upward, and putting their hands to their eyes. After this they slowly adjusted the scarfs around them, stopping at each moment and muttering a few words of their prayer. When the scarfs were duly adjusted they seemed to make it their business to attend to the fifteen standing in a row, who were still swaying their bodies to the right and left, rising on the balls of their feet and coming down solidly upon their heels, keeping up constantly a grunting or groaning sound, while the chanters on the floor continued their doleful music. The motions of the fifteen became animated, and the strength and zeal devoted to their exercise increased. Their movements became more rapid, they rose higher on their toes, struck more solidly upon their heels, swayed from side to side more vigorously. In other words, the steam seemed to be getting up, and the grunts and groans of the fifteen changed to howls, the exercise becoming more and more violent. As their contortions multiplied, and their fezes seemed likely to fall off, the floor-managers went to them, took the fezes from their heads, and replaced them with a white, close-fitting skull-cap. If any of the fifteen became so warm with the exercise as to wish to remove their outer clothing, the floor-managers took it and laid it away without interrupting the entertainment. An explanation was given me as to the reason why they turned alternately to the right and left. They believe that on the right of every person is a good spirit, and on the left a bad spirit. They turn to the good spirit and ask him to aid and protect them, and ask the bad spirit to not be unkind to them or do aught to injure them. The celerity with which they turned from the right to the left, and the unison in which they moved, all rising together, falling together, bowing together, turning together to the right and to the left, and all howling together, made the exercise a singular one. The poor devotees doubtless thought they were worshiping Allah in the most acceptable manner, and entered into the work with great earnestness; but it reminded us, who took no part in it, of the equally wild scenes we had seen in revival meetings in our own country, when persons, excited in a similar manner, fell into involuntary convulsions and contortions and passed into a state of trance. I have witnessed in the kind of meetings alluded to operations fully as senseless as those the dervishes engage in.

At length one of the floor-managers unrolled and spread out upon the floor a sheepskin dressed with the wool on. This was for invalids and those diseased in various ways to lie upon while the sheik, who, by long abstinence from food, has prepared himself for the work, performs the act of healing them. A dozen men came forward and approached the chief, requesting him to cure them of the ills they labored under. After the sheik had placed his hand where the ailment was located, the invalid laid upon the sheepskin, face downward; the sheik placed his right foot upon the lower part of the sufferer's back, and putting his whole weight upon the prostrate person, passed his left foot over the shoulders and back. He then stepped off, and, stooping over, blew upon the ailing one, who at once arose, and, as a mark of gratitude, kissed the hand of the sheik. This did not look so monstrous as what took place later. Some twelve or fifteen infants, apparently from six to twelve months old, were brought forward by floor-managers direct from the mother's arms, and laid upon their backs on the sheepskin, when this heavy sheik, six feet in hight and weighing nearly two hundred pounds, absolutely placed his weight upon these infants, putting his right foot over the pelvic bone, standing upon it, and passing his left foot over the breast and stomach. It looked as though so heavy a man would certainly crush the life out of the infants, but they did not seem to mind it, and did not cry save from fright. The infants were brought there by their mothers, who believed that the sheik had the power to perform a cure. The mothers were not admitted into the same apartment with the men, but were put into an end of the room, separated by a kind of screen, which enabled them to look upon the performers without being seen themselves. Many doubtless came on purpose to give their children the benefit of being stepped upon by the sheik, and thus rendered healthy. It was, upon the whole, a very singular proceeding, but perhaps no more absurd than Christians have often perpetrated. We did not wait to see the performance over. I did not know that what I had seen was much more extravagant than the Christian performance I witnessed the week before in the cathedral at Athens; and upon emerging into the open air, where the sun was so pleasantly shining, I was led to conclude that Allah cared just about as much for this fanatical operation I had witnessed as Jupiter and Yahweh had the week previous. Indeed, what absurdities religious superstitions have led the children of men into!

One more word with regard to the dervishes. None can unite in the whirling services save the dervishes themselves and those who belong to that particular order, while the service of the howlers is free for any one to join in who can howl. In the latter company was a soldier, a black African, and others not dervishes. It may possibly be esteemed a luxury here that howling is free. It is said these dervishes sometimes get so enthusiastic and carried away with the excitement which they work up that they fall to the floor and become perfectly rigid and as livid as death. Indeed, we saw two of them carried out who seemed utterly exhausted and almost unconscious. Such practices are called religion, and are thought to be pleasing to the supreme being.

VISITING THE AMERICAN MINISTER.

After returning from the dervishes Mr. Bridges and myself called upon General Lewis Wallace, the American minister at the Sublime Porte. He resides in a commodious and rather fine edifice, though not so large as those occupied by the British, French, and German embassies. Upon sending in our cards he invited us up into his parlor and gave us a very kind reception. Mrs. Wallace also came in, and we had a pleasant conversation. They are from Crawfordsville, Indiana; and as they left the United States in July, they have been but a few months in the country; and having had but few calls from Americans in that time, seemed pleased to see us. We talked considerably upon Turkish matters, and learned from them facts about the condition of the country which we were glad to know.

It cannot be disguised that the Turks are in a very bad condition, financially and otherwise, and have a most discouraging outlook for the future. The nation is heavily in debt, which there is slight prospect of its ever lessening. The expenses of the government are far in excess of its income. There is an army of nearly seventy thousand soldiers around Constantinople, the entire city being little more than an entrenched camp, and many of these soldiers have not had a cent of pay for fifteen months—nothing save the meager food which barely serves to sustain life; still the men are patient and faithful. But many Turks are becoming sad and discouraged. They see it to be inevitable that as a nation they must go to the wall. Their load of debt is heavier than they can carry. A deputation is now here from the principal governments of Europe to learn, if possible, what the public debt of Turkey is; but the affairs have been so badly managed, and the accounts so loosely kept, that it is nearly impossible to ascertain how matters are, save that they are bad. The government here is much like the man who found it "against his principle to pay the interest upon the debts he owed, and against his interest to pay the principal." Little interest has been paid by Turkey for a long time. I have just heard that the government has recently secured a loan from the Ottoman bank (owned by the British and French) of £400,000 by paying ten per cent interest, and giving in pledge the government revenue for 1882 and 1883. But even this loan could not be secured except by paying off a debt to the same bank nearly two years overdue, so that but about £100,000 was absolutely handed over to the government, which has pledged its revenues two years in advance and paid ten per cent interest to borrow money to pay an old debt. This may serve as a telling instance of the terrible straits the country is in. The hundred thousand pounds will soon be expended, with but little chance for negotiating another loan. This condition of things cannot last always, and but little save a general collapse can be seen in the future. I learn that a number of the government officials are in favor of some of the other powers of Europe taking the finances of the country into their hands and practicably administering the government. It is, however, very doubtful if the government has enough to hand over to make it any object for the other governments to undertake the responsibility; but something will have to be done. General Wallace informed us that there is a party in Turkey who are able to realize the hopeless condition of the country, and perceive that they will eventually have to retire from Europe and return to Asia, which they regard as their real home; they favor this step, and wish to effect she best arrangements with the governments of Europe possible. The great majority, however, are firmly opposed to relinquishing their hold in Europe, and wish to retain their loved city, Constantinople. How they can continue to do this is not easy to see.

Cake and tea were served, after which we retired to our hotel, highly pleased with the pleasant visit we had enjoyed with General Wallace and lady.

THE MOSQUES.

On Monday morning we crossed over to Stamboul and took carriages to make the circuit of the city, visiting the principal mosques, the old city walls, etc. We were first driven to Seraglio Point, at the termination of the city, where the waters of the Golden Horn and the Bosphorus meet. The old palace stands here, and here, in former times, the court was held, but now the place looks deserted and in a state of decay. We were not shown through the palace, but saw the marble block where many grand viziers had been beheaded in the centuries past. The grand vizier is the principal minister of the government, under the sultan. So long as everything goes right he is allowed to hold the office, but as this is very sure to not always be the case, the grand vizier is often blamed, and when the dissatisfaction becomes too strong off goes his head. He is not allowed to resign and retire to private life; he knows too much of the secrets of the government to be permitted to live, and thus when he is no longer wanted at the head of government, decapitation is prescribed. In this way many of the grand viziers of Turkey have closed their careers. Who would wish to hold office under such conditions?

We next visited the great mosque of St. Sophia, considered the first in the nation. It was originally a Christian cathedral, its foundation being laid by Constantine the Great early in the fourth century. He erected it to the Holy Ghost, or Eternal Wisdom, as that unknown part of deity was sometimes called. The original structure was erected in the twentieth year of the reign of Constantine, A D. 325, the same year in which the famous Council of Nice was opened. Possibly a man who had put away one wife to marry another; a man who had caused the death of his father-in-law, who murdered his brother-in-law, his nephew, his own son, and his wife; a man who had shed the blood of thousands of his fellow-beings, was a fit person to erect a temple to the Holy Ghost and to act as vicegerent to Jesus Christ. Such a man was Constantine, who built this church, as well as the city, which was named after him.

Thirteen years later the church was enlarged by Constantius, a son of the former emperor. In 404 it was burned down, having been set on fire by the party of St. John Chrysostom, in the tumult excited by their being sent into exile. Theodosius II. rebuilt it in 415. In 532 it was burned a second time, in a revolt, and was again rebuilt, in an enlarged form, by Justinian in 538. Twenty years after, half the dome fell in, and overthrew the holy table, the tabernacle, and the elevated terrace, but Justinian restored it with still greater splendor, and re-celebrated it on Christmas of 568. The magnificence and variety of the marble columns surpassed all bounds. Every species of marble, granite, and porphyry—Phrygian white marble, with rose-colored stripes, which symbolized the blood of Atys, slain at Synada; green marble from Laconia; blue from Libya; black Celtic marble, with white veins; Thessalian, Molossian, and Proconessian marbles; Egyptian stained granite, and Sailic porphyry—was employed. Among the largest and most beautiful were the eight porphyry columns which Aurelius had taken from the temple of the Sun at Baalbec, and the widow Marina had sent to Rome; eight green columns said to have been taken from the temple of Diana at Ephesus and those which were carried off from the city of Troy, Cyzicus, Athens, and the Cyclades. Thus had many temples of older religions contributed to the temple of the Holy Ghost in Constantinople, just as the dogmas of the older religions were drawn upon to make up the Christian creed? The edifice dedicated to the Christian Holy Ghost was supported by the columns which once sustained the temples at Heliopolis at Ephesus, of Minerva at Athens, of Phœbus at Delos, and of Cybele at Cyzicus. The sacred cross was planted on the great column which previously bore the equestrian statue of Justinian. The cross fell down in the earthquake of 1371.

This magnificent church became then the theater of the grandest and most solemn transactions of state, of the nuptials and public church ceremonies of the emperor. Tradition and history united in pronouncing this place of worship, from the moment of its construction to that in which it was converted into a mosque, to be the most remarkable temple of the empire, if not of the world. It is said the construction was entrusted to one hundred architects, under each of whom were placed a hundred masons. Five thousand worked on the right side and five thousand on the left, and all according to a plan laid down by an angel who appeared to the emperor in a dream. This same angel after appeared to a eunuch and again to a boy, with regard to hurrying up the work on this cathedral; and when the money was exhausted and the work was about to stop for want of means, this same useful angel for a fourth time stepped in and removed the difficulty by taking several mules to a subterranean vault and loading them with nearly a thousand pounds of gold, which was ample to complete the church. I must say that, however improbable the story, that angel was one of the most useful I ever heard of, and I heartily wish that half a dozen of the same variety would now come to the relief of the Turkish government. It is very convenient to have such an angel for a friend. Inasmuch as an angel put it into Justinian's head to reconstruct the edifice, inasmuch as an angel furnished the plan and a good share of the money, and hurried up the work, I suggest that the building should have been dedicated to the angel who did so much, in place of the Holy Ghost, who seems to have done nothing. It is to be regretted, however, that notwithstanding the angel laid the plan, directed the work, and furnished the money, the dome should afterwards have fallen to the earth, doing great damage.

The angel who had done so much was good enough to appear still once more; when the emperor and head architect disagreed as to how the light should fall into the building, whether through one apse or two windows, the angel settled the dispute by again appearing to the emperor, clad in imperial purple and red shoes, and giving instructions that the light should fall upon the altar through three windows in honor of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. The altar was demanded to be more costly than gold, and consequently was made up of every species of precious stones and material, bedded together with gold and silver, encrusted with pearls and jewels. Above the altar rose, in the form of a tower, the tabernacle, on which rested a golden cupola, ornamented with golden lilies, between which was a golden cross weighing seventy-five pounds, and adorned with precious stones. The seven seats of the priests, together with the patriarch, which surrounded the altar in a semicircle from behind, were of silver gilt. The altar was hidden from the eyes of the people by a wooden wall; and this wall, through which three doors, covered with a veil, led to the sanctuary, was ornamented with gilded pictures of saints and twelve golden columns. The doors were of ivory, amber, and cedar, the principal door silver-gilt. Three of these doors were veneered with planks claimed to have been taken from Noah's ark. Wonderful planks, indeed!

The bringing together and preparation of the building materials occupied seven and a half years, and the building occupied eight and a half, making sixteen years altogether. When completed and fully furnished with all the sacred vessels, the emperor, accompanied by Patriarch Entychius, drove in on Christmas eve in 548. When he entered the church he stretched out his arms and thus exclaimed: "God be praised who hath esteemed we worthy to complete such a work. Solomon, I have surpassed thee!" On the following morning, Christmas, the church for the first time was formally opened, and the sacrifices and thanksgiving continued fourteen days.

But notwithstanding all this, notwithstanding it was dedicated to the Holy Ghost, the magnificent cathedral—planned, presided over, hurried, and largely paid for by the angel—was allowed to fall into the hands of the Infidel Turks in 1453, the year in which they took Constantinople under their Sultan Mahomed, since which time both the angel and the Holy Ghost have had no recognition there.

The exterior of the mosque is plain and unattractive. Without the vestibules it measures 235 feet from north to south and 250 feet from east to west. At each corner of the edifice is a minaret, the first by Sultan Mahomed, the second by Sultan Selim II., and the last two by Sultan Murad III. Mohammedanism here triumphed over Christianity and, whether it always retains it, has retained it for over four hundred years. The original paintings and mosaics of the cross and certain saints were obliterated or painted over when it came into the hands of the Mohammedans, and symbols and devices of their own religion substituted in their place, but the job was not so thoroughly done but what the crosses can still be seen through the covering.

The entire floor of the mosque is carpeted with a kind of durable matting, and all visitors are required to remove their boots and shoes and walk in slippers. We first ascended into a pretty high gallery for females, which run around on three sides. It is 180 feet in width, and of course capable of holding a great number. Here we could take in at a glance the grandeur of the place, with its wonderful dome, balanced, as it were, in the air, with a half dome on either side. The central dome is 107 feet in diameter, 46 feet high, and 180 feet above the ground. It is thought that no church exists whose interior is so beautiful as this marvelous creation of Byzantine art. Truly, the boldness of the scale, the beauty of its proportions, redound to the skill of the architect. To my mind, however, St. Peter's, at Rome, is more magnificent.

The different kinds of columns which were taken from the various pagan temples, and which are still standing and supporting this Mohammedan temple, present a very rich appearance. The present owners have of course made some changes. They have put in two pulpits, from one of which discourses are delivered to the people, the other being for the special benefit of the sultan when he attends. Several large round shields or tablets, twenty-five feet in diameter, covered with quotations from the Koran and other pious phrases in the Turkish language are placed against the walls some fifty feet from the floor. In the holiest part, near the altar, are the largest wax candles I ever saw; they are some fifteen inches in diameter and twelve to fifteen feet high. These are only lighted on certain occasions. They have been standing where they are for thirty years, and at the rate they have been consumed they must last fully a hundred years longer. A great number of rather plain chandeliers are suspended by wires from the top of the mosque, and are some fifteen feet from the floor. In these are glass bell-shaped cups inverted, partly filled with water with olive oil on the top, in which floats a wick, with an arrangement to hold it upright. On occasions of great festivals these, numbering eight thousand altogether, are all lighted. One of these festivals of four days is now in operation—the Koorban-bairam—or the feast of sacrifice, which is celebrated by feastings, sacrifices, and rejoicings. The Mohammedan lent—the Ramazan—lasts for twenty-eight days, and during that time every one of the faithful is required to abstain from food and drink from sunrise to sundown. At the termination of this time the feast of Bairam, the Mohammedan Easter, takes place for three days, celebrated by illuminations, feasting, and rejoicing. Seventy days from that time the feast Koorban-bairam, or sheep bairam, takes place, and this is the one going on at the present time. This accounts for the appearance of numerous flocks of sheep in various parts of the city. In view of this festival the peasants from the country have brought in the sheep to supply material for the feast and for sacrifice. The latter, I learn, is not of a destructive character; the meat is not burnt up, but simply well roasted. After thus being made holy, part of it is eaten at the time and part laid away in jars for future use. This is a decided improvement over burning good meat to a cinder, and probably answers the services of deity just as well. We hav seen great numbers of Turks examining those sheep in the public places, trying to select one that would be satisfactory to Allah and themselves, and when the choice is made and the animal paid for, they tie the fore leg and hind leg on the same side together and get the sheep upon their backs, and march off triumphantly, holding the animal by the fore legs, which come over the carrier's shoulder. I saw hundreds of sheep being thus transported about the city, and the patience of the Turks and the sheep struck me forcibly. I did not see one sheep making the least resistance, or hear one so much as bleat. In fact I thought they looked as though they rather enjoyed it. They reminded me of the lamb mentioned by Isaiah, which, when brought to the slaughter, opened not its mouth. As these sheep are of large size, they make a good load for a man. In this connection let me mention a peculiarity of these eastern sheep—they have a large appendage of fat attached to the tail, or forming a part of it, which flaps as the sheep walks, and looks unusual to one not familiar with them. I think I have seen some of these developments that would weigh seven or eight pounds. They are said to be exclusively fat, with the exception of a small bone, and are used in the place of butter. The sheep here are very fat, and the mutton is good. If Allah is fond of mutton as Yahweh used to be before his tastes changed, these Turkish sheep ought to please him remarkably well.

To return to the mosque, I will say that the regulations of Islam require every one of the faithful to turn their face toward Mecca when they pray; so in the mosque, instead of turning their faces toward where the altar used to stand, they turn them toward the southeast, in which direction is the Kubble, that is, the holy house of the Kaaba at Mecca. One of the pulpits mentioned is the Minber, from which on Friday the Kiatib or priest reads a solemn prayer for the sultan. Here, as in all mosques first dedicated to Islam through the power of arms, the orator still mounts the pulpit with a wooden sword, in commemoration of the conquest and foundation of Islam, which the prophet preached and propagated with the Koran in one hand and with the sword in the other. Two flags are suspended on either side of the pulpit to denote the victory of Islam over both Judaism and Christianity; of the Koran over both the Old and New Testaments. The minber is to be found only in the great mosques in which the Khutbe is held on Friday, and differs from the pulpit in which ordinary preaching is performed. On each side, between the two porphyry columns taken from the Temple of the Sun, stands an enormous marble vase, brought from the Sea of Marmora by the command of Sultan Murad III. Each holds one thousand measures of corn, and one of them is said once to have been filled with coin. They are now filled with a cheaper commodity—water—for the refreshment of the faithful. They remind one of the fonts in Christian churches.

On the top of the minarets glitter crescents (the ancient coat of arms of Byzantium, which are to be found on Byzantine coins, and was adopted by Mohammedans). The largest is on the cupola. Sultan Murad III. is said to have expended over fifty thousand ducats in gilding alone. These gilded crescents may be seen several miles from the city; some say a hundred miles, but that must be a mistake. The dome of St. Sophia has been called the Islam Olympus.

There are numerous pious and impossible stories narrated about St. Sophia, as there are about almost every important Christian church. Amongst others an excavated block of red marble is shown as the cradle of Jesus in his infancy, and near by it is a basin in which Jesus is said to have been washed by his mother. Both are claimed to have been brought from Bethlehem, but nobody believes it save overcredulous Mohammedans. Even the Christians, who are so fond of relics and miracles, take no stock in these big stories, probably because Mohammedans claim to have the relics. Here is the famous "sweating column" which has performed so many miraculous cures for the faithful Mussulmans. It stands at the left of the entrance on the northern gate. The base is surrounded by a sheet of rolled brass, with a hole in it reaching to the column, which has been worn and enlarged by the hundreds of thousands of credulous believers who have there inserted their fingers to obtain some of the moisture, the result of condensation of the dampness in the air coming in contact with the colder column. This "sweating" is believed to cure all the ills flesh is heir to. It is hard to say whether Mohammedanism or Christianity has given rise to the most extravagant claims, and the most absurd traditions to be believed. Any system of religion which has supernaturalism for its basis necessarily implies an unlimited amount of supernatural events. If a religion is founded on miracles, and the assent is given to the claims of supernaturalism to start with, it is hard to say where it will end. If the principle is admitted in the first place, it is a little embarrassing to say no afterward.

The most brilliant illumination of the mosque in the whole year is said to be the Leilet-al-Kadr, that is, the Night of the Predestination (the twenty-fourth day of Ramazan), in which the Koran was sent down from heaven, or rather, in commemoration of that event. On this night the sultan repairs, with his whole court, to St. Sophia, and after there attending the night services he retires amidst a procession bearing innumerable many-colored lanterns to the Seraglio. During all these nights of illuminations the numerous priesthood of the mosque are in full movement of the exercise of their office. They comprise the imaums, sheiks, kiatibs, muezzins, dewn kooran, naatshuran, bewah, ferash, and kasim. These are the different orders of the priesthood. They have different duties to perform, and may be considered the counterparts of Christian priests, deacons, sub-deacons, readers, singers, doorkeepers, lamp-lighters, etc. The doors of the mosques are always open, but for strangers to enter St. Sophia requires a fee of seven francs, or $1.40 each. In addition to what I have mentioned, the mosque contains many tombs of the dead sultans.

We next visited the mosque built by the sultan Ahmed, said to be the most pious of the Ottoman sultans. As every sultan is expected to erect a mosque to perpetuate his name and secure the blessing of heaven, so this sultan, of course, must erect a very fine mosque, and he wished to furnish six minarets; but the great sheik-Islam, objected to this, saying there was but one mosque in the world allowed to have six minarets, and that was the one at Mecca. The pious sultan replied that the one at Mecca had seven minarets, but the great sheik denied this upon the authority of his own eyes, for he had been there and seen it. The sultan still persisted that it had seven, and proposed that a special messenger be sent to count them. Though the sheik knew positively that the number was six, he was constrained to yield to the sultan that a messenger be sent out to count them. Before, however, the messenger was despatched on this holy errand, the sultan sent in haste a private agent to hurriedly erect another minaret, if only temporary, to the mosque at Mecca, so when the messenger arrived he found there were seven minarets, and he returned and reported accordingly, in consequence of which the sultan was allowed to have six minarets to his mosque, and it is the only one in all the Ottoman empire that has that number. They are graceful, and impart much beauty to the edifice. It measures 235 by 210 feet. It has four enormous pillars at the four corners, measuring 108 feet in circumference. They support the dome and rise above it at its four sides, looking like towers. The cupola of the great dome is surrounded by four half-cupolas, each of which is joined by two round cupolas, forming behind the four enormous pillars the four corners of the mosque, which therefore appear on the outside to be composed of nine cupolas. Round both sides of the mosque runs a double gallery, one on the outside, the other inside, in which, under the benches for the readers of the Koran, and above them, there are treasure vaults for depositing gold and other valuables in times of danger, as is also the custom in the other great mosques. It has five thousand lamps, like those before described, for the important illuminations. This is the season of the festive procession of the pilgrim caravans, and of the solemn meeting of the court and officers of state to celebrate the Mirlood, or the festival of the birth of the prophet. On this occasion the sultan appears in his greatest splendor, surrounded by all the functionaries of church and state, to assist in singing the praises of the prophet. The income from this mosque is annually 200,000 piasters. Adjoining is a round edifice, the tomb of the sultan who built the mosque. Here in the mosque are huge white candles, which are lighted on occasions of illumination. Some of his most esteemed wives are buried near him. On a peculiar kind of book rack, wrapped in richly embroidered cloth, lies a copy of the Koran, most neatly executed with a pen, and embellished with elaborate gold ornamentation. An immense amount of labor and care was requisite to execute it.

The mosque of Sultan Suliman is considered a beautiful specimen of Osmanli architecture, and is one of the most conspicuous in the city. It is a regular rectangle, 225 by 205 feet. As it is to considerable extent a copy of St. Sophia, I will not need to give a detailed description of it. And as there are some twenty-five or fifty mosques in the city you could hardly expect me to visit them all or to attempt a description of them even if I had visited them. I am sure neither would be desirable, but I did visit a small mosque, converted from an old church, which I will mention. It is Mosque Kakhrick, and is said to be a hundred and fifty years older than St. Sophia. It is in the Byzantine style, and in the arches overhead are fine antique mosaics of Jesus, the virgin, and several saints. Some of these representations are whitewashed over, but the whitewash has been removed so that the original pictures show again. Among the ancient representations I noticed a phallic emblem, formed of two fishes in the shape of the yoni, inclosing a figure of Jesus. This is clearly a borrowed idea from one of the oldest religions in the world, and is another illustration of the tendency of Christians to appropriate older religious notions.

We visited several tombs where sultans are buried, with wives, brothers, etc., by their sides. Some of these are gotten up with great expense, and exhibit quite a degree of magnificence. The large wax candles, the chandeliers, the rich copy of the Koran, are generally to be met with. We visited an open space called the Hippodrome, where public sports used to take place. Here the pillar of Pompey, an Egyptian, is erected, and another monument of stone, formerly covered with bronze, is still standing. There is, however, little here to interest the visitor. We next visited a museum containing figures gotten up to represent all the officers in the nation, from the sultan down to the executioner, as well as the firemen and tradesmen of different kinds. There are perhaps some hundred and fifty of them all, and rather a hard looking lot they are. The sight is not extremely pleasing. Next we visited what are called the Thousand and One Columns, which is an underground reservoir for water for the use of the city, constructed some hundreds of years ago, but which long since passed out of use. The way a thousand columns are counted is by counting one as three, holding that each column is composed of three, one over the other. It seems like a vast cellar, now quite dry, with stone columns all through it to hold up the roof of earth. Several lads were reeling and twisting silk in there, the coolness and partial dampness of the air being congenial to the work.

THE WALLS OF CONSTANTINOPLE.

We rode by carriage some two or three miles through the central part of the city, over extremely rough and narrow streets bounded mostly by miserable, dilapidated, wooden houses that seem to be of little value save as food for flames, to the seven towers in the walls of the city, which are four miles from Seraglio Point where we started. The walls, commenced by Constantine and completed by Theodosius, are triple, and built partly of stone and partly of brick, with towers every one or two hundred feet. The inner wall is about thirty feet in hight, and the towers are capable of holding fifty men each. Outside the walls was a moat, which when filled with water, added materially to the defenses of the city. The whole length of the wall is about thirteen miles, and takes in all of Stamboul. It was supplied with numerous gates used for admission to various parts of the city. But the walls, from time, earthquakes, several sieges, and neglect, have passed greatly into decay, and in many places have fallen over, and the towers split, riven, and broken. The seven towers at the lower point of the city, on the Sea of Marmora, are larger and stronger than the majority of the towers, and are at least fifty or sixty feet high and forty feet in diameter. They are heavily built of stone and still look capable of withstanding a siege. We ascended to the top of one of them, and had a fine view of the parts adjacent, city and country. We rode a few miles without the walls and saw something of the gardens and miles of cemetery where the bones of the faithful have moldered to decay. In several places we saw the natives plowing the bed of the moat for garden purposes, and noticed numerous indications of fertility. The soil is good. The tall, dark cypress-trees, a hundred feet in hight, are abundant and afford richness to the landscape. They are a peculiarly formed tree, narrow as well as tall, in form somewhat like a Lombardy poplar, but more graceful in appearance. We were shown the gate in the wall where the Turks made their entrance when they took the city in 1453.

We were not shown the holy fish of Constantinople, but were told concerning them. The story runs in this way: At the time the Turks took the city the news was conveyed to a certain person who was engaged at frying fish in a pan. He discredited the news that was told him, and he expressed his disbelief, saying he would as soon believe that those fish before him would jump out of the pan and be alive again, when, strange to relate, no sooner had he spoken these words than sure enough the fish did jump out of the frying-pan alive and well, and of course became very holy fish, insomuch that they have lived some four hundred and twenty-eight years, are alive yet, and bid fair to stand it several centuries longer. Of course I do not expect any more of you will believe the story than are convinced of its truth; but I beg to assure you that the fish are still pointed out, and that the story is no more fishy than some other holy fish stories which thousands are able to believe implicitly. Why cannot you believe as well as they?

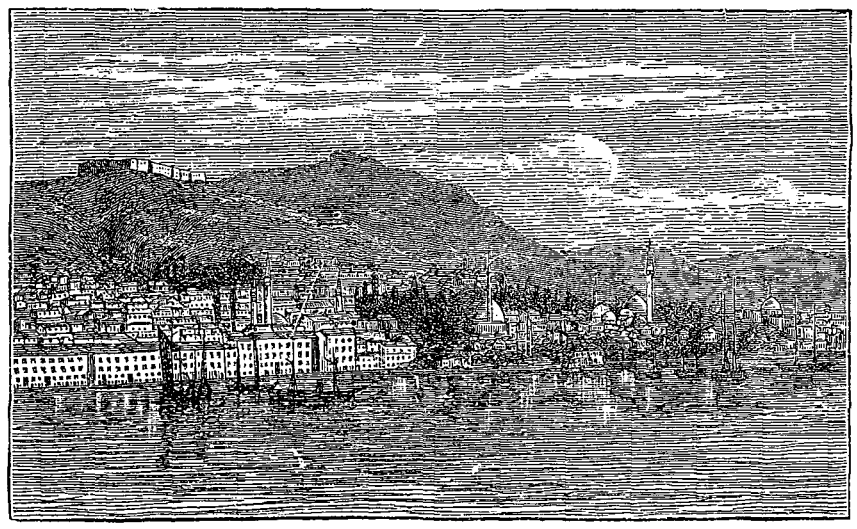
UP THE BOSPHORUS.

On Tuesday morning we repaired early to the steamer making regular trips up the Bosphorus to the Black Sea, some twelve miles distant. The Bosphorus, as you well know, is the stream which connects the Black Sea with the Sea of Marmora, and through the Dardanelles with the Mediterranean. It is about as wide as the Hudson river twenty miles from New York, and for beauty of sites and formation is not excelled either by the Rhine or the Hudson. Its best sites are mostly occupied with villages and fine residences, but there are still many not improved. The European side is the pleasantest and by far the best improved, the villages along the west bank making an almost continuous town for miles.

We made numerous calls, putting off and taking on passengers all the way along.

Close by the water's edge, as we round into the Bosphorus from the Golden Horn, we pass three or four fine palaces built by the sultans who are now lying in their graves, which cost princely sums of borrowed money, but are not now used, the present sultan, as I observed, deeming the location less healthy and far more unsafe than the palace on the hill in the rear, where he resides. I head a person who visited one of these palaces describe its magnificence and richness as exceeding anything he had ever witnessed, the splendor outdoing the most extravagant fairy tales and the glowing pictures and imagery of the "Arabian Nights," gold and tinsel being used without the slightest stint. It seems like immense folly that an impoverished nation, which has so many needs for money, should throw it away in such a foolish manner. "Pride goeth before a fall, and a haughty spirit before destruction."

Very noticeable features in all the little villages along the banks of the Bosphorus are the numerous minarets, telling that the houses which they surmount are for Allah. Minarets, indeed, are plentiful, but the chimneys of manufacturing establishments are to be seen nowhere. I could not suppress the reflection how much better it would be for this country could all these minarets, now so useless and and unproductive, become the chimneys of thrifty manufacturing establishments—for the use of humanity instead of God. There are people enough now idle to work them, and consumers enough to use up all the goods that could thus be manufactured. When one looks on this city and country and sees the fortunes that have been spent in building houses for Allah, and the hordes of priests requisite to run them, who spend their days in idleness, like drones in what should be the hive of industry—a dead weight to those who do work—he cannot help wishing that man would learn to let the gods take care of themselves, and that he would give less attention to the affairs of another world and devote his time and abilities to making this world better, and to increasing the comforts and happiness of those in this life. The goods do not need man's efforts, while man himself has need of all of them. Oh, that the world may ere long learn to let the gods go, and to work more for the brothers and sisters of humanity! Our own America has much yet to learn in this direction.



Some four or five miles above the city, high up on the bank of the Bosphorus, in full view of the passing boats, stands Robert College, the product of American energy and capital. The money to build it, and to pay the board of professors, was raised by the zealous Christians of America, under the auspices of the Board of Foreign Missions, for the sake of giving the young men of this country a Christian education. I learn that the establishment has been rather successful, and now has nearly two hundred scholars. Funds, however, are not quite plentiful enough, and Dr. Washburn is now on a trip to America to beg more money from the people to keep up this school. Money could doubtless be used much more foolishly, but it is very questionable whether sustaining a sectarian school in this far off land is the best use the money could be put to. Of course every child who receives a good education is greatly benefited, but when his mind is filled with silly dogmas, not sustained by truth, a serious injury is done him, a species of mental weeds are planted in his mind which are of no use to him, and are uprooted with positive pain and toil.

We did not get far into the Black Sea, but can say we saw it. The return was as beautiful as the ride up, and we were back in time for lunch.

SCUTARI.

In the afternoon we took a steamer and crossed the Bosphorus to the branch of the city on the opposite side, called Scutari (accent on the first syllable). Here for the first time we placed our feet upon the soil of Asia. The town has no great beauty to boast of save the fine sites it enjoys for a fine view of Stamboul, Galata, Pera, and the harbor of the Golden Horn. The streets are steep and narrow, the houses mostly poor, and everything wears a dilapidated, thriftless appearance. We took carriages and climbed the abrupt hill, calling first at the American school for girls, conducted under the direction of the American Foreign Missionary Society, as is Robert College. The school, which has been in operation ten years, was for two years conducted in a hired building in Stamboul, when it was deemed desirable to occupy premises of its own; by the exertions of the ladies of the American Missionary Society, particularly in Boston, the sum of $50,000 was raised, the ground bought, and the building erected now occupied. A year ago a wealthy Christian man of America visited the place, and seeing the need of an additional building, donated the sum of $25,000, and with that generous sum a durable building is now being erected. The school is under the care of Dr. Woods, who, I think, is a New England man, assisted by Miss Williams as principal lady teacher, who, I understood her to say, is from Utica, N. Y. They received us very kindly, and politely showed us over the establishment, including the school-rooms, dining-room, and the sleeping rooms or dormatories, which are rather narrow rooms twenty-five feet in length, holding each ten single beds. The whole is kept very neat, and it is not hard to realize that American enterprise and thrift have had something to do in this far off Asiatic land.

There are eighty scholars in the school, ranging from twelve to eighteen years, fifty of whom board in the establishment, and thirty live at home and attend school only in the establishment. The education is chiefly in English, though some other languages are taught. The principal studies are the English language, history, grammar, geography, mathematics (the simpler branches), astronomy, and the principal natural sciences. Sectarianism is said not to be taught, though considerable attention is paid to Bible lessons, which are attended to every day. The girls are of various nationalities—Armenian, Bulgarian, one or two Greeks, and two or three Turks, who join in the Bible lessons with the other girls. It is not expected, however, to make Christians of them, as Mohammedans turn Christians as seldom as Christians become Mohammedans. A decidedly religious air pervades the establishment, and numerous pious cards and mottoes are hanging up in the halls and in every room, reading like this: "This house is for God," "All for Jesus," etc. We were taken into the school-room and heard the recitations of a class of large girls in exercises of giving definitions to words, spelling, etc. For persons who have been studying English but one or two years they did remarkably well, and seemed as bright and active as American girls; in fact, though some of them look a trifle dark, many of them are as light in complexion as though of English or American birth.

VIEW ON THE BOSPHORUS.—KENI KENI.

The most interesting feature which we saw was the gymnastic exercises of twenty-four of the larger girls, from fourteen to seventeen years of age. They are dressed in a suitable and becoming uniform—a skirt reaching nearly to the knees, with a belt round the waist and something like pantalets fitting closely around the ankles. The room in which they exercise is forty feet or more in length, by twenty in width, with a platform nearly two feet in hight, and a piano at one end. We were placed on the platform. The exercises consisted of marching in varied evolutions, skipping exercises with dumb-bells, rings, or broomsticks (or what looked like them). They moved in concert with military precision, and reminded one of the evolutions of a well-drilled company of soldiers, or a good ballet troupe. They have been well drilled, and the practice, while not extremely laborious, affords excellent exercise. The evolutions lasted some fifteen or twenty minutes, and, being accompanied by good piano music, it seemed like a fair entertainment. We were afterwards taken to the top of the house, where we had a splendid view of the city across the Bosphorus and the surrounding country. There are four female American teachers in the school, besides an equal number who teach the languages spoken in this part of the world.

The conduct of the school affords a very fair position for the American teachers who are here, but it is said one of them could receive twice the salary she now obtains by remaining in America. Probably she thinks she can do a greater amount of good here; but unfortnnately we have any number of poor ragged little heathens in our own country on whom any quantity of philanthropy and good will can be expended, and perhaps with as much benefit as here. But foreign heathens have a peculiar charm for our devout Christian friends. This school was a heavy expense to the American donors for the first few years, but it is now getting to be self-sustaining, as the parents of many of the girls pay for their tuition and board. It is a fine thing to have so good a school for girls in this benighted neighborhood, and if thousands more could be established in various parts of the East, I cannot object to the effort; the only change I would suggest is that the Bible lessons be omitted, leaving the Mohammedans and all others to study their own Bible, or any other, or none at all, as their tastes dictate. This compulsory rule of studying the Christian Bible, nolens volens, as in our own country, is of course objectionable. And as the first person who has yet been converted from Mohammedanism to Christianity has yet to be reported, it would seem that insisting upon the study of the Christian scriptures is scarcely a paying investment. And I must repeat that, as charity begins at home, and we have a great plenty of godless children growing up in ignorance in America, it would seem that those very benevolent persons who contribute to keep up this school might find near home a field large enough to occupy all their zeal and surplus money; besides, as the work would not be so far as arm's-length, it could be much more easily performed.

We next drove a considerable distance south of the town to the English cemetery, where the British soldiers who fell in the Crimean War, or rather those who died in the hospital here, were buried. It is within half a mile of the hospital or barracks where Florence Nightingale showed such wonderful skill in nursing and caring for the poor wounded and sick soldiers. The English people caused a fine granite monument, about seventy-five feet high, with the figures of four large-sized winged angels (also in granite) at each corner, as a memorial for the brave men who fell in that bloody conquest. The graves of the officers are, of course, marked with pretty and somewhat expensive monuments, lying horizontally over the grave like a marble box, while the graves of the common soldiers are not even marked. So in death, as in life, the poor, common man passes unknown and unseen.

On Wednesday the time was spent in revisiting the bazars and other points of interest as each preferred. Bro. Getz and two or three others visited the American Bible House in Stamboul, but as I have the privilege of living close to the parent establishment in New York, and without deriving any appreciable advantage from it, even in a course of years, I was not specially anxious to visit the comparatively inferior branch in this quarter. Mr. Getz reports, however, that little was to be seen save the offices where the business is transacted, the same being under the supervision of an American by the name of Bliss. If the books he causes to be distributed only bring bliss to the recipients, it will indeed be a blissful transaction altogether. I learn that the Bible is issued here in several languages, including that of Turkey, but the converts made thereby from the following of Mohammed may be counted on the fingers or even on one thumb.

BRIEF HISTORY OF CONSTANTINOPLE.

Ancient Byzantium was situated on she extremity of the promontory where the Seraglio now stands.

The modern city, like Rome, stands on seven low hills, one rising above the ether, in the rear of Byzantium. Probably no city in the world has a more favorable or beautiful position. Nature has done her full share by this locality, not only with regard to the site for a city, but also including water facilities for commerce, easy means of defense, climate, soil, and healthfulness. Commanding the navigation between the Euxine and the Mediterranean, and the converging shores of Europe and Asia, it unites the advantages of security, and great facilities for trade, with the most striking scenery. Scarcely another place on the globe is so well adapted as the center of a great empire.

The foundation of Byzantium is ascribed to the Megarians, who settled here 667 B.C., a few days years later than Chalcedon, across the Bosphorus below Scutari. The place is now called Kadi-Keng. It faces the shores of Asia, and meets the waters of the Bosphorus. Tradition has it that an oracle directed the first colonists to build their new city "opposite the land of the blind," in allusion to the superiority of this site over that of its neighbor, Chalcedon. Its position in all ages made Byzantium of great importance, and its possession was fiercely contested by the Persians, Spartans, and Athenians. It was beseiged by Alcibiades. Three hundred and forty years before our era the Athenians, urged on by Demosthenes, helped to defend the city against Philip of Macedon, who was at last forced to retire. During this memorable siege, on a dark night, when the Macedonians were on the point of carrying the town by assault, a light is said to have appeared in the heavens and to have revealed their danger to the inhabitants of the town. The crescent, which, as before remarked, is found on the old Byzantine coins, and which was long after adopted by the Turks as their device when they had taken the city, is supposed to commemorate this portentous event.

I will not pretend to trace all the events that happened to the old city, but they are represented to have been strange and varied. It fell under the power of Rome, with the rest of the Grecian world. before the Christian era, and was made the seat of empire by Constantine in 330. It was besieged by the emperors Severus, Maximus, and Constantius In 527 to 565 Justinian enriched and beautified the city. In 616 it was besieged by Chosroes II., and in 626 by the Persians and Avars. In 668 the Arabs for the first time attacked the city, but were rebuffed by the strength of the walls and the strange effects of the Greek fire. In the second siege, from 716 to 718, they were again compelled to retreat. In 865 the Russians made their first attempt to take the city, followed by a second in 904, and a third in 941. and a fourth in 1043. In 1203-4 the Latin Crusaders under Dandalo, the Doge of Venice, conquered and pillaged the imperial city, and set up Latin emperors of the house of the court of Flanders; but it was recovered by the Greeks in 1261. In 1422 it was besieged by Amurath II., called by the Turks Moorad, and finally fell on Mav 29, 1453, before the conquering sword of Mahomed II., called by the Turks Mohammed. Since that period it has been looked up to both by Turks and Greeks as the seat of the supreme spiritual and temporal power of the sultan and the Greek patriarch; the one at the head of the Mohammedan faith and the other of the Greek church. The heir of the caliphs has become also the heir of the Cæsars. Constantinople has been besieged twenty-four times and taken six.

The following is a list of the sultans since the conquest of Constantinople; and each one built a mosque bearing his name.

Mohammed II. (Mahomed) the Conqueror died 1481.
Bayezid (Bajazet) II. (his son) died in 1512.
Selim I., the Great (his son) died 1520.
Suleiman the Magnificent (his son) died 1566.
Selim II. (his son) died 1574.
Murad (Amurath) III. (his son) died 1595.
Mohammed III. (Mahomed) (his son) died 1603.
Ahmed I. (his son) died 1617.
Mostafa I. (brother of the last) deposed 1618
Osman (son of Ahmed I.) strangled in 1622.
Murad IV. (son of Ahmed I.) died 1640.
Ibrahim (son of Ahmed I.) strangled in 1648.
Mohammed IV. (his son) resigned in 1687
Suleiman II. (son of Ibrahim) died 1691.
Ahmed II. (son of Ibrahim) died 1695.
Mustafa II. (son of Mohammed IV.) resigned 1703.
Ahmed III (son of Mohammed IV.) died 1730
Mohammed V. (son of Mustafa II.) died 1754.
Osman III. (son of Ahmed III). died 1757.
Mustafa III. (son of Ahmed III.) died 1774
Abdul Hamid (son of Ahmed III.) died 1789.
Selim III. (son of Mustafa III.) strangled in 1804.
Mustafa IV (son of Abdul Hamid) died 1808
Mahmoud II. (son of Abdul Hamid) died 1839.
Abdul Mejid (son of Mahmoud II.) died 1861
Abdul Aziz (son of Mahmoud II.) deposed 1876.
Murad V. deposed 1876.
Abdul Hamid II. the present sultan.

In Turkey's palmiest days it is quite probable that the sultans and the government occupied a proud position among the nations of Europe, but it is saddening now to realize that all this greatness has departed. Since the Crimean war she has been steadily going down deeper and deeper into poverty and insignificance. In that war, when her soldiers came in direct contact with the soldiers of Great Britain and France, the Turks were sensitive and observing enough to realize their inferiority to the English and French, and the most sensible of them have realized that it was only a matter of time when they would be compelled to leave Europe and retire to Asia, which is their natural home. They have held Turkey in Europe for four centuries because they conquered it, and not because they have a real right to it, or are fitted to occupy it; and it is this consciousness which has brought a portion of the people to a willingness to sell out here on the best terms they can, to remove to Damascus or Bagdad, and begin an empire anew. There are, however, so many difficulties to be surmounted in a great movement of this kind that it is impossible to see how it is to be accomplished.

The Turks have many traits of character much to be admired, as well as some not so admirable. As a people they are honest, patient, faithful, and kind-hearted. While on the passage from Corfu to Athens I got acquainted with Mr. Foster, an Englishman, the principal of the Ottoman bank in Constantinople, a bank, by the bye, which has a paid up capital of $25,000,000 (belonging principally to Great Britain and France); he has resided in this city for ten years and has had much dealings with large numbers of the Turkish people. He says they are remarkable for their integrity, good nature, and genial qualities, and far exceed in these respects the people of some other nations. He says they are very loyal, and if they only had an efficient government, and if the leading men of the country were competent to lead them aright, they would make a most excellent people. The great trouble is the public affairs have been terribly mismanaged, and a class of incompetent men have been in power for a long time, and the finance, the courage, and energy of the people have sunk to so low an ebb that it is hard to see what is to save them from inevitable and total ruin.

I inquired of him with regard to the customs of the people, especially with respect to polygamy. He says the sultan, some of the pachas, and a few of the wealthy men have more than one wife; and, while there is no prohibition as to the number of wives a man may marry, the great bulk of the people confine themselves to one wife. The exceptions among the lower classes as where men think they need a second or third wife to help them do their work. This applies more particularly to those who live in the country, for the women in Constantinople seem to have but little to do. Here marriage is a matter of bargain and sale more than love. The consent of the girl is not asked, but the bargain is effected entirely with her parents. If the terms are agreed upon between the bridegroom and the young woman's father, all that remains for her to do is to passively accept the lot fate casts for her; if she can learn to love her destined husband it is all right, but if she cannot love him she has to submit all the same. If a peasant, or a countryman, after marrying a wife, prospers somewhat from being able to keep one cow, and becomes able to keep five cows, or an equivalent number of goats, and finds he needs more help to perform the increased quantity of work to be done, he takes the second wife, or the third, as the case may be, finding it cheaper to marry and own his help than to hire other labor. A wife here is little better than a slave. She is not expected to do much thinking, to acquire any education, to have any independence of character, or to be anything more than a mere cipher.

Some of the Turkish women turn out to be prostitutes, but a smaller percentage than the women of most countries; and those that take that unfortunate course do so less openly than their sisters in shame in other places. There are said to be prostitutes enough in Constantinople, but mostly foreigners, and among them may be counted many English, French, and German women.

The discouraging state of things which exists in Turkey is said to have led to some very reprehensible practices. I learn that infanticide and abortions are extensively practiced. Men and women will both say, "Why should we raise a family of children only to inherit the ills which will be sure to await them? Evil days are before us, and we would rather have no children to see them."

The men of Turkey are a hardy, muscular, enduring class, and make the very best of soldiers. No men can endure hardship and privation more patiently, and the fear of death is unknown to them. The promise of their prophet was that every faithful Mussulman upon dying should enter at once into paradise, and that nine beautiful houris should be his portion. Having implicit confidence in this agreeable promise, death is more to be wished than prolonged life, and, so far as indifference to death induces bravery, the Turks are freely endued with it. What they need is good generalship; with that they would make an army able to compete with any in the world.

I said the women of Constantinople have little work to do. It is so when compared with the other women of Europe. In England the women act as clerks and helpers in nearly all kinds of vocations. Among the peasant class they work in the fields, but perhaps not so generally as in Germany, Saxony, Bohemia, and other portions of Austria. In those countries I saw women doing nearly all kinds of farm labor, including driving oxen, loading hay, digging roots, binding grain, etc. In Vienna I saw women mixing mortar and carrying the hod one or two stories from the ground. But here in Constantinople I see no women tending any kind of shops, selling goods of any kind, or doing any sort of work. I see many on the streets, but they all seem to be out shopping or walking about for recreation and pleasure. I have seen none acting as chambermaids or waiters at hotels; the cooking is done by men; the rooms are cleaned and the beds are made by men, and I am told the women of the city have very little to do. If I have wronged them in describing them as not good-looking, I beg their pardon if I have done them an injustice, and I must admit that since writing those strictures I have met some Turkish women who were not ugly, and would pass for tolerably good looking.

I also see too many idle men as I go about the city. In every principal street numbers of these are sitting about with apparently nothing to do. Turkey is very deficient in manufactures, which is one of the misfortunes of the country. The poverty of the government is such that an export tax has to be levied, which discourages effort in the line of export and manufacture. If Turkey could be induced to manufacture ten times as much as she now does, and to produce three times as much for export, her poverty would soon take wings. The principal exports I hear of are opium, ottar of roses, figs, raisins, mohair, and some carpets and silk, but the quantities of these might be largely increased with enterprise and energy. The hand of the government is also so heavy upon such industries as the people tardily exercise as to discourage the efforts that would otherwise be made. From all I can learn, the agricultural products of the country are far less than they might be, as around Constantinople much good land is cultivated but little or not at all; so it is through the interior. The country is undoubtedly capable of producing five times as much as the Turks manage to get out of it if occupied by a really industrious people.

The fidelity of the great bulk of the Turks to their religious superstitions cannot be doubted. There are perhaps no more sincere religionists in the world. These Mohammedans spend more time in prayer than the adherents of any other faith. They look to Allah with the most implicit confidence that he will direct everything for their best good, and that he manages and directs everything to take place just as it does. To such extent is this feeling carried that they are little more than fatalists, believing that every event is planned by Allah. They spend a very considerable part of their time in worshiping him and singing his praises. In this very direction is where these people are greatly misled; herein exists the great error of their existence—they think far too much of Allah and not enough of themselves, or care too little for their own welfare. The poor Mohammedans have too much religion; it is a positive disadvantage to them and holds them in an erroneous course of life; in other words, they have too much superstition; they believe in too much falsehood; they disregard the powers which have a real existence, and pay allegiance to an imaginary being which has none. In this respect they are by no means alone, but as a people they probably carry it farther than others, and to such extent as to make their lives fruitless and of little effect. In them is to be seen a full illustration of superstitious belief carried to the extreme.

I said no one can doubt their sincerity or honesty of purpose; they show this in thousands of instances. During their month of fasting, called Ramazan, in which they are taught it is wrong to taste food or drink from sunrise to sunset, they observe it with the utmost strictness. As their time is divided off into lunar months, this twenty-eight days of fasting comes four weeks earlier every succeeding year, and a portion of the time it comes in the long hot days of summer. I am informed, by those who have had opportunities for observing, that the faithful Mussulman will toil out in the hot, burning sun from sunrise to sunset without putting anything into his mouth, either food or drink, or even swallowing the saliva that might gather in his mouth. So rigid is their observance of this fast, which they believe to be demanded by heaven, that they would drop dead in their tracks before they would do as much as take a mouthful of water, or a crumb of bread. They often make amends, however, by indulging in excesses as soon as the sun has gone down, and keep up their feasting for half the night. It of course must be an ignorant, superstitious people that could yield their assent to such a course, and think that thereby they were pleasing the being who created the world. But all religious devotees believe in fasts, and all indulge in feasts and excesses when the fast is over. They believe that fasting and praising incline heaven most favorably toward them, and that the deity is most pleased when they are doing the most violence to themselves. If the time the Mohammedans spend in prayer and in worship was occupied in learning the truths of science, if the time they devote to God was devoted to agriculture, they would be infinitely better off. These remarks will apply with equal truth to the superstitious devotees of other systems of religion.

I am pleased to say we have had very favorable weather since we have been viewing the city of minarets. The air has been mild and balmy, the temperature being about seventy-two degrees through the day and some ten degrees lower at night. The sun has been bright and the sky blue and soft, and flecked with light, fleecy clouds. But last night the rain fell freely and continued for several hours. This interfered with the grand pageant designed for this morning. The sultan was to ride on horseback from his palace to St. Sophia mosque, and be there in time to open the religious services precisely at sunrise; the military were to accompany him in large force, and tens of thousands of the faithful, with spectators and strangers, were also to be on hand to witness the grand display. We were to join in seeing the big show, by turning out at five o'clock in the dark, to intercept the procession somewhere on its line of march. But when we heard the rain freely falling we concluded to let the sultan and his soldiers wend their way to the grand mosque without our society. They, however, performed their part of the display in the rain, though with a limited number of spectators. To-day is the first day of the feast of Koorbanbairam, and the faithful abandon themselves to jollity and thoughtlessness. It should, however, be a mournful reflection to them that the very money with which the government pays the expenses of this feast was borrowed from the Ottoman bank, at the ruinous rate of ten per cent interest, and on a pledge of the revenues of the government two years after the present year. This is absolutely the basis on which the people are keeping this religious festival. The ceremonies began last night by the illumination of the eight thousand lamps at St. Sophia, five thousands at the Mosque Ahmed, five thousand at the Mosque Sulieman, and a corresponding number at the many other mosques. We all talked some of going to St. Sophia, but as the distance is considerable, and as more or less danger is said to attend sight-seers in Constantinople at night, we concluded to forego the pleasure.

The question, in view of all I have seen and learned of this country, arises, What is to become of this poor people, and what will be the ultimate fate of the Turkish government? The sultan is said to be a very genial, well-disposed sort of man, but lacks energy, decision, and foresight. He is clearly not the man to lead his unfortunate country to prosperity, and none of the leading men of the government are equal to the necessities of the situation. There is no Moses here to lead this people from the state of bondage and want in which they are groaning—no Mohammed to lead them to victory and triumph. In place of this they are constantly sinking deeper in debt and daily approaching the shoals and rocks of national bankruptcy, which are even now but a little way ahead. What is to be done? The nations who have heavy claims against the country—who hold mortgages against all that is valuable in the land—will have to foreclose and take the country under their own control. The Turks will have to retire to Asia, to relinquish the country and city conquered by the sword of Mohammed, and let another people, a better civilization, and better enterprise develop the natural resources of Turkey in Europe which they have failed to bring out.

England has the heaviest claims against Turkey, and it seems to me if she could be permitted to take the country, give the Turks a few hundred thousand pounds to enable them to make another start at Damascus or Bagdad, and dispose of the land of Turkey at reasonable prices to such settlers as would come in and occupy it, administering the government with her usual ability, it would be the best thing that can be done. But another question arises, Who are to step in and take the place of the Turks? Where are the people who will re-people Turkey in case the Turks leave? Another difficulty is, the other nations of Europe would not consent that England should have Turkey alone. Constantinople is too important a point, too commanding a position, to be quietly turned over to her. They will probably unite again in preventing Russia from taking it; but they will not agree that England shall have it. A joint government may be established, or perhaps the country may be divided up between England, France, Russia, Germany, and Austria; but if that is attempted, serious difficulties will undoubtedly arise. I will not, however, anticipate them. I have had a pleasant visit here, and now we will leave for countries still farther east. One visit, however, to this city is enough; I think I shall never care to make another. I shall remember it as a city containing many capacious mosques, a city with miles of busy bazars, with many stately buildings, but with narrow, irregular, rough, filthy streets; tens of thousands of dilapidated, tumble-down wooden houses, better adapted for making ashes than anything else; thousands of scheming, money-making Jews, thousands of equally scheming Greeks, thousands of medieval Armenians, thousands of the sons of the desert, the simon-pure Arabs; thousands of toiling, patient Turks, and tens of thousands who seem to have a little or nothing to do, sitting idly in the streets, in the cafés, in the market-places, and on all hands and sides. I will remember it not only as the headquarters of the Mohammedan religion—the sultan being its first official—but the headquarters for the Greek Christian church is here, the partriarch being stationed in Constantinople, as is the pope of the Romish church in Rome. The patriarch has not so gorgeous a palace as has the pope, but he still has a princely looking mansion, and the chief Greek church looks well at a distance. A fine edifice for schools, new and capacious, looks well from the Golden Horn and from the Pera side. I think the Greeks are patiently waiting their time, hoping that by some fortunate turn in affairs they may become the possessors of all this country.

There are many points and peculiarities of Constantinople worthy of note which I have not mentioned. One I intended to call your attention to, and perhaps it is not yet too late. That is the way in which the night passes in this city. I said the street-criers and pedlars keep up their horrible tones till ten o'clock, after which the policemen and dogs have full control. The policemen carry a long club or pole, which I should judge to be of hard wood, and which they bring down upon the pavement endwise with such a thud as to arouse all the neighborhood, including those asleep in their beds. We call it "pestling." It seems a very useless disturbance, and we have been not a little annoyed by it. The only good purpose we can see to be subserved by it is the warning it gives to thieves and prowlers that the policeman is around and they must hide themselves for awhile. The everlasting pestle seems to say "O ye thieves, here we are. Secrete yourselves till we take another street and leave the neighborhood, when you can pursue your avocation at your leisure." The dogs keep up a fearful barking and howling through the night, and make one wish they were of a larger and better breed, and were made to perform useful service, as they do in Brussels, Amsterdam, and Rotterdam. There are dogs enough in Constantinople to earn five hundred thousand dollars a year if they were taught to be useful and industrious. There would be more peace for visitors and citizens were this the case.

There are no regular theaters at present in running order in the city, but there are several cheap places of amusement, where singing, ballet performances, dancing, and bad acting are to be enjoyed. The actors are principally young women from England, France, Germany, and Bohemia. The admission to the most of them is little or nothing, the pay being obtained from the drinks that it is expected will be called for by the audience. Still more money is made in connection with some of them by the gambling that is carried on in an adjoining room, where playing is kept up till two o'clock in the morning. Thus it may be seen how Christian civilization is being introduced among the benighted Mohammedans.

I have spent this day principally in writing, and now it is time to betake myself to the steamer and be off for Smyrna, Rhodes, Cyprus, ann Beirout. We will take the same steamer—the Saturno—which brought us here from Athens, and which has been lying here for six days. The general agent or director of the Austrian Lloyd steamers resides here, and directs which steamers shall go up the Black Sea, which to Alexandria direct, and which shall go by the route we are to take. Four or five steamers of this line are lying here for orders, or waiting for the time of their departure.

We will now soon be off. The street porters will soon be here to pack our trunks and satchels down to the wharf, and we will again be transported by small boat to the Saturno, which is lying in the Golden Horn, and, at 4:30, we will steam down in front of Stamboul into the Sea of Marmora. Good-bye, Constantinople. Good-bye to friends in America.

What I Don't Believe.

PART II.—NO. 65.

734. With regard to Paul, whom faithful Christians regard as being a chosen vessel to carry to mortals the will of heaven, it must be admitted that he had the same right to entertain his peculiar views as all other men have to exercise the same privilege; but there is no proof that his dictum or his views should be any more authorative, or were of any more value, than the views and notions of other men. I can see no reason why his ipse dixit should have any more weight and consideration than the say-so of Pope Alexander VI., Torquemada, Luther, Calvin, Cardinal McCloskey, the Rev. Howard Crosby, or Dwight L. Moody. He appears to have been a man of strong prejudices, an overbearing, oppressive disposition, strong convictious, and an unyielding will. That he was any purer, holier, or more inspired than other men I cannot believe, nor that he was selected by the creator of the universe to write his epistles. If a man should doubt the truth of them just a trifle I do not think he ought to be sent to hell for it.

735. Of the remaining seven epistles it is necessary to say but little. Some are admitted to be genuine, while others are stoutly denounced as spurious. The epistle of James is much discredited. Luther denounced it as a "strawy epistle;" perhaps because it advocated good works and not faith alone. Opinion is divided as to the epistles of Peter. Some claim that the first is genuine, while the others condemn both as spurious. The second epistle was certainly not written by Peter, and did not make its appearance till the close of the second century. The short epistles of John stand in much the same condition. The third is universally pronounced spurious, while many try to claim the first two to be genuine. This uncertainty will probably never be removed, and it is not a very serious matter if it is not. The greatest probability is that John did not write either of them. Jude is generally discarded by the critics; but as it is a single chapter of twenty-four verses only, and has nothing very startling to say, I am perfectly willing to consent that it might have been written by Jude himself. If, however, it should be discovered that somebody else wrote it, I will think just as much of it as I do now.

736. A few words now about the book of Revelation, which closes the Bible. It is an insane medley that has distracted many weak minds. Luther said of it that it was fit to be thrown into the Elbe, and he was doubtless about as nearly correct as in anything he said; and if all the copies ever printed had been consigned to the Elbe the world would not have been heavily the loser. Dr. South is reported as saying of it: "It either finds a man mad or makes him so." Calvin wrote a commentary on the other books of the Bible, but did not venture to engage with this. He evidently considered it valueless. He is not to be blamed for not wishing to explain the meaning of the beasts, the dragons, the seals, the trumpets, and all the rest of the insane figures and symbols in that incoherent book. If it was written by inspiration it must have been of a crazy character. And if the writer expected the fulfilment of the astounding predictions to take place in any reasonable time after they were written he did not realize his expectations. Such expressions as these: "For the time is near at hand;" "The things must shortly come to pass;" "He which testifieth these things saith, Surely I come quickly,' indicate that the fulfilment was expected speedily. These expectations were all ill-y founded, and the book may be put down as a frenzied mistake. It is attributed to St. John, but it is hoped he had a head capable of writing a more sound and sensible book.

737. The manner in which the books comprising the New Testament canon were settled upon and received by the church deserves some attention. As has been stated, Irenæus was the first who seemed to know of the fobr gospels and to speak of them; and he gave his reasons why there should be just four gospels, no more and no less—because there were four principal winds of heaven, and because there were four cherubim with four heads around the throne of God. When such reasons as these are assigned by a prominent father, who could doubt the reasons why just four of the many gospels were admitted into the canon, and who can blame Irenæus, when he had such potent reasons to impel him, should he take it upon himself with such assistance as he required, to get up the four gospels so as to be sure to have the right number? Marcion, though considered a heretic, in the second century took quite an interest in collecting the gospels and epistles together, and adopted most of those in the present canon, though of course he knew nothing of the present four gospels, for they had not yet been written. It may not be amiss to give the opinions of some prominent writers with regard to father Irenæus, who seems to have had not a little to do with getting up the four gospels, or, at all events, with bringing them to the attention of the church. Cooper styles him "ignorant and credulous, of that superstitious, cunning, and, I will add, dishonest class of men." Dr. Whitby complains bitterly of his having handed down the actions of the apostles and the disciples from paltry rumors and dubious reports, and as having scandalously debauched the world with fables and lying narratives." Is not that a nice sort of man on whom to rely for the authenticity of the gospels? The Rev. J. H. Horese certainly had very good reasons for using such language as this: "The accounts left us by ecclesiastical writers of antiquity concerning the times when the gospels were written or published are so vague, confused, and discordant that they lead to no certain or solid determination. The eldest of the ancient fathers collected the reports of their own times and set them down as certain truths, and those who followed adopted their accounts with implicit reverence. Thus tradition, true or false, passed on from one writer to another without examination, until at last it became too late for them to examine them to any purpose." This is indeed a sad confession for a divine to be compelled to make. It cannot be true that a series of gospels and epistles gotten up under such conditions are worthy of confidence and respect.

738. Many learned men have had strong predelictions in favor of many of the books which were discarded as spurious, considering them quite as genuine as those which compose the canon. The learned Dr. Whiston, in "Exact Time" (p. 28), uses this language: "Can any one be so weak as to imagine Mark and Luke and James and Jude, who were, none of them, more than companions to the apostles, to be our sacred and unerring guides, while Barnabas, Thaddeus, Clement, Timothy, Hermas, Ignatius, and Polycarp, who were equally companions of the apostles, are to be no authority at all?" The Rev. James Martineau, in his "Rationale of Religious Enquiry," observes: "If we could recover the gospels of the Hebrews and that of the Egyptians, it would be difficult to give a reason why they should not form a part of the New Testament; and an epistle actually exists by Clement, the fellow-laborer of Paul, which has as good a claim as the Epistle to the Hebrews, or the Gospel of Luke. If none but the works of the twelve apostles were admitted, the rule would be clear and simple; but what are Mark and Luke, who are received more than Clement and Barnabas, who are excluded?" His reasoning is unanswerable. Archbishop Wake actually translated from the Greek the apostolic fathers of the first century, to wit: St. Barnabas, St. Clement, St. Ignatius, St. Polycarp, and St. Hermas; and strongly recommended them to the Christian world as "inspired" and containing "an authoratative declaration of the gospel of Christ to us." Who shall say he was not correct? The learned Bishop Marsh positively avers that "is is an undoubted fact that those Christians by whom the now rejected gospels were received, and who are now called heretics, were in the right in many points of criticism when the fathers accused them of wilful corruption." There is little doubt but what many of the discarded books were equally as genuine and equally as much inspired as those which now form the canon.

739. It may be stated as a fact that from the mission of Christ until the latter part of the fourth century there was no authorized collection of the writings of the New Testament. All was doubt and dispute for the first three hundred years, and during the very time when everything should have been certain and satisfactory. And if it was doubt and uncertainty for three hundred years it cannot be believed that there was any new light thrown upon the dark subject afterwards to render certain and true that which was before uncertain and false.

740. It was about the middle of the third century when Origen, a celebrated Christian father—a man who had almost unlimited power in the church—assumed the authority to make a selection from she great number of books then circulating currenrty among the churches. His selection was much the same as the canon has been nearly ever since, though it cannot be truthfully claimed that he had any superior facilities for telling the true from the spurious. He rather decided by his own arbitrary will which should be accepted as the word of God and which should be discarded. He had such almost supreme power in the church that the selection he was pleased to make gradually became popular, and in 363, by the council of Laodicea, was declared to be the only "genuine scriptures." Had it not pleased this Christian dictator to make the selection he did, or had he not possessed such domineering control, the canon would undoubtedly be quite different from what it is. What is now the "word of God" would not be so-regarded, and what is now counted as "spurious," would instead be revered as God's inspired word.

A Genuin Christian on the Guiteau Case.

To Mr. Scoville, Guiteau's Counsel:

Why torture your head about witnesses? Rivet your trust in Jehovah. Has he not twice already snatched your client, Guiteau, from the jaws of death? Be assured, then, he will not desert you or him. I'm told, sir, you are a "Christian"—Guiteau we know is. Then throw to the winds insanity as a defense. Go boldly to trial demanding the recognition of God's supremacy. That it was his will Garfield should die is already proven. Had the bullet missed, would it not hav been providential? As it hit, was it not equally providential? Who but an Infidel would say God had not the power to stop the leaden messenger? All Christians agree, if God willed it otherwise, it would hav been otherwise. Could he not hav palsied Guiteau's arm had he so wished? When Guiteau raised his weapon in his name would he not hav stopped him, as he did Abraham of old, had it been his will?

Isaac was rescued by God, Garfield was killed by God. Fifty millions of people went down upon their knees imploring his life—God answered them with death. Their prayer was, "Oh, spare our president, if it be thy will."

To-day that will is known and recognized throughout all Christendom.

Hearken to the messengers of the All-Wise:

Rev. Dr. Morgan (in Church of Heavenly Rest): "God had refused to prolong the life of our beloved president. He had refused it deliberately, and because it was best to refuse it. Let Christians be sure of that. Let them know that God was always right. Let them kneel before the body of the dead president and say: 'Our father which art in heaven, the blow is heavy. Thy providence is dark, but thou knowest best—we can trust thee when we cannot understand thee.'"

Rev. Henry Ward Beecher (in prayer): "Thou, Lord, hast laid thy hand heavily upon this nation. Thy servant thou hast taken to thyself in a way that fills us with shame and horror. We believe that thou art anointing this great people, and by this great sorrow raising us to a higher plane."

Rev. Mr. Crawford (42d st. M. E. church): "Garfield's loss was a great one to the nation, but the wisdom of God could not be questioned, as he did all things for the best."

Rev. Dr. Morgan Dix (Trinity): "God made the world; he governs it. His never-failing providence ordered all things in heaven and earth. Whatever cometh hath a meaning. The events of the hour and the day are not the result of chance. God it is who orders or permits whatever occurs on earth, in heaven, in hell, above, below, around us. It may be there are those who do not feel in all this (the assassination) that God is chastening, afflicting, punishing, visiting."

Dr. Talmage: "Garfield's death accomplished more than his life in setting forth the truth that when our time comes to go the most energetic and skilful opposition cannot hinder the event." The doctor (in prayer): "God bless this dispensation [the shooting of Garfield] to the nation, and may the people yet shout, 'Hallelujah, the Lord God Omnipotent reigns.'"

Rev. Dr. Storrs (Brooklyn): "To-day I ask you to hear the voice of God in the lessons which he brings to us through this sad and strange and unexpected dispensation of his providence. Men sometimes say the cause of providence is not in it at all; it was mere human mortals; it was the insanity of a mind disordered. But God's providence controls the wills of men."

Rev. Dr. Bellows: "Already blessings manifold had followed the shooting of the President, and the effect of that good influence was seen throughout the whole nation. Sublime confidence in God was reached when we could say from the heart, 'Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him.' God did not permit his ways to be placed under our microscopic inspection."

Clearly, Mr. Scoville, Guiteau was inspired from on high. Let this nation dare harm a hair of his head and it may go out in blood. God issued this order once (and he may a second time): "Put every man his sword by his side, and go in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp, and slay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbor. There fell of the people that day about three thousand men."

If God's wrath is again stirred, he may not slaughter three thousand only, but fifty millions. WM. T. WISNER.

Madison avenue, Fordham, N. Y.

The writer of the above is evidently a genuin Christian. He is the first logical one we hav heard speak upon the subject. All the rest are illogical, denying the inspiration and insisting upon hanging the assassin. Indeed they hav been very bloodthirsty in this case, three different Christians having vainly endeavored to take Guiteau's worthless life, forgetting that the Lord said, "Vengeance is mine, I will repay." Religious editors all over the land hav cried for the blood of the poor wretch now on trial at Washington, and while millions of prayers were uttered for our stricken president, but one only so far has gone up for his slayer, and that from a poor negro who was formerly a slave to a Christian. Why don't the church pray for Guiteau if there is joy in heaven over one poor sinner? Perhaps they regard Guiteau as too good a Christian to need prayers. He is certainly a devout believer, more ready to testify by works the faith that is in him than any minister in the land. But the commonest murderer that ever swung from gibbet to heaven has had the free service of the church; why should not this illustrious Christian wretch hav the ministrations of that religion which made him murder Garfield?

As our Christian correspondent says, we know Guiteau to be a Christian. As he is tried before a Christian judge and jury, why not accept the advice and throw away the insanity dodge? Do not the Christians before whom he is being tried believe in divine revelation? Do not they believe that God revealed his will to Moses, Abraham, and the other prophets and patriarchs who figure in the Old Testament? Then why should they deny that he did see to Guiteau? Do they suppose that God ceased taking any interest in the affairs of this world when Christ was crucified on Calvary? There is as much evidence for Guiteau as there was for Abraham. If we are to take the word of a Jew who lived many centuries ago, why not take the word of a Christian who is alive now?

We should like to see the insanity plea dispensed with and the accused and his counsel come boldly forth and put their faith in God and his providence to shield his instrument from harm. We should like to see what would be said by the Christian world of to-day to such a plea. How many men of God would accept it? And yet, how could they logically deny it? Such a defense on Guiteau's part would do a great deal to reveal the number of ministerial hypocrits now occupying pulpits. They would then hav to either throw away their Bible or accept the fact that God reveals his will and chooses his instruments just as much now as when Moses led the children of Israel through the wilderness, if he ever did.

Giving God all the power and the disposition to good that our correspondent claims for him, and we fail to see why Garfield should hav been shot. If he could hav palsied the assassin's arm, why did he not do it? If he is responsible for Garfield's taking off, as our friend says, let the authorities at Washington immediately discharge Guiteau from custody and put God on trial. And as they would undoubtedly hav some trouble in getting the prisoner to come to the bar, we suggest that they put the priests, his mouth-pieces, on trial, and if found guilty, as Guiteau will probably be, that they hang the whole lot higher than Haman. Of course God did not inspire Guiteau any more than he did the Bible, but there is no doubt that religion and the priests are responsible for this foul crime, as they hav been for the most atrocious crimes perpetrated in all times. Guiteau is undoubtedly a murderer, but he is also very religious, and if he hangs he can thank his church for it.

The Rev. Dr. Morgan's speech is very trashy. How does he know that God deliberated on the case and finally made up his mind to let Garfield die? If he deliberated on the case at all, and had the power to save and did not, he was very cruel, and all the talk about his "providence" being "dark" cannot alter it. Saying that "we can trust thee, even if we do not understand," is a most foolish exhibition of blind faith. It is the resort of ignorance. Dr. Dix's remarks that God orders all things upon the earth, if true, would make that God a brute. All the utterances of the minister quoted by our Christian are only exhibitions of ignorance, the mouthings of men who must say something to keep up their reputation for being the servants and expounders of the will of the Lord. It would not do for them to say that God had erred in letting a most cruel murder be done, so they say his ways are inscrutable and his providence dark, and mystically infer that he has some purpose. He does not permit his ways to be microscopically examined simply because he has no ways. He does not interfere in in the affairs of men, never did, and never will.

This nation may go out in blood if Guiteau is hung, but it looks as though the experiment would be tried. Our friend may be gifted with prophecy, and may be as fully inspired as anybody, but Christian prophecies are hardly ever fulfilled. According to the Bible, God has issued a great many murderous orders, and if he could we hav no doubt he might do it again. His wrath is easily stirred, and his vengeance dreadful. We are of the fifty millions, but we do not fear the sword of the Lord in case the twelve Christian gentlemen now in the jury-box at Washington should conclude that religious fanaticism is a bad thing to let go around loose, and hang the man who has so much religion that he has to murder his fellows in cold blood.

Some New Commandments.

Our old friend, Worthy Putnam, had some new commandments come to him the other night. How they came he does not say, so we shall not pretend to guess. It may be that the spirits brought them and it may be he dreamed them, being a sort of reflex of his waking-hour thoughts. At any rate, they are in the main good, only, perhaps, modeled too closely after the Decalog. But there are one or two that it will hardly do for Liberals to adopt. For instance, the first is, "Thou shalt hav no other god before him who is known to be God and good." Now, we object to borrowing any god either from the Christian or pagan mausoleum. The idea of a god came from fear. When the pagans saw the effects of one of nature's storms they went to work to propitiate the elements. To do this they personified them and called them gods. Thus they had a god for everything—god of the wind, god of the wave, the clouds, etc. As man progressed from a savage state he dragged his gods along with him. By and by the monotheistic idea came to him, and the god of the Christians is only a lot of compressed pagan gods. Monotheism is boiled down polytheism, and the product is like all condensed things, stronger than the original. The worship of the pagan gods was bad, very bad; but the worship of one god, the despotic essence of all the gods, is worse. The pagans offered sacrifices to theirs, but they never sacrificed human beings because they denied the existence of their gods.

There is no foundation for a personal god outside of men's minds, and we strenuously object to putting another o and a big G to the word and bowing down to it, or even to worship it. Worship is debasing to worshiper and worshiped alike. We want to do away with the idea, and we hope friend Putnam will help by doing away with his first commandment.

The second is another relic of superstition. Sacred is a word applied too promiscuously. There is nothing sacred but our mothers, wives, and daughters, and the feeling of reverence with which we regard them. Outside of them we don't know what is sacred. Certainly superstition is not. It will be well for the world when every idol is smashed, every fetter broken. The oftener the now so-called sacred things are spoken of with a disrespect which has for its object their abolition, the better for the race, and the quicker will come the time when men are not afraid to speak their minds for fear of offending some imaginary being.

It would hav been a good thing for the world if Moses had written on his tables the twelfth commandment of Mr. Putnam and the religious world had heeded it. "Thou shalt not prosecute thy fellow for his religious opinion" is a grand commandment. Of all persecutions, that for mere opinion's sake is the very worst. It has also been the persecution most practiced by the Christian worshipers of the one God. All the evil attributes of the thousands of pagan gods seem to hav been condensed into the one Jewish God. His worshipers hav been arbitrary, tyrannical, and cruel, and he has consequently been the same, for all gods are only what man has made them. They hav always possessed exaggerated characteristics of their followers.

We do not believe in gods and do not go much on the sacred things. The rest of Mr. Putnam's commandments are good and just what any honest man would write.

OUR thanks are due to Mr. Alex. Cochran for his donation of $2.00. As he gives us the choice of uses to which it shall be put, we will use it to help illustrate the Round-the-World books. We shall also use Mr. Robert Laramore's donation of ninety cents for the same purpose, and for which he likewise has our gratitude.

We hav begun this week to send out bills to all our subscribers who are in arrears. We are needing the money and hope none will take offense at receiving the notice, for all may be assured it would not be sent were not the money needed. We hav, of course, a great many bills presented to us, and hav to scratch around and pay them, and to do this the hundreds of little bills owing to us are necessary. We hav reckoned the bills up to January, but hope all who can will renew in advance for 1882. The amount is not large for each individual, but is the aggregate the accounts amount up to a handsome sum, and if paid promptly will make THE TRUTH SEEKER all right for the coming year. We earnestly ask our friends to pay early attention to the bills.

THE leading article in the North American Review for January contains the judgments of five of the most distinguished American authorities upon "The Moral Responsibility of the Insane." Just at present this subject occupies a very prominent place in the minds of the American people; but quite apart from its momentary interest, as connected with the extraordinary trial now in progress at Washington, the problem of determining the fact of insanity, and fixing the limits of responsibility of the insane, is one that in itself possesses an irresistible attraction for every generous mind. The wreck and ruin of intellect appeals at once to our highest sympathies, and to whatever is noblest in human curiosity. The authors selected for the discussion of this subject are Drs. Beard and Seguin, of New York, Dr. Elwell, of Cleveland, Dr. Jewell, of Chicago, and Dr. Folsom, of Boston. The other articles in the January number of the Review are: "The New Political Machine," by Wm. Martin Dickson; "Shall Women Practice Medicin?" by Dr. Mary Putnam Jacobi; "The Geneva Award and the Insurance Companies," by G. B. Cole; and "A Chapter of Confederate History," by F. G. Ruffin. The announcement is made that the February number of the Review, to be issued January 15th, will contain part iii of the "Christian Religion" series of articles, and that it is to be a very able defense of the Christian faith and foolishness.

Liberal News.

J. F. BAXTER is lecturing for the Spiritualists of Willimantic, Conn.

J. R. MONROE, of Seymour, Ind., has started a local paper called the Item. The doctor is a lively cuss, and deserves success.

THE League directors are sharp. They hav "euchered" Butts out of Man and will hereafter publish the paper themselvs. The first number of the new volume is out.

D. VAN WILKINSBURGH, of Millville, Wis., has a complete file of 1880 TRUTH SEEKERS, and part of 1881, which he will send to any one wishing who will pay the express charges.

D. P. WILCOX will open a Liberal League Hotel in Deadwood, Dakota, on Jan. 10th, with a Liberal "jamboree," and thereafter make it the headquarters for all Liberals and Freethinkers.

T. C. LELAND, spent Christmas Sunday among the Infidels of Newark, N. J., and lectured before the League there Sunday night on "Organization of the Liberal Forces."

THREE new Liberal Leagues hav recently been organized—one at Liberal, Mo., S. Paris Davis, sec.; one at Youngstown, Ohio, Wm. W. Crawford, sec.; and one at Fall River, Mass., Samuel Whitler, sec.

THE Liberals and Spiritualists of Hannibal, Mo., hav organized themselvs into a society. Their creed is love, and their religion philanthropy, and they also indorse the principles of the National Liberal League.

THE Western Kansas Liberal says: "THE TRUTH SEEKER is full every week of just that kind of reading matter that suits the tastes of Liberals." Thanks; we try to make the paper interesting, and hope we succeed.

The Cloud County Blade says: "Now is a good time to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER, as Mr. Bennett in his Round-the-World trip has reached a point, Constantinople, where his letters are of absorbing interest."

GEO. CHAINEY lectured the other Sunday on the Liberal press. In the course of his remarks he said, "No one is worthy of being called a Liberal who does not giv support to the cause by subscribing for a Liberal paper.

THE Duke of Northumberland has subscribed £100 to help keep Bradlaugh out of his seat in Parliament. The British "haristocracy" mean to crush Bradlaugh if they can, but we fancy they hav undertaken a large contract.

MR. LELAND, secretary of the National Liberal League, says he is receiving many letters from Liberal, Antichristian, and Spiritualists, making overtures to unite forces to secure a free secular state as the first thing in order.

MESDAMES COLBY AND SMITH hav just closed a very successful engagement of two months at Philadelphia. They will be here in New York this winter, beginning next Sunday evening, Jan. 1, 1882, at the Harvard Rooms, between Forty-first and Forty-second streets, on Sixth avenue.

AT last accounts F. F. Follett had let out his "auld gray mare" Topsey, and "lit out" himself on foot and by rail through Illinois, preaching Liberalism and scattering Freethought literature. The same may be said E. C. Walker, of Iowa, only he hadn't any Topsey.

ON account of receiving a number of invitations to lecture in western New York and southern Pennsylvania, H. L. Green has deferred his second lecturing trip west until about the 15th of January next. Friends desiring his services will address him at Salamanca, N. Y., until that time.

JOHN SHOCK, one of our patrons at Preston, Col., is one of the largest stockholders in the Gibson Hill Mining Company, capitalized at $3,000,000, and in the Preston Mining Company at $5,000,000. Mr. Shock has about succeeded in organizing the Gold Run Mining Company, capital $1,000,000.

AT the New England dinner of the Pennsylvania descendants of the pilgrims Mark Twain was down for a speech. In introducing him, Mr. Rollins spoke of him as one who, not having been born in New England, did the best he could under the painful circumstances and had all children born there, thus making himself a New England ancestor and a man of mark. Mark Twain, in reply, returned thanks for the well-deserved compliment paid to himself and his posterity, and that he would endeavor in future to merit such compliments.

"Coming down to business," he continued, "I would ask what you want to celebrate those 1620 people for? I refer to the Mayflower gang. It was thin enough to celebrate the people themselvs, but it is thinner still—the thinnest he had ever heard of—to celebrate their landing. Recollect, they had been three months at sea, and they ought to hav come ashore. If they hadn't come ashore it would hav been different. To make out that this reasonable and natural proceeding is worth celebrating 260 years after it occurred is preposterous. A horse would hav known enough to hav landed. But, after all, it is the Pilgrims themselvs you are celebrating, and there is another inconsistency, but one that is very like you diputatious and contentious people, who never agree upon anything but Boston.

"Now, those Pilgrims were a hard lot. They were better than their neighbors of European tribes, I'll admit, just as you are better than your forefathers; and this is the first time I ever perpetrated an immeasurable slander at the departed. I am a border ruffian from the banner state of Missouri, but am a Connecticut man by adoption. In me you behold the physical perfection of one section and the high culture of another—the perfect man. My ancestor was an Indian. Your ancestors skinned him alive. I'm therefore an orphan. I'll admit that your ancestors wanted my ancestors' fur. They abolished everybody else and left me without ancestors. They wanted to establish free conscience and untrammeled liberty of worship, and they weren't going to let a pestiferous lot of Quakers interfere with them.

"Roger Williams was an ancestor of mine, and I forget what you did with him, but it runs in my mind that you felt that you were carrying harshness too far, took pity on him, and burned him. You made it pretty tropical for some witches that were ancestors of mine, too. Now, be guided by me. You don't want any more New England societies. You'd better stop and disband what societies you'v got. If you don't, this thing of hosannaing Plymouth Rock and New England will beget in you a disposition to prevaricate and exaggerate. Now, stop while you are temperate in your appreciation. Get up an auction and sell Plymouth Rock. Your ancestors of 1620 were to be pardoned for hopping ashore on and clapping an iron railing around that rock, for they had never seen one that was worth anything and that wasn't watched, but it has been different with you. You'v been educated among rocks.

"At least throw open Plymouth Rock to the patent medicin men, and let it earn its taxes. I entirely agree with your high estimates of the New England idea and New England people, and believe you can scarcely get a much better race unless you send out and hav them born in Missouri."

"The Godly Women of the Bible."

This book, written by a woman, is one of the few volumes that every woman should read and feel an interest in the circulation of. If you want to know precisely what the Christian religion has done for woman, and the sort of women it upholds as examples for the women of to-day to revere and follow as guides, read this description of the character, nature, and status of the "godly women of the Bible." It is certainly a masterly work, and the writer well understood her subject, root and branch. She has given the genealogies, the heredity, and the position of these women as wives, mothers, sisters, and sweethearts, as well as slaves, dupes, and merchantable property.

Read the little story of Ruth and Naomi, and ask yourselvs if any of you would like sister or daughter to win a husband as Ruth won hers. Read Queen Vashti and Esther, and ask yourselvs if you would marry a king who had tested one thousand virgins ere he found one in whom he "delighted."

Read of Leah and Rachael, of Tamar and of Rahab, and ask yourselvs if such stories are fit productions for the youths of to-day to read and take as examples of godly conduct. And the New Testament women are but little better if the real truth were plainly told concerning them.

Very few can read the Bible understandingly. Its half-told tales relate to times and customs so different from our own, and the style of the language is so ancient, the chronology so mixed, and the whole volume so clumsily got up, that only scholars and Bible students are able to make things hang together; and it takes a deal of stretching, matching, supplying, and passing by, for them to do it. But, in this volume now offered us the narrativs of the women of the Bible are as plainly told as in a novel, and hav that peculiar interest attaching to them that no other work of fiction can gather around itself. No Christian will refuse to read this volume, for every incident is verified by their God-book. It ought to be in every Liberal library, and in the collection of all who wish to own our best and most valuable works of reference and explanation.

With this book and "Holy Bible Abridged," the dullest tyro will be enabled to conquer the best scholar who attempts to prove that Christianity is woman's friend, or the Bible a book that teaches purity, love, tenderness, and home affection.

Speaking of this record of the old patriarchs and prophets, our author says: "Away with such a book, that blasphemes woman, that makes her in the beginning the source of all evil [Eve], that places the mother beneath man's feet, and prostitutes her nature, unsexes her rights, levels her to the brutes, puts to shame the light of day, and renders darkness necessary for man's foulest deeds against her honor and life. Never while woman is thus subordinated will a true civilization prevail. She will always be regarded as the inferior of man while King James's Bible is revered and held as sacred authority. It is only by not believing it, by ignoring it, that woman stands where she does to-day. Education, science, and Liberalism have elevated her, not Judaism or Christianity."

I hope each woman who believes in the equality of the sexes, in woman's right to herself, will buy this valuable and interesting book, and induce every one to read it that she can. Many of you hav read it in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but it has far more interest as a book. Here it is all together. No break-offs and long waits for more, and the volume is prettily bound and will be an ornament to your library or center-table.

"Standing on what too long we bore
With shoulders bent, and downcast eyes,
We may discern, unseen before,
A path to higher destinies."

Snowville, Va. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

Mr. Frothingham's Recantation, Admission, and Confession.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The editor of the Banner of Light, and his correspondent, Mr. Wetherbee, seemed puzzled to know in what category to place Mr. Frothingham. I do not wonder at it. Mr. Frothingham has been out of this country for several years, and has been breathing the soporific atmosphere of the Old World. He has come home, therefore, slightly hallucinated, as I judge from his utterances since his return. When the organs of all the Protestant churches in the land admit, and mourn over the fact, that their churches are losing ground; while the Presbyterian church, the richest, and one of the largest and most influential, publishes and declares that, after a year's labor in all their congregations, the ratio of increase is not one conversion to each of their 4,000 churches; while Dr. McCosh, of Princeton, says that not only in his college, but in all the rest of the 300 or more scattered over the country, the number of young men designed for the Christian ministry is small, and growing less every year; while many of the wealthiest congregations in our large cities are without pastors because they cannot find men of sufficient ability and education to fill their pulpits; while there is a general mourning that revivals cease, that church attendance is falling off, and that the heretical preachers hav the largest audiences, Mr. Frothingham, who has been abroad for several years, and has not read our religious newspapers, comes back home and makes the statement, without offering the least particle of proof, but in face of the admissions of the churches themselvs, that orthodox Christianity is stronger to-day than it was twenty years ago!

If the saying which has become current is not inspired, it is as true as if it had been inspired, that the tread of modern thought is in but two deep channels, the one leading to Rome and the other to Reason. Forty years since, John and Francis Newman were two of the finest scholars England ever produced. They were thinkers. To-day one of them is a Roman Catholic cardinal, and the other is the author of "Supernatural Religion," a book which has gone through six editions in England, and takes the most radical ground in religion, making reason sole judge in all controversies. There is no halfway house between Rome and Reason. Thinkers must move on to their destiny. Owlish men, whose eyes, like "the dim religious light," and whose olfactories delight in the "odor of sanctity" which proceeds from cathedrals and charnel houses, are bound by the law of necessity to find rest in that religion which flourished in the middle ages, when ignorance and superstition reigned supreme; while men who love truth as truth, and are brave enough to follow wherever it leads, will never be satisfied till they can giv a substantial reason for every proposition they accept. And when I see a traveler toward the land of promis, shivering at the coolness of the atmosphere and expressing doubts whether he is not on the wrong track, I set him down as one who is faint-hearted and weary, who has no abiding confidence in the divinity and safety of truth, and who will, sooner or later, turn to the right-about-face and go back to the quiet regions of the church, where the earthquakes of doubt and investigation are settled by the authority of popes and councils.

The orthodox roosters all over this western country, each mounted on the top of his pulpit, are now crowing with delight and defiance over what they call Mr. Frothingham's "recantation," and over his admissions that his own radical preaching did not amount to anything, and that the orthodox church is stronger to-day than ever. But they do not tell their hearers all Mr. Frothingham says, and thus a half-truth becomes a whole lie. They merely use his thoughtless and inane utterances, as Oakes Ames did the Credit Mobilier money—putting it where it would do the most good.

If any one should ask my opinion of the symptoms in the case of Mr. Frothingham, I would say that, judging from his antecedents and concomitants, and especially from the complexion of his mind and moral character, he will find no rest for his troubled, doubting, and waiting soul till he lies down in the soft bosom of the Catholic church.

Literary Servility.—Allibone, for Example.

Man, in his rude state, has been the slave of his own imagination. The human imagination, like fire, is a good servant, but a bad master. With the imagination uppermost, reason is degraded like a charioteer dragged beneath the wheels of his own chariot.

Look at history, so called; some truths mixed with many lies—the "sacred" part falser than the profane. It teaches that priests and kings hav always mounted to inordinate power by contemning the senses, reviling knowledge, and cultivating the fictions of the brain. Our grand old fathers of 1776 discovered that kings were nuisances, and most of them thought priests useless. Only one or two of them exactly said that, because the clerical profession consists of men who can and do make themselvs more or less useful to their fellow-beings in a variety of ways, though never the more by their unworldliness. In their clerical capacity, strictly, the reverend lobsters are always advancing backward. Their organization is always a simple obstruction to the progress of the race. What the race wants is naturalists, investigators, inventors, civil and mechanical engineers, popular and truthful explainers of science, educators; and in deference to all these, and adorning all, poets and dramatists.

Nothing is the matter with the pulpits but the presence there of the old tattered shreds of the supernatural, either excluding entirely or defiling all that there is of the natural, the true, and the beautiful. Theology, the science of the unknowable, there attempts—I will not say insincerely, for the human mind is a mystery—to teach justice from an imagined foundation of supreme injustice. It is too late for that.

One of the greatest services which the pen of man ever conferred on mankind was the "Age of Reason," by the Quaker Deist, Thomas Paine, reducing the Jewish and Christian scriptures to the level of other human writings—a mixture of traditions, myths, fine poetry, frivolous ceremonies, and baleful superstitions, altogether unworthy, as to its theology, of any deity to be imagined in our day.

It was no wonder that the clerical profession did not like that book. They tried to answer it, and made hundreds of failures. Their bread and butter were in peril. The Infidels, Franklin and Jefferson, were too large game for their courage and their guns. Paine, by his transcendent humanity, had got himself into the grim clutches of the fanatical Robespierre. Washington, his old friend—when the pen and the sword fought side by side for liberty in the Jerseys—sympathizing with the chastised and recreant Burke, rather than with the French revolutionists, had strangely gone back on him, and did not lift a finger to save him from the remorseless guillotin. But he escaped—as the D.D.'s, to be consistent, ought to say, by "divine providence"—and came back to the republic he had founded here, and, thanks to the fathers, it was not wholly ungrateful. But the clerical profession, or church as a body, has never been grateful to its best friends who, like Voltaire, hav labored to make it respectable. It libeled Paine while alive, and had to smart for it. As soon as he was dead it began to concoct the most infamous lies to blacken his memory. If these were confined to the pulpits and the New York Observer they might well be left to die with those institutions; but they hav invaded the sanctuaries of literature—text-books and reference books, from which, for very shame, they ought to be expunged.

For example, Allibone's "Dictionary of English Literature and British and American Authors" is an exceedingly useful, if not necessary book, and the author deserves everybody's thanks for his patient, faithful, and persevering labor. If his soul were as free and broad as his undertaking, and as unbiased as is the spirit of modern science and literature, he might well be indulged in moral judgments on his subjects, dead or living. But it is deplorable that on certain heretics, such as Robert Taylor and Thomas Paine, he makes himself the tool of a set of cowardly clerical nincoms and liars, even to the extent of contradicting himself. He makes the great popular Infidel, Franklin—under the proper head—die, as he did, in 1790, long before a line of the "Age of Reason" was written. And yet, under the head of "Paine, Thomas" (p. 1484), he repeats the miserable and stupid forgery about Franklin's advising Paine not to "unchain the tiger." And then he proceeds to put in quotation marks, garnished with italics, the very words of Paine to an "Infidel admirer," to the effect that he "would giv worlds" if he had never written the "Age of Reason"—a lie which probably owed its birth to a suborned kitchen-maid who rejoiced in two names.

The basest lie which Allibone, as the humble drudge of the reverend clergy, takes upon his soul is this:

"Intemperate, tyrannical, licentious, and profane [so was Washington], a torment to himself and a terror to his household, he left the world without repentance, and exchanged the horrors of a death-bed devoid of hope, for the infamy of a dishonored grave."

As there is not, and never was, a particle of evidence to sustain this charge, and it is contradicted by Allibone himself, who says Paine did repent, I would candidly advise the clergy of all denominations to bestir themselvs before it is too late, and hav those palpable and uncharitable lies expunged from our great literary dictionary.

Church Taxation in Michigan.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It is understood that the legislature of this state will be called together in February to act upon a revision of the tax laws. The subject of church taxation is being agitated, and I hav circulars and blank forms for petition, which I will be glad to send to anyone on application. The petitions should be circulated and signed by men and women of full age and returned to me by the middle of February.

I am certain that THE TRUTH SEEKER will render a valuable service to its many readers in Michigan by publishing this communication.

S. B. MCCRACKEN.

To the Friends of Equal Taxation in Michigan:

At the last session of the legislature an act was passed for the appointment of a commission to prepare a revision of the tax laws of the state, and the result of its labors will probably be submitted at a special legislativ session to be held some time during the coming winter.

The Commission, at its first formal meeting, issued a circular asking for a popular expression on a number of topics connected with the subject of taxation, and among them the taxation of church property. This question is thus brought officially before the people of Michigan. Those who believe that church property should be taxed are thus challenged to appear and giv reasons for their belief. They are challenged to come to the front and make themselvs known, in order that those in authority may judge of their numbers and character. They are virtually bidden, as at a marriage service, to make their objections known, or ever after to hold their peace. If the friends of equal taxation do not make themselvs heard now, it will be folly to agitate the question again for twenty-five years to come, because silence now is consent and acquiescence on the part of the present generation in the existing policy of church exemption, while if they make a protest now, even though unsuccessful, it leaves them in position to renew the demand at any time.

The Constitution of Michigan, Article xiv, section 11, provides, "The legislature shall provide a uniform rule of taxation, except on property paying specific taxes, and taxes shall be levied on such property as shall be prescribed by law."

"A uniform rule of taxation," whatever else it may comprehend, would seem to imply at least that all private property should be subject to taxation by "a uniform rule."

But in framing the tax law, the legislature, following an ancient custom, hav wholly exempted certain classes of property from taxation, and classes of property, too, in which only a limited number of persons are interested. Whether this exemption be justified by the last clause of the section that we hav quoted, namely, that "taxes shall be levied on such property as shall be prescribed by law," is a constitutional question which we must leave to the constitutional lawyers. Our purpose is rather to present the question in its popular aspect.

Section five of the general tax law of the state (compiled laws of 1871, page 360) prescribes what classes of property shall be exempt from taxation, the eighth and ninth subdivision being as follows:

Eighth. The personal property of all library, benevolent, charitable, and scientific institutions incorporated within this state, and such real estate belonging to or leased by such institutions as shall be actually occupied by them for the purposes for which they were incorporated.

Ninth. All the houses of public worship, with the pews or slips and furniture therein; also the land on which such houses of worship may stand, so far as occupied by such houses of worship, and for no other purposes, and rights of burial and tombs, while in use as repositories of the dead; and also any parsonage owned and occupied as such by any religious society incorporated under the laws of this state.

As touching the exemption of the property mentioned in the eighth subdivision, if it were proposed to appropriate public money to any private institution coming within purview of that clause, the proposition would meet an unqualified negativ on all hands, and it is difficult to perceive the difference in principle between a direct appropriation of money to an institution, and the exemption of its property from public burdens that other classes of property are required to bear, thereby adding to the burdens imposed upon other classes of property. And the same in regard to the exemption of church property.

On this head also, another clause of the Constitution, article four, section thirty-nine, provides that no person shall be compelled "to attend, erect, or support any place of religious worship." To exempt a church from taxation, and thereby compel the owner of the property adjoining it to pay a higher rate of taxation, is in so far, compelling such owner to contribute to the "support" of such church.

For the purpose of exhibiting this injustice on the basis of dollars and cents, some figures are here introduced from the official report of the Ninth United States Census (1870). The following table shows the population and the value of church property in the state of Michigan and in the United States for the years named:

	1850.	1860.	1870.
MICHIGAN.
Population - -	397,654	749,113	1,184,059
Church prop., value	$723,600	$2,334,040	$9,133,816
UNITED STATES.
Population - -	23,067,262	31,183 744	38,115,641
Ch. prop., value -	$87,328,801	$171,397,932	$354,483,581

Perhaps the most noticeable fact which the above table discloses is the great increase in the value of church property as compared with the advance in population, showing the tendency to multiply and double up in that class of privileged and exempted property.

In the state of Michigan the ratio of increase in population as shown by the census of 1860 over 1850 was 92 per cent, while the ration of increase in the value of church property for the same period was 221 per cent; increase in population in 1870 over 1860, 58 per cent; increase in value of church property for the same period, 291 per cent.

In the United States the ratio of increase in population during the first named period was 35 per cent; increase in value of church property during the same period, 96 per cent; ratio of increase of population during the second named period, 22 per cent; increase in church property, same period, 106 per cent. Fractions are omitted in these computations.

The returns of church statistics as by the tenth census are not yet accessible. The population of Michigan, however, is shown to be 1,634,096, or an increase of a fraction over 38 per cent since 1870. This is about two-thirds the ratio of increase for the preceding decade, and if we presume the same ratio of increase in the value of church property it would giv an aggregate of over $26,000,000 as the value of that class of property in Michigan in 1880.

The assumed value of church property in Michigan at $26,000,000 seems a large figure, but yet the Ninth Census givs the value of this class of property in the state of Connecticut at $13,428,109 in a population less than one-third the population of Michigan, and in Massachusetts at $24,488,285 in a population more than 175,000 less than the present population of Michigan, and in New York at $66 073,755 in a total population of 4,382,759. In other words, the reported value of church property to each inhabitant in Connecticut in 1870 was within a cent and fraction of $25; in Massachusetts $16.80; and in New York $15.07; while the figure that we hav assumed for Michigan, computed on the basis of the population of 1850, placing the ratio of increase in the value of church property at two-thirds that of the preceding decade, would giv a per capita of $15.93. In fifteen Northern states east of the Mississippi, including Michigan, the population in 1870 was 21,872,953, and value of church property $278,037,777, or a fraction less than $13 per capita. The population of the same states in 1880 was 27,063,692, or an increase over 1870 of about 24 per cent. If we allow the same ratio of increase in the value of church property in the country at large as shown for the preceding decade, 1860, to 1870 (106 per cent), it will show an aggregate value of church property in the fifteen states of $572,275,782, or over $21 per capita. So that, judged by these comparisons, the estimate of $26,000,000, or $15.93 per capita of the present population, as the value of church property in Michigan, is not too high.

Let us place the rate of taxation in Michigan, for all purposes, state and local, at two per cent. It will probably average considerably above that in the larger towns, where most of the exempted property is situated. Two per cent on $26,000,000 is $520,000. By reason of the exemption, this sum of $520,000 has to be levied against the property of the state that is taxed; in other words, the taxed property has to pay annually $520,000 more than it would be required to pay if the $26,000,000 of church property was taxed. This is equal to an annual tax of a fraction over 31 cents per capita for every man, woman, and child in the state. Or, apportioned upon the entire property of the state (except exempted property), it is equal to 6 4 mills on the dollar of the total equalized valuation of $810,000,000, so that practically every tax payer has to pay sixty-four cents on each $1,000 of the assessed valuation of his property for the support of churches.

If all the people were church-members, the exemption would still be in conflict with the principle of voluntary support; but as a large proportion of them—much more than half—are not church-members, never attend church, and feel no interest in supporting churches, the increased tax upon them is nothing short of legalized extortion.

The exemption works with great inequality as between churches themselvs. A modest church costing but a few thousand dollars—"the little church around the corner"—is not unfrequently the center of a comprehensiv and unobtrusiv benevolence, while the magnificent temple on the fashionable street, costing a hundred or more thousand dollars, is too often nothing more than a social center for the wealthy people who support it.

But it is said that church property is unproductiv, and that therefore it should not be taxed. This cannot be true in its fullest sense. Church parsonages, as residences, are productiv to the same extent that other residence property is productiv to the owner and occupier; and where church property is leased for a stated rental it is also productiv. Nor will those who build, support, and attend churches deny that they bring to them certain valuable if not substantial results. But admitting the argument of unproductivness as fully as it can be urged, it proves too much, because if one kind of property is to be exempt for this reason, all unproductiv property should be exempt for the same reason. Indeed, the principle, if admitted, would involve a new rule for levying taxes, namely, according to the income derived from property, instead of by its intrinsic value.

If by church connections men find consolation and comfort and peace for their souls, they place but a light value upon these benefits when they consent that others shall help pay for them. When, by means of these same church connections, men derive social and business advantages to the corresponding prejudice of persons outside of those connections, the injustice of the demand that those outside shall contribute toward the maintenance of the agencies through which these advantages are secured becomes the more palpable and glaring.

Church organizations derive their corporate existence from the civil government which other classes of property are taxed to maintain. They enforce contracts through the civil courts which other classes of property are taxed to support. Church congregations are protected in their peaceful assemblies by the police power of the civil government, and if disturbed they appeal to the civil courts for redress. If a church is threatened with damage by fire, the common protectiv means which society employs are used to protect it, and for this all classes of property except churches are taxed. If a church suffers damage or spoliation at the hands of a mob, the church appeals to the the civil government for indemnity, and for the purpose of paying such indemnity all classes of property, except church property, are taxed. In all its rights, privileges, capacities, remedies, and guarantees, a church corporation holds toward the civil government the relation of a natural person, except in the single privilege of paying taxes. It would hardly seem that in this single relation the church would consent to hold the position of a common pauper.

The further argument is advanced, in favor of the exemption, that churches are a public benefit, and as such contribute to the moral well being of the body politic. This is a question on which every individual citizen has a right to form his own judgment. It is a question which the state cannot determin. Until the citizen has determined it affirmativly in his own mind he cannot be justly called upon to contribute to the support of any church or any number of churches, and having so determined he will make his contribution voluntarily, as he may feel able and inclined.

If the state may determin that churches hav a moral value, it may equally determin what churches contribute the greatest amount of moral good to the public. Indeed, placed on the ground of moral value alone, where shall the state draw the line between the church and the newspaper, the book-maker, and the bookseller, or in fact any industrial enterprise, for there is scarcely a conceivable legitimate human pursuit but has its moral value to the great whole of society. A good man is unquestionably a public blessing, and on this theory of church exemption, his house, being a fountain of charity, should not be taxed. Further, to giv the theory a practical consistency, taxation should be graduated according to the public utility of the property; hence that which in its use makes most for the public good, should be least taxed.

View the subject as we may, church exemption can rest upon no other foundation, in reason or out of reason, than as a legacy from the rule of church and state, which the institutions of this country hav in theory at least, long ago repudiated. It comes from the ancient tradition that the civil government must declare for the subject that religion is a good and necessay thing for him to hav, and ordain what kind of religion he shall hav. In this republic the citizen is the sole judge as to whether he wants any religion at all or not, and if he does, what kind of religion will suit him best. Government exceeds its functions when it assumes to declare at all in the matter, which it does by inference when it grants to religion special privileges and exemptions. To exempt church property to a given amount and tax it above that amount would be conceding the vital principle at the root of the whole matter. "Justice for all, privilege for none," is the only right rule.

Forms of petition to the legislature for the taxation of church property may be procured by application to the Provisional Secretary at Detroit.

The Harmony and Meaning of the Scientific Gospels.

TWO LECTURES DELIVERED BEFORE THE N. Y. LIBERAL CLUB

BY T. B. WAKEMAN.

LECTURE I.

THE OBJECTIVE ORDER.—CONCLUDED.

6. SOCIOLOGY.—The light thrown upon this Science during the last twenty years has been very great, and confirms the view of Comte that it is to man the fundamental science. For by it his existence and his duty receive the only possible scientific solution. By it all of his relations in life are mainly determined. How true and important all of this may be we shall see when we estimate its religious value. For if Sociology is a Science, it is practically a Religion. It is the Science of History, the story of the convergence of mankind on earth. It has been already partly illustrated by the law of progress, development, and of deanthropomorphization, which we have already used. There is no longer any serious question as to its main conclusions, which may be summarized thus:

(1) Biology leaves no doubt but that mankind are descended from anthropoid ancestors on the earth, who were gradually evolved from lower animal forms.

(2) That mankind became gregarious by natural selection, as other animals have done, because in union lay strength, provision, and safety.

(3) That mankind were elevated above the brutes at first by the natural selection of intellect as their principal weapon of defense, provision, and association. Their progress thereafter lay in the ever-increasing development of intellect and sociality by natural selection. So that while he still remained, and still remains, an animal in form, he has passed far beyond all other animals in mind and social power. The child is but a repetition of the race-history in epitome.

(4) It follows from this and the law of heredity that the child could not attain to this intellectual and superior social qualities until after it had nearly attained its physical, that is, its animal structure and growth. Natural selection has therefore preserved only those human tribes who would let their women nurse the children for a long period and who would support them in so doing. The others perished, and are the "missing links" between the gregarious anthropoid apes and the savage human societies. By this care of infancy and its intellectual and provisional necessities man made the first step from the herd to the tribe, then to society, then to the community, then to the village, and finally to the city and state.

It may increase our paternal patience with babyhood not a little to find that we owe our social nature and civilization to that "squalling baby," which a mother's love would not allow her to abandon; and then to both mother and baby for compelling the father to some sense of care and responsibility for them. This discovery and the appreciation of the baby steps by which mankind were thus enabled to pass from high apehood and savageness to man, seems to be largely due to Prof. Fiske himself, and if he had no other claim to remembrance, (and he has many,) his chapter on this subject in his "Cosmic Philosophy" should keep his name alive in the history of Sociology with those of Darwin, Tylor, McLennon, Morgan, and Maine.

(5) That mankind has been gradually enlarging and consolidating tribes, peoples, races, and nations, is the substance of all human history and progress. Gradually mankind has recognized a general kinship in his origin and needs, until at last the sentiment of humanity has become organic and therefore instinctive, and has melted the whole civilized world into a grand sympathetic convergence! To the people thus advanced the savage and barbarous races have given away or become appendages. To mankind the plants and brutes are also subjected for use or food. The pyramid of the organic world is therefore completed in Man, which is the organic Humanity.

(6) The result is that, of all the forms which, to a distant beholder, and considered in proportion to the earth's size, appear only as a vegetable and animal mold upon its surface, all of those forms, so important to man, but in the Cosmos so small, which fall to rest as the sun sets, and rise again to greet his return; all, in a word, of the world of protoplasm, in its various forms of plant, animal, and man, has thus become in manifold ways interlocked as one organism, of which the dominant and controlling power is mankind—the human factor. This fact within the human species is attended by the feeling of kinship (caritas humanitatis), of interrelation, of dependence, of social love, which compels consent, union, convergence, coöperation, and government; and which the heredity of ages has consolidated into an ever progressive Humanity!

This is the grand fact in the history of the whole organic world, and its discovery, or rather recognition and appreciation, by Auguste Comte is sure at some time hereafter to become visible as one of the great events in the history of mankind.

The sciences, Ethics, Æsthetics, and Linguistics, which succeed Sociology in the scale, are dependent upon human progress, and so are mainly deductions from this Science of Man. For all races, peoples, nations, tribes, families, and individuals, and their history, religions, and morals, are but parts of this grand convergence, and can have no scientific solution but as parts of this great Being, which they help to compose and to which they are subordinate. Hence we have the basis of Politics, Law, and Government, which are practical Sociology.

7. ETHICS.—The next science in the order of decreasing generality is Ethics (from Greek, ethos, or custom, or êthos, a habit). This Science describes the relations of the social parts of the grand human world to each other, and to the whole under the general Bond of Humanity. It includes:

(1) The relations of Communities, Tribes, Peoples, and Nations, etc., to each other, which are embodied in International Law. The fundamental principle of which is that the interests of each nation or people are subject to the interests of Humanity; that is, to the good of the whole, or, in other words, that politics, international or national, are subordinate to morals.

(2) Then follow the relations of the individual to the state or community in which he lives and its members. This gives us civil law and the morals of the family and society, or social Moral Science.

(3) The last division presents us with individual morality, or the relations of individuals to each other—the most special of human relations, and which may also include their relations to animals. The concrete and descriptive Science of Biography gives us the materials of this science, the art of which is represented in the practical conduct of life toward others. That is summed up in the motto, Live for others; live for all; live for and in the Race, of which each is a part.

8. ÆSTHETICS (that is, the Science of the Emotions and their Culture).—We have now reached the more special phenomena, which relate only to the single or individual life—the culture of man by and within himself. We find that his emotions are the more general phenomena of his individual nature, and that they are the foundation of all of his subsequent culture and thought. Art, in the form of ornamentation and rude music, was the first factor that aided our social intellect to raise the half-human, gregarious troop into a society. Art still controls the general culture of the heart, from whence spring the higher aspirations of mankind. Hence the injunction, "Keep thy heart, for from it are the issues of life."

This science, Æsthetics, is composite, like Physics, Ethics, and Linguistics, and has therefore like them a plural name. The order of decreasing generality within it seems to be as follows: (1) Architecture, (2) Sculpture, (3) Painting, (4) Poetry, (5) Music. Art is the embodying interpretation and culture of human feelings by means of external forms, signs, and sounds. How it is or ought to be done is an interesting inquiry upon which we cannot venture here.

The more special interpretation of the phenomena of the individual gives us the next Science, also a composite, with a plural name, viz.:

9. LINGUISTICS.—This Science includes the more special expression, interpretation, and culture of the individual's emotions by means of spoken or written signs, words, and symbols, including all that has been described as Language, Hermetics, and Literature. The scientific, as well as the historical order of its divisions, seems to be.

(1) Language in its simple forms and relations.

(2) Poetry (not as a fine art, but) as the rythmic use of language.

(3) Prose or the common language and body of literature.

(4) Fiction and Symbolic or Hermetic writings.

For example the Maerchen, or Tale of Goethe, so beautifully translated by Carlyle, or the second parts of Faust, or of Wilhelm Meister, are Symbolic or Hermetic masterpieces.

10. PSYCHOLOGY stands next and last in the scale. The interpretation of thought by language brings us finally to the Science of the soul, or the thinking and feeling process itself, i. e., to its true origin, process, and unity of the Ego. From the distant stars we have followed Science by steady advances, until she has penetrated to the very center and core of man, to the ultimate changes in his brain, of which there may be external interpretation only by sign or word. This is the last stronghold of alleged "mystery," for there modification is constant and unseen, and it becomes but another name for life itself. Yet all that life is but the result and human summary of the whole world around it and to that world it responds.

When Comte closed his preparatory studies in 1830, there was no such science as Psychology; nor indeed had Æsthetics or Linguistics been more than just named as possibly subject to scientific methed, order, or form. That it is far otherwise to-day is our excuse for the attempt to differentiate these sciences and their phenomena from Biology, Sociology, and Ethics, with which he left them commingled. We have for the first time placed them in their true order in the Positive scale. The necessity of this course was first made manifest from the inconvenience of arranging a library, according to the Positive classification, until these sciences were separated and placed in their proper positions. The doing of that completes the positive classification, and enables any library to be most usefully classified under it.

The question whether Psychology is properly at the head of the series will be seen to be the question whether it is or can be a science at all; or whether it is only an adjunct to Biology or Sociology where Comte and Spencer have left it.

That the changes of the Ego are the result and effect of the whole world outside of the man is evident at once. Man thinks, then speaks, and thereby interprets his feelings, thoughts, and acts, so as to find relations to his fellows, and then to society. He finds society a part of humanity, and that he finds to be supported by the animals and plants that grow from the inorganic world.

The true objective order, then, of itself places this science as the last and most special and complex of all of the sciences. The Ego, and the science of its changes, is inevitably the terminal point, therefore, of the objective, as it is, of course, the beginning of the subjective series.

This recognition and position of Psychology in our classification makes it vary greatly from other classifications, but the verdict must not be from our past ignorance, nor from the great authority of either Comte or Spencer, but from their actual facts and their law. Comte left this science included with Biology. Spencer makes it a separate science between Biology and Sociology. The verdict on our change of it the head of the series must come from the facts of the Positive method and the future of science.

That Psychology is a separate science seems clear enough from the distinct character of its phenomena, as Spencer shows. Consciousness, association, sensation, intellect, and emotion are evidently a distinct world from objective Physiology and Anatomy, or Sociology. A new order of phenomena requires new methods of investigation, yields new and different results, and thus constitutes a special science. But if a separate science at all, it is the most individual, modifiable, and special, and therefore the last of all of the Sciences. It certainly assumes and is dependent upon them all, because the result of all. Man is not man except in Society. In fact, as Sir Henry Maine shows, individual man was an impossibility until recent times in which the increasing integrations of Humanity have worked him out individually as a special social organ. It must, then, in the Positive classification, stand not only after Sociology but after each of the more general relations which stand between man and Society, viz., Ethics, Æsthetics, and Linguistics.

This is but another way of saying that it treats of the most modifiable of all phenomena. And this touches the fact that it is half objective and half subjective ; that it is the cardinal or hinge Science between the objective and the subjective or human worlds. This fact also settles its true position in the scale beyond question. It is the central point where the objective world is summed up in consciousness by the single individual. It is also the point where man turns consciously back upon the objective world, which has produced him, to subdue it to his own uses and ends, and to those of his race. This, therefore, is the last of the sciences, and ends the story of the OBJECTIVE ORDER.

We are often told how the great German philosopher Kant was wont to say that two things, the more he learned, filled him with ever-increasing awe and reverence—the starry world above, and the moral law within him. We have shown that the chain of the Sciences has linked these two objects of reverence together. The wheels of human fate are moved from the stars in a real but far different sense than Astrolatry or Astrology dreamed. Will the reverence remain? Will the links of the chain which reaches to us from the Infinite be tarnished, or turned to purer gold, by the knowledge of their human uses and worth? That the subjective ORDER of this world, which our next lecture will disclose, will show. Letters from Friends.

LESLIE, MICH., Dec. 15, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find five dollars for Mr. Bennett's trip around the world. We read his letters with great interest every week. Hoping Mr. Bennett may return to us in safety, I remain, as ever, true to the Liberal cause.

Yours for truth, SARAH A. HAYNES.

NAVARINO, N. Y., Dec. 16, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed eight dollars—three for THE TRUTH SEEKER for the year 1882, and five for the Round-the-World book. I see by the last TRUTH SEEKER that you will keep the list open till JANUARY, and giv me just as good a book, and the name of helping the traveler home. THE TRUTH SEEKER I must hav just as long as D. M. Bennett and I liv. I hav been a subscriber for many years, and should not like to giv it up, for it has a clear ring. C. T. CHAFEE.

FRANKFORT, MICH., Dec. 14. 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find money order for nine dollars. Please apply five dollars to help defray expenses of the grand old Trojan on his trip around the world, three dollars to renew subscription, and the other dollar for two trial subscribers.

Yours most cordially, N. A. PARKER.

APPLETON, MINN., Dec. 14, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find my check for $8—three to renew my subscription from January next, and five toward filling out the Round-the-World fund. Though I am not Christian enough to believe in the eleventh-hour dodge, I do think it is better late than never. Hence I send my V. JOHN N. BERG.

FRESNO FLATS, CAL., Dec. 13, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $10—$8.05 for the list of books sent herewith, $1 due by me on the paper, and the balance to help take you around the world. Yours truly, ROBERT LARAMORE.

PLANTSVILLE, CONN., Dec. 15, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $5 for D. M. Bennett's Round-the-World trip. Keep your column open as long as you can; in fact, keep it open until his return.

Yours respectfully, JOSEPH G. WITHAM.

COBDEN, ILL., Dec. 20, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $11—$5 for the old Infidel's swing around the circle, $3 for renewal of THE TRUTH SEEKER, $1 for lithographs of D. M. Bennett and R. G. Ingersoll, $1.50 for "Modern Thinkers," and fifty cents for "Science and Theology" and "Pyramid of Gizeh." J. B. COULTER.

BRIDGEPORT, CAL., Dec. 11, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find the sum of $11—$3 to pay up for my subscription for 1881, $3 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1882, and $5 to bring Bro. Bennett home again. I am sorry to hav kept you waiting so long, but better late than never. I did not get there in time to send Bro. Bennett away, but I hope I got there in time to bringhim back. HENRY DONNELL.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., Dec. 15, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I am one of those who come in on the home stretch—one of the reserves who come into action at the last moment and crown the victors—one who thought that his aid would not be needed until he heard the cry, "Comstock, the sleuth-hound, the hyena of religion and persecution, is at bay. One more fire, my boys, and the day will be ours, and human freedom will triumph," and then I came with the sinews of war in my hands for you—yes, I hand you that which makes and unmakes gods, kings, potentates, despots, empires, human governments, laws, rules, societies, religions, churches, hypocrits, liars, and thieves—gold. Yet it is all-powerful in the hands of the just to do good, reform and benefit mankind ; for which purpose I know you will use it. I am greatly pleased with your correspondence, though in 1879 I visited the same places. Yet I am pleased to read your letters, for you see many things that I did not, and your descriptions are very interesting. I hope you will hav good health and continue in your good work until the circle is complete. Yours, P. V. WISE.

FOREST GROVE, OR., NOV. 25, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $4.50. I received the lithograph of Mr. Bennett and am highly pleased with it; it is finely executed, and if those of Ingersoll and Paine are as fine I will be perfectly satisfied. Any family that has the walls of their home adorned with these lithographs, and whose library contains the writings of Paine, Bennett, and Ingersoll, will be free from the debasing influence of Christian theology; its teachings of superstition cannot becloud or enchain their mental faculties, for any unprejudiced person who will read the works of these three great champions of Freethought will not be liable to let superstition take the place of reason. A few days since I handed to a pious friend the "Bennett-Mair Discussion," and requested him to read it and giv me his candid opinion in regard to which of the two had the most facts or arguments. In a day or two he returned the book with the remark that he would not read it all through, for if he did he would become a confirmed Infidel, and he preferred believing the Bible. He is a fair sample of the many mental cowards of which Christianity is the paternal owner. The Jewish Bible God may feel honored in having mental cowards to amuse him by praying and grinning, but I fail to see any honor in being worshiped by cringers.

I asked a soldier of the cross (just after the death of Garfield) if he could tell me why his God failed to answer the millions of prayers that were uttered for our dying President. He answered me by asking if I knew. That is easily explained, I replied. You Christians hav talked your God to death years ago. I gave the soldier of the cross the tract, "Discussion on Prayer," by Bennett. He promised to read it, and if he does I think it will put a Liberal flea in his ear that will tick out some of his theological ideas of prayer. If every Christian in the land would carefully read the writings of some of the great Liberals there would be a great falling off in numbers from the followers of the mythical Jesus, and the religion of "believe or be damned" would son sink into the shades of oblivion, and the sooner the religion of humanity would spread over the world, and the condition of mankind would be thus improved. The Christian superstition has for the past eighteen hundred years retarded the elevation of mankind. What little good Christianity has done is but a mole-hill compared to its mountain of evil. The sooner churches are converted into schools, and teachers take the places of parsons, the sooner crime will decrease, and want and misery will be greatly lessened in the land. Instead of annually squandering millions of dollars for the dissemination of superstition, let it be more appropriately spent for the dissemination of truth and general education. There is nothing ennobling in the Christian system of teaching people to do good for the promis of future reward. There is not the semblance of what would constitute a good rule to pattern after or follow. A person who does a good act for reward, or through fear of hades or punishment, does not command the respect that a person does who would do the same act because it was right to do so, and because it gave pleasure to do good for the love of doing good. A child that obeys its parents because it takes delight in doing so is, in my estimation, far superior to the child that obeys through the promis of candies, cakes, and knick-knacks.

An overly-pious lawyer from Portland, Or., delivered a discourse at the Long church in this town some time since, and he told a long, pitiful story about a Liberal colony in Iowa that became so bad that the more intelligent Liberals in the colony were obliged to send for a Christian revivalist for the purpose of introducing Christianity amongst them. I hav heard so many of these gospel slander mills grinding out their grists of slander that I hav become used to their misrepresentations, falsehoods, and slander, and do not pay much attention to them, but there are plenty who do believe them, not being posted on the wiles of theological windmills, and for the benefit of that class I would like to inquire, through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, if there is a Liberal colony in Iowa that has had to send for the Christian doctrins of "believe or be damned." I would like to hav the name of the colony and the full details in regard to the case, as I would like to call upon the legal lion's lawyer to substantiate his assertion in the sweet by and by.

Friend Macdonald, perhaps you sat down on our poor web-foot parson a little too hard, as I hav not seen or heard of him or his ark since. I hav an idea he has gone in search of the pieces of the ark, which he asserts remain even to this day, and when he discovers those remnants I will pity you, really. I would suggest for our web-footed parson's perusal the discourse of Prof. Denton's, "Deluge in the Light of Modern Science." It will only cost him the nominal sum of ten cents, and I assure him he will derive more information on the subject than he will learn from all the Christian books in the world.

Please send me, as soon as issued, "What I Don't Believe, Why, and Wherefore," as it will be a valuable acquisition to Liberal literature. Hav you the large photograph of Annie Besant, and also Bradlaugh? If so, please send me them, and the money will be forthcoming on receipt of the same.

Radically yours, W. C. CLOW.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., Dec. 5, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Fifty years ago last May I was in company in Philadelphia with Willett Hicks, of New York, who was attending a yearly meeting there, and one of the company, Abraham Lowell, asked Willett if he had not known Thomas Paine in his lifetime. Yes, he knew him well. "Had he renounced his belief in the divinity of Jesus?" I asked, "or recanted his Infidel ideas on religion?" Willett answered: "The day before Paine died Elias Hicks and I were about to start on a long journey, and both concluded to make one more effort to get Paine to recant, and used all the arguments we could to get him to say that Jesus was the only begotten son of God, as we both believed. Paine listened patiently, then held out his hand and said: 'Friends, my time is but a few hours. I believe in a divine principle called God. I cannot retract my declaration that God or nature never suspended a law for the special purpose of causing a child to be born as stated in the Testament; it is contrary to reason and common sense, and I cannot retract one iota of my honest belief to which I hav attached my name, and generations after me will do me justice. I hav no fears of the future in those sentiments I hav left for the benefit of mankind.'"

Such was the evidence of Willett Hicks, a Quaker preacher. Although he was an intimate friend of Paine's, at that day he thought that the scriptures was the true guide for all. I then asked if Paine was not a common drunkard. No; he never saw or even heard that charge until after his death.

In 1844 I was at Grant Thorburn's Green House in New York. His foreman handed me a small pamphlet, in which Thorburn asserted he heard Paine had recanted. I told him what Mr. Hicks had declared in Philadelphia in 1831, and that I thought Thorburn had made a great mistake; and on further perusal of the pamphlet I found that Thorburn had been made a dupe by a clergyman, and had asserted a downright falsehood. The two Hickses had the most profound friendship for Paine, but, like all Quakers of that day, thought that the scriptures of truth, as they termed it, should be read to their family at all convenient times. Had Elias Hicks lived twenty years longer he would hav been a true Spiritualist, I believe.

RICHFORD, VT., Dec. 14, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I do not believe that there eve was a personal, real, superhuman being known to any man in the universe, such a character as the Jewish Bible describes their Yahweh God to be, because there is no evidence aside from the mere affirmation, assumption of the book, which is no evidence at all. I do not believe that anything but a lying priesthood ever wrote it. The book itself proves it positivly. I do not believe that any woman ever had a child without the intervention of the male sex any more than I believe that all women hav been mother to all jackasses. I do not believe that there ever was such a real person on earth, known to any man as Jesus Christ, as is described in our four gospels, because the writers of those gospels all lied. There is no evidence aside from the book's affirmation that there was such a real man God or God man. Commentators furnish abundant proof that there was not. I do not believe there ever was a man or real devil or God who made a man-trap (as Gen. ii, iii), by which all children were born sinners and exposed to endless burning in hell. So the Father had to beget a baby on another man's woman, a holy virgin "to die for all," "taste death for every man," "not wiliing any should perish," "came into the world to save sinners," yet saved only one-tenth, and sit in heaven eternally and laugh to see the rest kick and scream in hell (Ps. ii, 4).

Inclosed find $1 post-office order to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for four months, from January, 1882.

Very respectfully, JOSEPH NOYES.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Dec. 17, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Thinking that some Liberal news from the "Smoky City" would be welcome to your columns, I venture to send you a few items illustrativ of the progress of Freethought among the descendants of the Covenanters.

Last summer when our Liberal League took its vacation there was great rejoicing in the camp of the unco guid, as they fondly imagined that the League was dead beyond the hope of resurrection. But, like Jarius's daughter, it was not dead but sleeping, for on the fourth of September it opened up with a lecture on Paul, by Jane Gray Swisshelm, followed by Mrs. Amelia Colby, next A. B. Bradford, J. E. Emerson, and others.

The Dispatch, usually, and sometimes the Leader, reports the lectures fairly, but the other papers are under the influence of ecclesiasticism, and of course hostil to the League, and spare no pains to slander and misrepresent it and its lecturers.

A conspicuous example of this Christian spirit is the Times. On a recent Sunday, Harry Hoover, secretary of the Clearfield Liberal League, lectured before the Pittsburgh League, and as the reporter of the Dispatch, to whom the duty of reporting the League lectures was usually assigned, was absent from the city, the scavenger of the Times had it all his own way, and he did not hesitate to use his dirty pencil to do the dirty work of Christianity.

The subject of the lecture was, "A Substitute for Christianity." The crimes and cruelties of its professors, and the fatal defects of its claim to be an original and perfect system of morality were fully ventilated, and the scientific ethics of the nineteenth century offered as a substitute.

Yet the only report that appeared in the city papers was so outrageously false and unjust that I feel constrained in the interest of truth and justice to let the public know the true character of the wretch who daily abuses the courtesies usually shown to representativs of the press.

During the winter of 1878-9 the citizens of Petrolia, Venango co., Pa., were afflicted with a nuisance in the form of a vagabond Bohemian, styling himself Darante, but more familiarly known by the euphonious title of "the cinnamon reporter." Ostensibly he was a reporter for the Parker Daily, but his actual occupation was that of gutter snipe. What he lacked in morality and culture he more than made up in impudence, and when the slums of Petrolia got too hot for him he concluded to travel on his cheek. Coming to Pittsburgh he found the Times run by "scabs," and being himself scabbier than any of the lot he got a position at once which he has ever since used to demonstrate the doctrin of "total depravity."

Yours, ONE OF THE LEAGUE.

CHENEY, WASH. TER., Dec. 6, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Cheney is growing, even in the snow, building in every direction going on, and talk is of the capital of the territory being located here soon. But I cannot think that, as we are so new and so far away from the center. People are flocking here from all parts. A great many Liberals are here who only need nursing into activity and organization by good sensible radical lectures. There is a wide, rich field and the harvest is ready.

Some Baptist ladies came to invite me to their sociable. It was to be general—all sects and no sects. Wonderfully Liberal, I thought! Now it leaks out that they want to form a mite society to furnish the new church, and heathen money is good as any. It is saddening to see my sex so bigoted and creed-bound; because I did not favor it they threatened to take my patronage from my millinery store, and they refused to read any book or paper. I am sorry to see women support a cause that has always oppressed them. There is one Liberal, well-read woman here, I am glad to say. She said truly the other day, "There is no class of people so happy and satisfied as we Infidels. Christians are always fluctuating between hope and fear."

I rejoice to know that when the Northern Pacific Railroad is completed we can go through east in a few days and can convene annually with our fellow-Liberals in feasts of reason. I hope as many as can will settle in Liberal, Mo. It is my intention. I beg to lend my voice with the reformers of our school-books to the end that orthodoxy may be left out that poisons the young mind, as mine was, by reading continually of the goody-good children who went to Sunday-school and prayed, always turning out well, while the impious one came to grief—stories as degrading as untrue, and given in more dangerous doses in the higher readers. It makes dupes and fools of children, givs them false ideas of life that are afterward hard to eradicate. How wrong, when so many useful things ought to be learned during the precious time of youth! I will contribute $1 to a fund for revising or compiling school-books for our children. It it more important that we giv our successors this justice than that we build up a Garfield monument. Mr. Bennett's letters are just splendid.

Fraternally, MRS. A. EVEREST.

CINCINNATI, O., Dec. 18, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: It is self-evident that all past and present religions are the outcome of traditional ignorance and erroneous conceptions. There is not the least proof to convince a rational mind that the slightest inspiration or divine authority was ever promulgated independently and distinct from man's own volition. Every religion is man's invention, and is in no case binding on the people. The priesthood of every clime are a self-constituted body of assumptionists. They can be proclaimed as the great army of leeches, ever sucking and draining the swarms of dupes who blindly follow and slavishly cringe to the false pretensions of hypocrital drones who possess no rights to propagate impostures and should be held accountable for the frauds, lies, and swindles perpetrated on a thoughtless and greatly mistaken people. The schemes, tricks, and pious quackery resorted to by the heartless mountebanks in the most unblushing manner is quite sufficient to point the finger of scorn at any or all of those deceivers of humanity. They are the boldest spongers and bummers that ever cursed this planet. Tons of money are extorted from the multitude, and for no other purpose than deception. They hav their gospel shops free of tax, and continually tax the public for listening to their babble, and all which they say is not worth one snap. It is the most unmeaning bosh that ever insulted a sensible mind. There are very few of those clerical spouters who believe inwardly what they preach, but the almighty dollar impels them to keep up the deception, as it brings idleness, luxury, etc., and panders much to personal vanity, and a long distinction. But it is time the scales drop from the eyes of the multitude who hav so long been blinded by the delusiv superstitions of the clergy that they might see clearly through the thin veil of pious twaddle and nothingness. This godology business is a most expensiv incubus, and should be frowned down by the lovers of honest purposes. Let the millions of money squandered for superstition be applied to the wants of the poor and needy that the sorrow-stricken heart might receive a thrill of joy and speak well of the religion of humanity.

MR. EDITOR: How glad I am that there are men in this world capable of thinking originally, and when I read articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER from such deep, philosophical, scientific, original thinkers as are your contributors I feel hopeful of the world, and take courage, feeling that the cause of truth is in safe hands. Materialists and Spiritualists alike are doing nobly in pulling down that Atheistical humbug, the Christian church, and the time will soon come, I hope and pray, when the world will cease to be cursed by such a gigantic barrier to human progress. Science is working wonders, is correcting line after line of religion, and soon, let us hope, there will not a line be left uncorrected. Already clergymen are succumbing to its potent power and grounding their arms at its feet, and no longer find it for their interest to preach infant damnation, and even adults are exempt. In fact, they hav expunged the word hell even, and found a substitute for it in the new version. These facts are presages of the "good time coming." Let the earth rejoice!

"Ever onward, ever upward, who shall say
Science shall not chase old errors all away,
And Egyptian darkness turn to light of day?
Generations now new born
Usher in the glorious morn,
Long foretold by sage and seer—
Even now methinks I hear,
'Lo! the nimbus cloud is about to roll away,
And unfold to light the glorious orb of day.'
Men of thought and men of action, clear the way."

GENTLEMEN OF THE DEVIL'S MACHINE: Inclosed find money order for $3.50—$3 for the machine for another year, and 50 cents for the ghost of D. M. Bennett, now a miserable tramp. As you New Yorkers can't or won't hang him up as high as Hamon, I shall take law in my own hands and do it. All the interest I take in your miserable sheet is just to hear M. Babcock pray, and he don't pray often enough. Being a Christian, I would like to giv you some good advice, but not having much brain, I shall leave it in the hands of my countrymen, Robert Burns. By the bye, could you send me a faithful likeness of the poet for framing as large as Ingersoll's or the tramp's?

"And now auld Cloots I ken yere thinkin'
A certain bardee's rantin', drinkin',
Some luckless hour will send him linkin'
To your black pit,
But faith he'll turn a corner jinkin'
And cheat you yet.

But fare you weel, auld Nickie ben,
O wad ye take a thought and men,
Ye ablins might, I dinna ken,
Still hae a stake,
I'm wae to think upon you den,
E'en for your sake."

A DIVINE CONFLAGRATION.

NORWICH, CONN., Dec. 11, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The Lord's people at this place had quite a scare at an early hour this morning by the discovery of fire and smoke bursting forth from one of God's terrestrial Sunday-houses. The venerable Sunday-book lay upon the sacred altar in imminent danger of destruction, and no time was to be lost. One of the faithful rushed through the fire and smoke and rescued the hoary book of holy indecency from the devouring flames, and impious neighbors were thus spared the "sweet savor" of sublimated obscenity offered up on the sacrificial altar in place of he-goats and innocent lambs of the flock.

But the gallant fire-laddies came to the rescue in time to save a large portion of God's real estate in a damaged condition. However, since divinity had the sagacity to hav his property well insured against the dread uncertainties of his own fiery wrath, no doubt he can afford to reconstruct it in condition good as new, especially since impious Infidels so kindly allow him to shirk the payment of taxes.

COHOES N. Y., Dec. 14, 1881.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Our friend is a great way from us, but when I read his letters it seems to me I am with him. The inclosed is $6 for two years' subscripti n to THE TRUTH SEEKER. May it prosper! Yours respectfully, PETER GRANDIEAU.

MOORS, N. Y., Dec. 18, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose three dollars to renew my subscription, which would otherwise expire in two weeks.

Accept my best wishes for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and long life to its publisher, Mr. Bennett. May health and cheerful spirits attend him clear around the world. The trip will pay us well if our hero does not suffer from it.

The Catholic priest at Moors to-day told his congregation they were God's pets. No other denomination of Christians received from heaven so many indulgences, so much grace, so many favors, etc., but in French he rendered it in the adulterated language, "Nous sommes ses enfants gates," which literally translates, "We are his spoilt children." That's where the truth unintentionally came in. I drew a long breath, bit my mustach to hide my upper teeth, and rushed out-doors for fresh air.

Yours ever, as ever, and, I hope, forever,

CHAS. LAPERCHE.

FORT KEOGH, MONTANA, Dec. 2, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me specimen copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav organized a Liberal League among the soldiers, and we need help such as THE TRUTH SEEKER can giv us. I can get you quite a club here.

We hav the Catholics here to fight. The chaplain of our post is a priest, and he preached last Sunday against our League, consigning us all to hell. But as this is a very cold climate, he failed to scare every one. We all think we would enjoy a trip to that warm country, especially during the winter months. We now hav a membership of sixty, though we started with only seven. Ten joined us in the afternoon following the delivery of the before-mentioned sermon.

Please inform me how to organize a regular League, if there are any rules.

Yours for the right, C. W. STEPHENSON.

DEADWOOD, D. T., Dec. 20, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: The outlook of the League in Deadwood was somewhat discouraging at my last writing—so much so that I had concluded to go to Fargo and try again, but I hav concluded to make a grand rally of its forces in the shape of a Liberal League Hotel, having rented for that purpose the National Hotel near the court-house, which has heretofore been a rum-hole run by Christians and courtesans. I shall change its name, kick the bar into the street, occupy its place with the League library, hang the charter in a conspicuous place fronting the main entrance, spread mottoes upon the walls of the mansion and upon the extreme front, use the bar-room for a public reading-room, free to all day and night, and keep an orderly, neat, and well-conducted house, that cannot be otherwise than sought and patronized. The meetings of the League will be held in the dining-room free of charge, and the latch-string will be at all times on the outside. We hope in this way to giv the cause an impetus which will soon result in abandoning the dining-room for a larger place. Shall open January 10th, and will report progress from time to time. I hav often heard gospel ministers urge their dupes to carry their religion into their business, and hav concluded to heed their injunction with the boot on the other fellow's foot.

I hav staked largely on this issue, and am myself in doubt as to its financial results, but in any case shall hav the satisfaction of making a big rumpus in Deadwood among the enemies of human liberty which can only result in good to others. As I shall be necessarily the best advertised house in the country, a saving may be made in that direction. The proposition is regarded by some as audacious, and already pressure is being brought to bear to prevent the catastrophe, but it is already too late. I hav already embarked for six months, with the privilege of a year, and shall know by that time whether I can stand it any longer. I will say this most emphatically, that so long as a bare living can be squeezed out of the enterprise, the Liberal League Hotel of Deadwood will be a fixture. It is an open warfare, and why use concealed weapons? Another thing, the lines will be drawn with more distinctness, and all will find their level. Skulks and dissenters will be ———, say it yourself. Advice is needed here from our generals. Most sincerely yours,

D. P. WILCOX.

Rub or Rust.

Idler, why lie down to die?
Better rub than rust,
Hark! the lark sings in the sky—
Die when die thou must!
Day is waking, leaves are shaking,
Better rub than rust.

In the grave there's sleep enough—
Better rub than rust,
Death, perhaps, is hunger proof,
Die when die thou must:
Men are mowing, breezes blowing.
Better rub than rust.

He who will not work shall want!
Naught for naught is just—
Won't do, must do, when he can't,
Better rub than rust,
Bees are flying, sloth is dying,
Better rub than rust.

Looking Back.

Fair were the dreamful days of old,
When, in the sleepy summer shade,
Beneath the beeches on the wold,
The shepherds lay, and gently played
Music to maidens, who, afraid,
Drew altogether rapturously,
Their white, soft hands, like white leaves laid,
In the old, dear days of Arcady.

Men were not then as they are now,
Haunted and terified by creeds;
They sought not then unceasingly to know
The end, that as a magnet leads;
Nor told, with austere fingers, beads,
Nor reasoned with their grief and glee:
Nor rioted in pleasant meads.
In the old, dear days in Arcady.

The future may be wrong or right—
The present is distinctly wrong;
For life and love hav lost delight,
And bitter even is our song.
And year by year gray doubt grows strong,
And death is all that seems to dree;
Wherefore will weary hearts ere long
For the old, dear days in Arcady.

ENVOI.

Glories and triumphs ne'er will cease,
But men may sound the heavens and sea;
One thing is lost for aye—the peace
Of the old, dear days in Arcady.

THE BOSTON INVESTIGATOR,

The oldest reform journal in the United States,

Is published every Wednesday at the Paine Memorial Building, Boston, Mass.,

By JOSIAH P. MENDUM.

Edited by HORACE SEAVER.

PRICE, $3.00 per annum; single copies, seven cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a two-cent stamp to pay postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories, of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. Reader, please send your subscription for six months or one year, and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer. 3m53

WHAT OBJECTIONS TO CHRISTIANITY

THE

Bennett-Mair Discussion.

BETWEEN

D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.

(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects, instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founded upon the doctrin and authority of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progress and improvement.

8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which man kind are capable of receiving.

OPEN LETTER TO

Anthony Comstock

In Answer to His Open Letter Sent to the Newspapers.

465 FULTON ST., BROOKLYN,

SIR: I hav before me a seven-paged open letter, addressed to myself, intended for publication in all the evening and morning papers, copies of which I am prepared to prove, were sent to every daily and several weekly papers, the publishers of which refused to publish it, consigning the precious product of your labors to the waste paper basket. For this I am truly sorry, as it would hav given me an admirable opportunity to show the public the true inwardness of the man who could pen such a letter, and yet claim to be a Christian and a protector of the public from the vicious members of society. A more vicious letter could not be penned, and the evidence of malice crops out in every sentence You first claim that the courts honorably acquitted you. If they did, then I know nothing of the words honorable acquittal. You were arrested for publishing a malicious libel, and taken in the charge of an officer before the magistrates. You then waived examination. If you had written truthfully, why were you afraid of examination? I was present in the court to confront you on your vile charge. You were silent.

After the lapse of several weeks I received an order from Judge Smith's court to attend such court respecting my charge against you, and believing that you would submit to an examination and giv some excuse for your act. I went, accompanied by over fifty witnesses, so that a special court had to be set aside for my special case against you. Well, let us examin as to what followed. I stood there without counsel, ready to defend my order of arrest. I was strong in the proof of my charge against you, and did not require an attorney to quibble on points of law. You, on the other hand, had an attorney—a man in whom any person may trust their case as a legal adviser, and outside the law I hav reason to know that Mr. Tenney, your solicitor, is a gentleman and a noble-hearted man. He must hav felt seriously the weakness of your case, as set forth in your libelous letter, and therefore, as an act of charity toward you, advised you not to submit to an examination. He, good fellow, by special pleading, decided to take exception on points of law, and attempted to show that not the spirit and intent of your libelous letter should be gone into, but the actual wording only should be considered, and that therefore the same should be adjudged as a privileged communication, and on this ground pleaded for a dismissal. This I objected to, whereupon your solicitor proposed that a brief be prepared, setting forth the reasons why my complaint against you should be dismissed. I then stated in the presence of that court, that all I required was a full investigation into the facts. It was then arranged that the District Attorney should take charge of the case as prosecuting counsel on behalf of the people against Anthony Comstock, I being promised at that time that such investigation should be made on the following Wednesday. But, feeling that there was some crooked business going on, and an attempt being made to frustrate justice, I employed one of our best attorneys, and he wrote a letter to the Judge, to the District Attorney, and your attorney for copy or nature of such brief. Not only so, but myself and attorney applied at Jefferson Market Police Court next day, and we were told that Justice Solon Smith had gone into the country, and would not be back until Monday following, the court officer to whom we spoke intimating that as the Comstock case was in the hands of Justice Solon Smith, nothing would be done until his return. Picture, therefore, my astonishment upon receiving a notice from the court that the case had been dismissed without an investigation into the facts which led to the writing of your letter, neither myself nor one of my witnesses being called, and yet you hav in your letter the audacity to tell the public that you were honorably acquitted. May heaven save the public when such honorable acquittals shall follow the publication of such vile letters as that penned by you to hundreds of my patients! So much for your "honorable acquittal." Now, as to your having evaded arrest or not, the facts are these: I did not dream of having you arrested until after I had written my letter to you, which appeared in all the newspapers. I called at your office personally three or four times, as did also my half-brother, David Cotter. We were each told by persons in your office that you had gone into the country, and would not be back for a week; but on being told by persons on Nassau street that you were seen in the immediate neighborhood not long after my calling, I felt that you were evading me, and deliberately refusing to giv me the names of those whom you pretended had made statements against me. It was your thus evading me which caused me to take criminal proceedings against you, and forthwith instruct counsel to sue out a warrant against you for criminal libel. After such warrant was in the hands of the officer, such officer and several of my witnesses sought you at your office. They were told by persons in your office that you had gone into the country, as I had before been told. On the morning of your arrest my half-brother, David Cotter, called at your office, in response to a telegram received by me. He was then told that you were away in the country. He went straight from your office to that of Howe & Hummel, and there met a private detectiv who offered there and then to disclose the whereabouts of Anthony Comstock, if the $100 reward, which I had offered for his arrest, should be given him. This was promised, and David Cotter then went and apprised the officer who held the warrant, and they went in company to your office, when they were jointly told by persons sitting there that you were away and they did not know when you would return; whereupon the officer, acting upon the information given by the detectiv above named, proceeded to a room in the upper part of the building wherein several voices were heard. The door was opened in response to the knocking of the officer, when a number of gentlemen were seen sitting around a table as if in committee. Anthony Comstock was inquired for, and denied being there. Upon retiring voices were heard in a room close by. Inquiry was made if Anthony Comstock was within. The person who opened the door replied that Anthony Comstock was not there, when the door was closed. My half-brother, who was waiting in the lobby, made a ruse as if running down stairs, the officer, all the time standing outside, beside the door. The same person who had before opened the door opened it again. The officer, by a rapid movement of the foot, kept the door open and then walked in and arrested yourself, Anthony Comstock. If this was not hiding from arrest, I fail to understand what hiding means, and as you hav in your open letter mentioned the fact of my having offered one hundred dollars reward; and that I had refused to pay the person giving the information. I beg leave here to state that the hundred dollars was paid to the detectiv in the presence of several witnesses, one of whom was a merchant and manufacturer in your immediate neighborhood of Nassau street. So much for your arrest. Was it with or without evasion?

Now, as to the next portion of your open letter: You say there is a law prohibiting the transmission of letters and circulars concerning schemes to deceive and defraud the public or obtain money by false pretense through the mails. You knew very well when you were writing that sentence that it had no application whatever to my case, inasmuch as the following open letter to the physicians of Brooklyn was before you, offering every physician or scientific man a free entry into my factory and consulting rooms, and in the same letter offering five thousand dollars' worth of my goods to the poor of Brooklyn Why did you not avail yourself of the offer and hav called at my consulting rooms and manufactory for inquiry before writing your libelous letter to the hundreds of my patients? You could hav no excuse as to time and place, for this reason, viz., that my establishment is one of the most prominent in Brooklyn, and in close proximity to your own residence, so that nothing but malice aforethought could hav induced you to hav written such a letter, while the following offer to the physicians of Brooklyn was before you in the circular or pamphlet from which you obtained the names of my patients to whom you wrote. If you wish to excuse yourself re-read the following:

WM. WILSON'S OPEN LETTER

To the Physicians and the Commissioners of Charities of the City of Brooklyn.

GENTLEMEN—Two years ago in Europe I invented and patented a magnetic appliance for the relief and cure of disease. My system is one that was never before attempted, but its simplicity places it among the many great improvements in the history of science which, after its inception, has caused thousands to wonder why so valuable an addition to the necessities of our race should hav been so long overlooked.

This success of my appliances in the cure of disease in England was such that over THIRTY THOUSAND persons were clothed in them, and not one case of failure when the proper appliances were worn as recommended. In the face of such success in Europe, I determined that the people of America should be made acquainted with the fact. I arrived in Brooklyn only a few months ago and commenced the sale of my goods at No. 465 Fulton street, since which time I hav, in Brooklyn and neighborhood, over a THOUSAND persons wearing my appliances for the diseases above mentioned—all of whom came to me only as a last resort, having failed to get relief from any of their physicians. And these persons were as readily relieved as were those of Europe—NINETY-NINE PER CENT of whom will tell you to-day on application to them that my appliances gave them all the relief promised. A printed list of my clients is at your disposal so that you may satisfy yourself of the truth of the above statement. My proposition therefore is that I hand over to the medical men of Brooklyn FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS worth of my appliances, to be used only on the person of the sick poor now and likely to be in your charitable institutions and hospitals. The only condition I make is that I myself clothe the patients according to my own judgment and be allowed to retain watchers at my own expense that the patients do not receive any medicin during the wearing of my appliances, and that a proper report be supplied from time to time, so that I, at my own expense, can publish the record of the cures by my appliances. I further wish that every medical man in Brooklyn should call at my manufactory and examin for himself the processes of manufacture and make himself thoroughly acquainted with my system. My factory is open for inspection at all hours to any physician, chemist, or scientist, and in close proximity to my own business premises the same physicians may see for themselvs the patients who hav been relieved by my appliances. All physicians and chemists who hav examined my goods hav availed themselvs of my invention, are to-day wearing my appliances, and recommending the same to their patients with marked success.

The aforesaid gift of FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS' worth of goods will be delivered from time to time, as agreed upon by a committee of yourselvs, on application to me a few days in advance, stating the disease for which they are required, so that I can supply the best possible form of my invention. Hoping you will avail yourselvs of my offer, I remain, gentlemen, Yours obediently,

WILLIAM WILSON
No. 465 Fulton st., Brooklyn.

In face of the above letter, what pretense can you find for your conduct? Why did you not giv me the names of the parties whom you pretended had writ ten to you? The fact is, no one did write to you except a lot of conspiring doctors and to please them you became their tool.

In the next part of your open letter you refer to a letter you sent me, and say as follows: "Why did you, like Ananias and Sapphira of old, keep back a part; why did you not tell the public that I wrote you personally on the 15th of September?" Your memory must be very bad in this particular, or you did not read the newspapers. Insomuch that this paragraph appeared in the Truth newspaper on September 20th, under the caption of "The Romance of Anthony Comstock's Arrest, and what Led to It," and directly following the $100 reward, I refer to the very letter which you say I never noticed:

"And the next morning I received a cringing letter, written after the reward was offered, as shown by the postal date on the envelope. Brooklyn postmark, 2 A. M., September 16. Now I was told in his office on the 15th of September, at two in the afternoon, that he had gone away for a week. Who told the lie? Did he order his subordinates so to do, or did they do so of their own accord? The next day, September 16th, my half brother, David Cotter, with the detectives and the court officer, went to Comstock's office. They were told that he was in the country, and did not know when he would return. They were then told that a letter was written by Comstock to William Wilson the night previous. At this the clerks seemed surprised, and said, 'Well, we do not know where he is, nor when he will return.'

"A private detectiv then told my half brother where to find him, and said he was hid away in an upper room in the same building. There the officers went, knocking at one door where voices were heard within, but the door was locked. Then in another room adjacent an attempt was made to discover him among a company of gentlemen sitting apparently in committee, but Comstock could not be seen. A ruse of running down stairs was made, only to retrace their steps just in time to find the door gently open that had before been tried and found locked. The officer slipped his foot between the door jamb and, walking into the room, arrested the great Anthony Comstock. He was taken before Justice Smith and committed in the following words of committal:

"'It appearing to me by the within depositions and statements that the crime there mentioned has been committed, and that there is sufficient cause to believe the within-named Anthony Comstock guilty thereof, I order that he be held to answer and be admitted to bail in the sum of five hundred dollars, and be committed to the warden or keeper of the city prison of the city of New York until he give such bail. SOLON B. SMITH,

"'Police Justice.

"'Dated September 16, 1881.'"

You will therefore see, on referring to your open letter, that you admit that my first public communication against your act was printed on the 14th day of Sept., and yet you charge me with being like Ananias and Sapphira of old, by keeping back a part. How could I mention, in my communication of the 14th, that which was not written by you until the 15th? But you know very well that the letter you refer to as having been kept back was referred to as above on the 20th day of September, that being the first letter from myself after receiving the letter written by you on the 15th. You therefore utterly fail to show in your open letter that I had kept anything back. In the same open letter you refer to a lawsuit in Ireland between Wetton & Co., and William Wilson, of No. 64½ Patrick street, Cork, and the most malicious act that any man could conceive is the taking the trouble of writing to Ireland for information respecting a man and when such information is received, telling one-half the story in a open letter to the public and keeping back the other half. This you know you hav done, and I challenge you to publish at your own cost your open letter, as I at my own cost shall publish this. Your malicious act in thus concealing the real nature of the lawsuit between Wetton and myself as rival manufacturers and large employers of labor is an act unworthy of the commonest informer. I hav a deed from the British government wherein, on the settlement of that suit as above referred to such deed binds my opponents to pay me a large sum of money in settlement thereof. Your attorney, Mr. Tenney or Mr. Colgate, your President, can see that deed whenever they choose to call at my offices. Yet you, in your open letter, attempted to show that I had been guilty of a crime. If this was not vindictiv malice, what was it? Again in the same open letter, you would insinuate that my patent and Edgar Wetton's were the same. Yet you know very well that the circular from which you obtained the name of my patients contains also the following description of my patent:

"During the past few years seven or eight different patents hav been taken out for Electric and Magnetic Belts, but the vital defect in each and all of them has been a want of means whereby the magnetism once imparted to them could be retained. This defect has been fully overcome in the 'Wilsonia' invention. William Wilson struck the happy idea of attaching a series of Voltaic Plates to the Magnets, which by absorbing the natural exudations of the skin giv out a constant galvanic current, and thus keep up a continuous supply of Magnetism. Another very important feature of the 'Wilsonia' invention is this. Wearers of these garments never experience unpleasant shocks and are never afflicted with sores, which inevitably result from wearing galvanic chain bands—they having to be steeped in vinegar to render them capable of imparting any curativ property, and in this process they become the mother of an incurable form of erysipelas! And then, the 'Wilsonia' is as comfortable to wear as any undergarment. These appliances keep the body warm in the cold season, and, by their power of absorption, impart, in the summer, a refreshing coolness."

Also the Method of Manufacture.

"Wilsonia" Magnetic Clothing!

These goods are made as explained below, and every person following out the instructions here given can make for themselvs and their own wearing any garments to suit their malady.

Although I hav patented the invention, I giv any one the liberty to make for themselvs, but shall prosecute any one who dares to make them for others to wear, or to sell.

Process of Manufacture.

Take a sheet of cloth, or any woven fabric, lay it upon another sheet of gutta percha tissue, then lay a sheet of muslin corresponding in size; fasten these together. Then take hard steel plates (brittle as glass they need be for our purpose), cut them into narrow strips about one and a half inches long; perforate each plate, making a hole large enough to take in an ordinary shoe eyelet. These plates to the number of 250 with 500 eyelets, fastened to the cloth, are sufficient to make an ordinary NERVE INVIGORATOR. Over these plates, when fastened to the fabric, we place another sheet of india rubber tissue. Over this again we place another sheet of muslin and fasten the whole mass together with hot irons. We then puncture the eyelets the whole thickness of the fabric so fastened together, having about five hundred openings through the garments. Then we cover the whole with a lining of any material to suit the fancy of the wearer, but preferably canton flannel should be used. When the garment is so far finished it is magnetized by a powerful electro magnet until every plate of the whole series is thoroughly saturated with magnetism.

Having described the process as above, I again say that if you make the garments as I direct they will do you just as much good as though I made them myself. But the above being my patent, I shall prosecute any one who dares to make them for profit, and shall use the utmost rigor of the law in so prosecuting.

Now, then, where comes in quackery with with the WILSONIA? Why do not the advertisers of quack nostrums tell purchasers how to make their compounds?

Now, as to Prof. White's great discovery: He told us a few weeks ago, through the columns of the New York Herald, that he had made a marvelous discovery, viz., that the whole secret of the electric charge in the Gymnotus, or electric eel, lay wholly in the fact that the said electric eel was enveloped in a film, whereby its electric charge was augmented. This marvelous discovery, he said, was only made after six and three-quarter years of fruitless research, and by an accident, he goes on to say the whole thing was made complete.

Now it will be seen from reading the above formula, that WILLIAM WILSON'S patent was taken out two and a half years before Professor White made his statement through the columns of the Herald.

It is upon the Gutta Percha Film patented by MR. WILSON, that the secret of the "WILSONIA'S" force wholly lies.

Physicians, electricians, and scientists are, therefore, invited to examine critically into the nature of the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING, and, with the formula be ore them, go into their laboratories and experiment for themselvs. They will then know that the

---

WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING

Is the Greatest Wonder of the Age, and yet withal one of the most Simple of Inventions.

In the same open letter which you sent to the newspapers you maliciously attempt to belittle me by assuming that, because I had been a cabinetmaker, I could not therefore attain to a knowledge of curativ agencies distinct from the methods laid down by the schools. In answer to this assumption of yours, I can only say that I pity you for your stupidity. Do you not know that the celebrated Dr. John Hunter of London worked at the bench as a cabinetmaker at forty-two years of age, and afterward became the most eminent surgeon in Europe? and to-day the Hunterian Museum in London is a living monument of that cabinetmaker's skill? Do you not also know that all great inventions ever made emanate from among those whom we least suspect as the originators of new thought?

Another important reference in your open letter I refer to: On a boar'sign y u say as follows: "Read the Anthony Comstock letters in favor of 'Wilsonia.'" In answer to which I simply say that I hav the copies of fifty-five letters sent to you in favor of my garments, the parties sending such letters being those to whom you had conveyed your libelous communication. Therefore I call these letters of my patients the Anthony Comstock letters, and shall continue to publish them in a pamphlet dedicated to the Young Men's Christian Association of Brooklyn and New York; nor you nor your society shall intimidate me against such publication. Nothing shall be hidden nor held back. In conclusion, I again make the following challenge to you: To sign bonds for $5,000 if you can prove that I do not cure ninety per cent of the incurables given over by the doctors, or to produce one case where all the benefit was was not derived as promised on the purchase of the goods, such goods being worn as directed as to quantity and to time. I believe your society requires money to carry on its operations; here, therefore, is a chance to add to its funds. I will also sign bonds for a like sum if you can show one testimonial published by me that was not genuine, and will pay all expenses of the six physicians on whom you relied, and will meet them singly or as a body on any platform in the United States, and prove to an audience of scientists that these physicians know nothing of the nature of nerve fluid, the constitution of the blood, nor the difference between electricity and magnetism as a curativ agent. WILLIAM WILSON.

Having thus openly answered your letter, and wishing the whole thing to be closed up, I herewith make you this offer, viz: That you shall, upon the examination of the deeds referred to in my letter as above, between your attorney and Mr. Colgate, upon the conclusion of such investigation, giv me a letter of apology for having been instrumental in casting discredit upon my invention. I am quite willing to accept your plea of ignorance of the facts, and that you were deceived by others.

Upon receipt of such letter of apology, I will withdraw all further proceedings. WILLIAM WILSON.

Important to the Suffering and Afflicted Who Hav Been Deceived by Advertising Nostrum Venders.

The great success attending the introduction of my world-famed WILSONIA GARMENTS has incited a host of speculators to place upon the market several bogus arrangements under the specious titles of "Magnetic Clothing" or "Magnetic Garments." One unprincipled person has actually copied my engraving representing my clothing, so that a person not seeing the garments would take it for granted that the goods so advertised were facsimiles of the WILSONIA, the engravings representing the clothing being identical with those issued by myself thus tending to defraud the public by their purchasing a worthless article for the cure of some malady or other. This same person has copied, almost verbatim, the language of my own circulars. One of these garments was brought me direct from the vender. I find it to be a clumsy imitation of the first magnetic garments made in Europe some fifteen years ago. I would therefore ask the public to see the Wilsonia garments before purchasing anything represented as a magnetic clothing. They will then find that an attempt at imitation has been made by an engraved circular containing copies of my own circular as above stated, and so cunningly has the device been carried out that parties purchasing the goods from such circular will suppose that the garments so purchased were identical with my own, but when seen together they are as different as anything can possibly be conceived. If, however, persons will call at any of our STORES in New York or Brooklyn, or elsewhere in the United States where Wilsonia depots are opened, they may hav everything made clear to them. The claim of CHEAPNESS is a poor point to put forward when the matter of disease and life and death is in the balance. My reputation now is so unparalleled that never before in the history of the world hav such remarkable cures been effected as those following the timely use of the now world-renowned Wilsonia garments. The blind hav been made to see, the deaf to hear, the helpless paralytic to walk erect, the demented to become sane, the martyr to catarrh and asthma to speak and breathe freely, the terrified with heart disease to walk forward among the public without the terror of impending death. All and every form of disease disappearwhen the Wilsonia Magnetic Garments are used as directed. I will undertake to cure 90 per cent of the so-called incurables now in the hospitals in the United States, and will place my garments upon such patients free of charge, the only condition I make being that the authorities governing such hospitals shall not allow any medicin to be given the patients during the wearing of my garments, and that the cures shall be publicly advertised as soon as made. CITIZENS OF AMERICA! when and where in the history of the world has such an offer as this been made? Here, in New York and Brooklyn alone, there are thousands of poor invalids in our hospitals passing through the ordeal of a protracted and living death who might, if my offer be accepted, be restored to the world as useful members of society, and this free of charge. If my offer be not accepted by the physicians of the hospitals, then the physicians must stand convicted of indifference and carelessness toward the poor invalids intrusted to their care. I hav sold my patent to a company with a view of manufacturing on a very large scale, so that with increased facilities in the form of valuable machinery specially prepared for our purposes, we shall be able to place upon the market an unlimited supply of these wonderfully curativ appliances.

After years of study in the particular direction of electrical therapeutics, I hav from time to time made many improvements on my first conception of what was needed for the relief and cure of disease until the "Wilsonia" in its present form contains all the elements of what has gone before in the same direction. The continuity of current is made complete, the dangers of [illegible]-ventilation are entirely overcome. This is an important point in the "Wilsonia." Thousands of persons are to-day suffering from the effects of retarded perspiration, having had thrown back into the organism the poisonous excretions of the body. The expensiv nature of the "Wilsonia" combination in all its entirety makes the price somewhat high, but yet it is far the cheapest in the end, inasmuch as the curativ force will continue for years although a commoner kind will frequently result in marvelous cures. These commoner goods we sell at the following prices:

PRICE LIST.

LUNG INVIGORATORS	$6 00

Gems of Thought.

WHAT a soul that is which is ready, if at any moment it must be separated from the body, and ready either to be extinguished or dispersed, or to continue to exist; but so that this readiness comes from a man's own judgment, not from mere obstinacy, as with the Christians, but considerately and with dignity and in a way to persuade another, without tragic show.—M. A. Antoninus.

MORTALS! that would follow me,
Love virtue; she alone is free:
She can teach you how to climb
Higher than the sphery chime;
Or, if virtue feeble were,
Heaven itself would stoop to her.
—Milton.

THE poet [Lucretius] that beautified the sect [Epicurean] that was otherwise inferior to the rest, saith yet excellently well, "It is a pleasure to stand upon the shore and see ships tossed upon the sea; a pleasure to stand in the window of a castle and to see a battle and the adventures thereof below, but no pleasure is comparable to the standing upon the vantage ground of truth (a hill not to be commanded, and where the air is always clear and serene), and to see the errors and wanderings, and the mists and tempests in the vale below," so always that this prospect be with pity, and not with swelling or pride. Certainly it is a heaven upon earth to hav a man's mind move in charity, rest in Providence, and turn upon the poles of truth.—Bacon's Essays.

No! we are not Christians. A few try to pass themselvs off as Christians because whilst substantially men of this age, they can cheat themselvs into using the old charms in the desperate attempt to conjure down alarming social systems; a great number call themselvs Christians because in on way or another the use of the old phrases and th old forms is still enforced by the great sanction o respectability; and some for the higher reason tha they fear to part with the grain along with th chaff, but such men substantially, though only few, hav ceased avowedly to be Christians in an intelligible sense of the name. How long the shado ought to survive the substance is a question whic may be commended to serious consideration.—Le lie Stephen.

AS to what evil is, as to the causes of crime, of pauperism, of all the ills that undermine human happiness, that shadow the world, and blot out the light of heaven—these are not matters that depend on testimony; they are questions for observation, for experiment, to be settled by scientific method. And so of all the great problems—those of religion, those of morality; the deepest questions of society and statesmanship and the practical control and conduct of life—are not those concerning which we need to be in doubt. They do not depend upon any gospel, or Bible, or book, or testimony of any witness who is not dead; they depend upon the great facts and laws all around us, in whose arms we are, in whose presence we stand, by whose power we liv and breathe—they depend upon those things things that are open to the observation and experiment of the world.—M. J Savage.

HOPE! when I mourn, with sympathizing mind,
The wrongs of fate, the woes of human kind,
The blissful omens bid my spirit see
The boundless fields of rapture yet to be;
I watch the wheels of nature's mazy plan,
And learn the future by the past of man.
—Campbell.

SOME time ago I attended a large meeting of the clergy, for the purpose of delivering an address which I had been invited to giv. I spoke of some of the most elementary facts in physical sciences, and of the manner in which they directly contradict certain of the ordinary teachings of the clergy. The result was that, after I had finished, one section of the assembled ecclesiastics attacked me with all the intemperance of pious zeal for stating facts and conclusions which which no competent judge doubts; while, after the first speaker had subsided, amidst the cheers of the great majority of their colleagues the more rational minority rose to tell me that I had taken wholly superfluous pains; that they already knew all about what I had told them, and perfectly agreed with me. A hard-headed friend of mine who was present put the not unnatural question, "Then why don't you say so in the pulpits?" To which inquiry I heard no reply.—Huxley.

IF a man of science thinks that a thing lies out of his province he will be very likely to say that he knows nothing against it. He will not meddle with revivals nor dispute on infant baptism. Politics he may ignore. If he is led to investigate the modern Spiritualism, his scientific instinct detects the shadowy nature of the claim that spirits intrude into the organization of living persons to control them. For the breath of his intellect is the idea of non-intrusion, non-intervention, the inviolability of every province that is controled by necessary laws.—Weiss's American Religion.

WORK is the mission of man on this earth. Let wastefulness, idleness, drunkenness, improvidence take the fate that God has appointed them, that their opposits may also hav a chance for their fate —Carlyle.

WHAT right has any Christian to protest against the teachings of the sacred, holy, and all-perfect mother religion? Were not the apostolic fathers all Catholics? Was not every Christian a Catholic before Protestantism broke out among the true believers? Was not the Bible, your own sacred Godbook, a Catholic Bible and in the hands of Catholics for hundreds of years, and did they not later change, and manipulate its texts and dogmas to suit themselvs during all those centuries of ownership? Did they not quarrel, fight, and murder one another in religious discussions as to the meaning of certain parts of it, and wrangle, dispute, and even put it to vote which portions of the so-called sacred writings should be canonical, which apocryphal, and which should be cast out entirely as spurious and false?—Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

SILVER dollars with holes in them are painfully numerous, but they're not half so painfully numerous as holes without any silver around them.

A LITTLE boy was asked recently if he knew where the wicked finally went to. He answered, "They study theology here a spell, and then get into the pulpit."

"GEORGE, dear, don't you think it's rather extravagant of you to eat butter with that delicious jam?" "No, love; economical. Same piece of bread does for both."

WHEN a boy was asked, "Where was the text this morning?" he quickly replied, "It is somewhere in Hatchets." "In Hatchets? No, it was in Acts." "Well, I knew it was something that would cut."

WESTERN papers report the case of a man who attempted suicide because his conscience condemned him for drinking rum. This is a hint for the wives of red-nosed husbands to turn the mirrors to the wall.

BECAUSE it was raining a Western youth refused to go to the church while a bride awaited him. A man who is afraid of rain hasn't the nerve necessary to stand the hot water that sometimes accompanies a matrimonial squabble.

"There's one thing I like about the new version," said old Blunderbuss. "That ere text about 'the boy being father to the man' is left out altogether. I always thought that was wrong end to." And he didn't know why the smile went round.

WHEN a grand hunt is given in honor of the Queen of Spain a deer is tied to a tree, the Queen rests a musket in a forked stick a foot from the animal's side, and, as the gun goes off and the deer drops, everybody yells: "Whoopee, ga-lory! 'Rah for us!"

"How d'ye like the sermon this morning?" asked a good brother of the deacon as he passed out of the vestibule.

"Good, loud, forcible speaker," replied the deacon, "but when there's so much noise I always think it was made by a blank cartridge."

NOW Joaquin Miller wants "to rest where the wide-eyed rabbits play." The thing can't be done, for as soon as the warbling Joaquin waltzes in the wide-eyed rabbits will get right up and go away from there. They would clamber into the dim distance and wink their unimportant tails at him. Joaquin is a poet, and even the wide-eyed rabbits know that poets are a hungry set.

"DIS boy ob mine is de best scholar in dis town," said old Isom, placing a heavy hand on the happy head of his son. "How much is six times ten?"

"Sixty," answered the boy.

"Ain't dat rythmatic fur yer, gen'lemen? Now, ef I had eight chickens an' gin five ter yer, how many would I hab left?"

"But you won't giv me none of the chickens," said the boy. "They are under the bed now, and I knowed last night when you fotched 'em in."

"Boy, yer's done forget eberthing yer eber knowed. Go 'way an' doan cum roun' de house no mo' ter-day. A nigger will be a nigger, doan keer ef yer feed him on science an' gogafy."

A YOUNG lady gave "her young man" a beautifully worked pair of slippers, and he acknowledged the present by sending her his picture, encased in a handsome frame. He wrote a note to send with it, and at the same time replied, angrily, to an oft-repeated dun for an unpaid-for suit of clothes. He gave a boy ten cents to deliver the packages and notes, giving explicit directions as to the destination of each.

It was a boy with a freckled face, and he discharged his errand in a manner that should giv him a niche in the temple of fame.

The young lady received a note in her adored one's handwriting, and flew to her room to devour its contents. She opened the missiv with eager fingers, and read:

"I'm getting tired of your everlasting attentions. The suit is about worn out already. It never amounted to much, any way. Please go to thunder!"

And the tailor was struck utterly dumb when he opened a parcel and discovered the picture of his delinquent customer, with a note that said;

"When you gaze upon these features, think how much I owe you."

When the unfortunate young man called around that evening to receive the happy acknowledgment of his sweetheart, he was very ostentatiously shoved off the steps by the young lady's father.

THE other day a show came to Little Rock, and was shamefully imposed upon by Uncle Isom. While standing near the tent he saw a crowd of low-spirited boys grieving on account of financial depression.

"Does yer youngsters wanter go to der show?" he asked.

The boys responded in noisy chorus. "Well, come on, den. I uster be a chile myself, an' unlike de mos' of men, I hain't forgot it. Count dese boys," he added, addressing the doorkeeper. The man began counting, and by the time the boys had passed in Isom was walking around talking to acquaintances from the plantations.

"Here," said the showman, giv me twenty tickets."

"What for? Does ver think me a lottery-dgent?"

"You passed in twenty boys, and I want the tickets or the money."

"I doan owe yer no tickets, and I doan owe yer no money. I didn't tell yer ter pass de boys in. I said count 'em. I'se always heard dat showmen is good on 'rithmatie, 'an' I wanted ter satisfy myself. Yer say dat dar was twenty boys. I doan' 'spute yer word, case I ain't no mathertician. Sposen I take a lot ob boys ter de cashier ob a bank an' axes him ter count 'em, does dat signify dat de cashier is gwine ter pass 'em into de money room? No, sah. Go back ter yer tent, I sees a crowd goin' in."

The showman, remembering that he had left the entrance unguarded, turned, and Isom walked away.

LIBERAL HOMES
AND A
LIBERAL MAGAZINE.

The Liberal is a monthly magazine published by G. H. Walser at Liberal, Mo., at the low price of fifty cents a year. This magazine is issued in the interest of true Liberalism and gives full and accurate information concerning the town and colony of Liberal—founded for Liberals and Spiritualists, where they can enjoy the full fruition of universal mental liberty. The town is growing rapidly. It has no preacher, no church, no drunkenness, no saloon, no God, no Christ, no hell, no devil. But peace, civility, truth, happiness, and sobriety reigns supreme among the people. Address G. H. WALSER, Liberal, Mo. tf

BLISS'S
Electro-Magnetic Planchette.
Designed Especially to Develop Mediumistic Persons as Writing Mediums.
After months of careful study and experiment, Mr. James A. Bliss, the well-known medium, of Providence, R. I. (formerly of Philadelphia, Pa.), has perfected his Writing Planchette, and although many improvements hav been made, the price remains the same as heretofore.
Bliss's Electro-Magnetic Planchette is a wonderful little instrument. It will operate in the hands of many persons who hav never had the least faith in Spiritual manifestations. It has convinced thousands that it was moved by a power independent of hands placed upon it while experimenting. It will answer either mental or spoken questions, and giv you wonderful communications from your spirit friends
Skeptics are especially invited to experiment with it.
The general verdict of the persons that hav used Bliss's Planchette is, That it will write messages where the common wooden unmagnetized planchette will remain motionless.
Remember this Planchette is not only the best, but it is the cheapest in the market.
The Planchette, with wheels, pencil, and full directions will be securely inclosed in a box and mailed to any address in the United States only, upon the receipt of 50 cents. For sale at the office of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.
A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.
Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.
Spermatorrhea and Impotency,
as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an
EXTERNAL APPLICATION,
which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case. Some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.
SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.
Middle-Aged and Old Men.
There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.
☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.
PRIVATE COUNSELOR.
Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]
Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, his system based upon scientific fact."

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.
The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.
BY JAMES PARTON.
With Portraits and other Illustrations.
This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.
Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.
In two vols. 8vo. Price, $6; half calf, $11.
